5. The happy effects of this anointing, the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward, v. 13. The anointing him was not an empty ceremony, but a divine power went along with that instituted sign, and he found himself inwardly advanced in wisdom and courage, and concern for the public, with all the qualifications of a prince, though not at all advanced in his outward circumstances. This would abundantly satisfy him that his election was of God. The best evidence of our being predestinated to the kingdom of glory, is, our being sealed with the Spirit of promise, and our experience of a work of grace in our hearts. Some think that his courage, by which he slew the lion and the bear, and his extraordinary skill in music, were the effects and evidences of the Spirit's coming upon him. However, this made him the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Samuel, 23. 1. Samuel, having done this, went to Ramah in safety, and we never read of him again but once, (ch. 19. 18.) till we read of his death; now he retired to die in peace, since his eyes had seen the salvation, even the sceptre brought into the tribe of Judah.

14. But the Spirit of the LORD departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the LORD troubled him. 15. And Saul's servants said unto him, Behold now, an evil spirit from God troubleth thee. 16. Let our lord now command thy servants, which are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player on a harp: and it shall come to pass, when the evil spirit from God is upon thee, that he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well. 17. And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now a man that can play well, and bring him to me. 18. Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen a son of Jesse the Beth-lehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the LORD is with him. 19. Wherefore Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, and said, Send me David thy son, which is with the sheep. 20. And Jesse took an ass laden with bread, and a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them by David his son unto Saul. 21. And David came to Saul, and stood before him: and he loved him greatly; and he became his armour-bearer. 22. And Saul sent to Jesse, saying, Let David, I pray thee, stand before me; for he hath found favour in my sight. 23. And it came to pass, when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took a harp, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him.

We have here Saul falling, and David rising.

I. Here is Saul made a terror to himself; (v. 14.) The Spirit of the Lord departed from him. He having forsaken God and his duty, God, in a way of righteous judgment, withdrew from him those assistances of the good Spirit with which he was directed, animated, and encouraged in his government and wars. He lost all his good qualities. This was the effect of his rejecting God, and an evidence of his being rejected by him. Now God took his mercy from Saul, (as it is expressed, 2 Sam. 7. 15.) for when the Spirit of the Lord departs from us, all good goes. When men grieve and quench the Spirit, by wilful sin, he departs, and will not always strive. The consequence of this was, that an evil spirit from God troubled him. They that drive the good Spirit away from them, do of course become a prey to the evil spirit. If God and his grace do not rule us, sin and Satan will have possession of us. The Devil, by the divine permission, troubled and terrified Saul, by means of the corrupt humours of his body, and passions of his mind. He grew fretful, and peevish, and discontented; timorous and suspicious, ever and anon starting and trembling; he was sometimes, says Josephus, as if he had been choked or strangled, and a perfect demoniac by fits. This made him unfit for business, precipitate in his counsels, the contempt of his enemies, and a burthen to all about him.

II. Here is David made a physician to Saul, and by that means brought to court; a physician that helped him against the worst of diseases, when none else could. David was newly anointed privately to the kingdom; it would be of use to him to go to court, and see the world: it is here brought about for him, without any contrivance of his own or his friends. Note, Those whom God designs for any service, his providence shall concur with his grace to prepare and qualify them for it.

Saul is distempered; his servants have the honesty and courage to tell him what his distemper was; (v. 15.) An evil spirit, not by chance, but from God, and his providence, troubleth thee. Now,

1. The means they all advise him to for his relief, was, music; (v. 16.) "Let us have a cunning player on the harp to attend thee." How much better friends had they been to him, if they had advised him, since the evil spirit was from the Lord, to give all diligence to make his peace with God by true repentance, to send for Samuel to pray with him, and to intercede with God for him; then might he not only have had some present relief, but the good spirit would have returned to him. But their project is to make him merry, and so cure him. Many whose consciences are convinced and startled, are for ever ruined by such methods as these, which drown all care of the soul in the delights of sense. Yet Saul's servants did not amiss to send for music, as a help to cheer up the spirits, if they had but withal sent for a prophet to give him good counsel. And (as Bishop Hall observes) it was well they did not send for a witch or diviner, by his enchantments to cast out the evil spirit, which has been the abominable wicked practice of some that have worn the christian name, who consult the Devil in their distresses, and make hell their refuge. It will be no less than a miracle of divine grace, if these who thus agree with Satan, ever break off from him again.

2. One of his servants recommended David to him, as a fit person to be employed in the use of these means, little imagining that he was the man whom Samuel meant, when he told Saul, a neighbour of his, better than he, should have the kingdom, ch. 15. 28. It is a very high character which this servant of Saul here gives of David, (v. 18.) that he was not only fit for his purpose as a comely person, and cunning in playing, but a man of courage and conduct, a mighty valiant man, and prudent in matters, fit to be further preferred, and (which crowned his character) the Lord is with him. By this it appears, that though David, after he was anointed, returned to his country-business, and there remained on his head no marks of the oil, so careful was he to keep that secret, yet the workings of the Spirit signified by the oil, could not be hid, but made him shine in obscurity, so that all his neighbours observed with wonder the great improvements of his mind on a sudden. David, even in his shepherd's garb, is become an oracle, a champion, and every thing that is great. His fame reached the court soon, for Saul was inquisitive after such young men, ch. 14. 52. When the Spirit of God comes upon a man, he will make his face to shine.

3. David is hereupon sent for to court. And it seems,

(1.) His father was very willing to part with him, sent him very readily, and a present with him to Saul; (v. 20.) the present was, according to the usage of those times, bread and wine, (compare ch. 10. 3, 4.) therefore acceptable, because expressive of the homage and allegiance of him that sent it. Probably, Jesse, who knew what his son David was designed for, was aware that Providence was herein fitting him for it, and therefore he would not force Providence by sending him to court uncalled, yet he followed Providence very cheerfully, when he saw it plainly putting him in the way of preferment. Some suggest, that when Jesse received that message, Send me David thy son, he began to be afraid that Saul had got some intimation of his being anointed, and sent for him to do him a mischief, and therefore Jesse sent a present to pacify him; but it is probable, that the person, whoever he was, that brought the message, gave him an account on what design he was sent for.

(2.) Saul became very kind to him, (v. 21.) loved him greatly, and designed to make him his armour bearer, and (contrary to the manner of the king, ch. 8. 11.) asked his father's leave to keep him in his service, (v. 22.) Let David, I pray thee, stand before me. And good reason he had to respect him, for he did him a great deal of service with his music, v. 23. His instrumental music with his harp is the only kind mentioned, but it should seem by the account Josephus gives of it, that he added vocal music to it, and sung hymns, probably divine hymns, songs of praise, to his harp. David's music was Saul's physic. [1.] Music has a natural tendency to compose and exhilarate the mind, when it is disturbed and saddened. Elisha used it for the calming of his spirits, 2 Kings 3. 15. On some it has a greater influence and effect than on others, and, probably, Saul was one of those. Not that it charmed the evil spirit, but it made his spirit sedate, and allayed those tumults of the animal spirits, by which the Devil had advantage against him. The beams of the sun (it is the learned Bochart's comparison) cannot be cut with a sword, quenched with water, or blown out with wind, but, by closing the window-shutters, they may be kept out of the chamber. Music cannot work upon the Devil, but it may shut up the passages by which he had access to the mind. [2.] David's music was extraordinary, and in mercy to him, that he might gain a reputation at court, as one that had the Lord with him. God made his performance in music more successful, in this case, than that of others would have been. Saul found, even after he had conceived an enmity to David, that no one else could do him the same service, (ch. 19. 9, 10.) which was a great aggravation of his outrage against him. It is pity that music, which may be so serviceable to the good temper of the mind, should ever be abused by any to the support of vanity and luxury, and made an occasion of drawing the heart away from God and serious things: if that be to any the effect of it, it drives away the good Spirit, not the evil Spirit.

CHAP. XVII.

David is the man whom God now delights to honour, for he is a man after his own heart. We read in the foregoing chapter, how, after he was anointed, Providence made him famous in the court; we read in this chapter, how Providence made him much more famous in the camp, and, by both, not only marked him for a great man, but fitted him for the throne to which he was designated. In the court he was only Saul's physician, but in the camp, Israel's champion, there he fairly fought, and beat Goliath of Gath. In the story observe, I. What a figure Goliath made, and how daringly he challenged the armies of Israel, v. 1. - 11. II. What a mean figure David made, when Providence brought him to the army, v. 12. - 30. III. The unparalleled bravery wherewith David undertook to encounter this Philistine, v. 31. - 39. IV. The pious resolution with which he attacked him, v. 40. - 47. V. The glorious victory he obtained over him with a sling and a stone, and the advantage which the Israelites thereby gained against the Philistines, v. 48. - 54. VI. The great notice which was hereupon taken of David at court, v. 55. - 58.

1. NOW the Philistines gathered together their armies to battle, and were gathered together at Shochoh, which belongeth to Judah, and pitched between Shochoh and Azekah, in Ephesdammin. 2. And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the valley of Elah, and set the battle in array against the Philistines. 3. And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a mountain on the other side: and there was a valley between them. 4. And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath, of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span. 5. And he had a helmet of brass upon his head, and he was armed with a coat of mail; and the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass. 6. And he had greaves of brass upon his legs, and a target of brass between his shoulders. 7. And the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron: and one bearing a shield went before him. 8. And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel, and said unto them, Why are ye come out to set your battle in array? Am not I a Philistine, and you servants to Saul? choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. 9. If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants: but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us. 10. And the Philistine said, I defy the armies of Israel this day: give me a man, that we may fight together. 11. When Saul and all Israel heard those words of the Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid.

It was not long ago that the Philistines were soundly beaten, and put to the worse, before Israel, and would have been totally routed, if Saul's rashness had not prevented; but here we have them making head again. Observe,

I. How they defied Israel with their armies, v. 1. They made a descent upon the Israelites' country, and possessed themselves, as it should seem, of some part of it, for they encamped in a place which belongeth to Judah. Israel's ground had never been footing for Philistine armies, if Israel had been faithful to their God. The Philistines (it is probable) had heard that Samuel had fallen out with Saul, and forsaken him, and no longer assisted and advised him, and that Saul was grown melancholy, and unfit for business, and this encouraged them to make this attempt for the retrieving of the credit they had lately lost. The enemies of the church are watchful to take all advantages, and they never have greater advantages, than when her protectors have provoked God's Spirit and prophets to leave them. Saul mustered his forces, and faced them, v. 2, 3. And here we must take notice, 1. That evil spirit, for the present, had left Saul, ch. 16. 23. David's harp having given him some relief, perhaps, the alarms and affairs of the war prevented the return of the distemper. Business is a good antidote against melancholy. Let the mind have something without to fasten on, and employ itself about, and it will be less in danger of preying upon itself. God, in mercy to Israel, suspended the judgment for a while; for how distracted must the affairs of the public have been, if, at this juncture, the prince had been distracted? 2. That David, for the present, was returned to Beth-lehem, and had left the court, v. 15. When Saul had no further occasion to use him for the relief of his distemper, though, being anointed, he had a very good private reason, and, having a grant of the place of Saul's armour-bearer, he had a very plausible pretence to have continued his attendance, as a retainer to the court, yet he went home to Beth-lehem, and returned to keep his father's sheep; this was a rare instance, in a young man that stood so fair for preferment, of humility, and affection to his parents. He knew better than most do, how to come down again after he had begun to rise, and strangely preferred the retirements of a pastoral life before all the pleasures and gaieties of the court. None more fit for honour than he, nor that deserved it better, and yet none more dead to it.

II. How they defied Israel with their champion Goliath, whom they were almost as proud of, as he was of himself, hoping by him to recover their reputation and dominion. Perhaps the army of the Israelites was superior in number and strength to that of the Philistines, which made the Philistines decline a battle, and stand at bay with them, desiring rather to put the issue upon a single combat, in which, having such a champion, they hoped to gain the victory. Now concerning this champion, observe,

1. His prodigious size. He was of the sons of Anak, who at Gath kept their ground in Joshua's time, (Josh. 11. 22.) and kept up a race of giants there, of which Goliath was one, and, it is probable, one of the largest. He was in height six cubits and a span, v. 4. The learned bishop Cumberland has made it out, that the scripture cubit was above twenty-one inches, (above three inches more than our half-yard,) and a span was half a cubit, by which computation, Goliath wanted but eight inches of four yards in height, eleven feet and four inches.

A monstrous stature, and which made him very formidable, especially if he had strength and spirit proportionable.

2. His armour; art, as well as nature, made him terrible. He was well furnished with defensive armour, v. 5, 6. A helmet of brass on his head, a coat of mail, made of brass plates laid over one another, like the scales of a fish; and because his legs would lie most within the reach of an ordinary man, he wore brass boots, and a large corselet of brass about his neck. The coat is said to weigh five thousand shekels, and a shekel was half an ounce avoirdupois. A vast weight for a man to carry, all the other parts of his armour being proportionable. But some think it should be translated, not the weight of the coat, but the value of it, was five thousand shekels; so much it cost. His offensive weapons were extraordinary, of which the spear only is here described, v. 7. It was like a weaver's beam; his arm could manage that, which an ordinary man could scarcely heave. His shield only, which was the lightest of all his accoutrements, was carried before him by his esquire, probably, for state; for he that was clad in brass, little needed a shield.

3. His challenge. The Philistines having chosen him for their champion, to save themselves from the hazard of a battle, he here throws down the gauntlet, and bids defiance to the armies of Israel, v. 8-10. He came into the valley that lay between the camps, and his voice, probably, being as much stronger than other people's as his arm was, he cried so as to make them all hear him, Give me a man, that we may fight together. He looks upon himself with admiration, because he was so much taller and stronger than all about him; his heart (says Bishop Hall) nothing but a lump of proud flesh. He looks upon Israel with disdain, because they had none among them of such a monstrous bulk, and defies them to find a man among them, bold enough to enter the lists with him. (1.) He upbraids them with their folly in drawing an army together, "Why are ye come to set the battle in array?" How dare you oppose the mighty Philistines?" Or, "Why should the two armies engage, when the controversy may be sooner decided, with only the expense of one life, and the hazard of another?" (2.) He offers to put the war entirely upon the issue of the duel he proposes; "If your champion kills me, we will be your servants; if I kill him, you shall be ours." This (says Bishop Patrick) was only a bravado, for no nation would be willing thus to venture its all upon the success of one man, nor is it justifiable; notwithstanding Goliath's stipulation here, when he was killed, the Philistines did not stand to his word, nor submit themselves servants to Israel. When he boasts, I am a Philistine, and you servants to Saul, he would have it thought a great piece of condescension in him, who was a chief ruler, to enter the lists with an Israelite; for he looked on them as no better than slaves. The Chaldee paraphrase brings him in, boasting that he was the man that had killed Hophni and Phinehas, and taken the ark prisoner; but that the Philistines had never given him so much as the command of a regiment in recompense of his services, whereas Saul had been made king for his services: "Let him therefore take up the challenge."

4. The terror this struck upon Israel; (v. 11.) Saul and all his army were greatly afraid. The people would not have been dismayed, but that they observed Saul's courage failed him; and it is not to be expected, that if the leader be a coward, the followers should be bold. We found before, when the spirit of the Lord came upon Saul, (ch. 11. 6) none could be more daring, more forward, to answer the challenge of Nahash the Ammonite; but now that the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him, even the big looks and big words of a single Philistine made him change colour. But where was Jonathan all this while? Why did not he accept the challenge, who, in the late war, had so bravely engaged a whole army of Philistines? Doubtless, he felt not himself stirred up of God to it, as he did then. As the best, so the bravest men, are no more than what God makes them. Jonathan must now sit still, because the honour of engaging Goliath is reserved for David. In great and good actions, the wind of the Spirit blows when and where he listeth. Now the pious Israelites lament their king's breach with Samuel.

12. Now David was the son of that Ephrathite of Beth-lehem-Judah, whose name was Jesse; and he had eight sons: and the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul. 13. And the three eldest sons of Jesse went and followed Saul to the battle: and the names of his three sons that went to the battle were Eliab the first-born; and next unto him, Abinadab; and the third, Shammah. 14. And David was the youngest: and the three eldest followed Saul. 15. But David went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Beth-lehem. 16. And the Philistine drew near morning and evening, and presented himself forty days. 17. And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run to the camp to thy brethren: 18. And carry these ten cheeses unto the captain of their thousand, and look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge. 19. Now Saul, and they, and all the men of Israel, were in the valley of Elah, fighting with the Philistines. 20. And David rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper, and took, and went, as Jesse had commanded him: and he came to the trench as the host was going forth to the fight, and shouted for the battle. 21. For Israel and the Philistines had put the battle in array, army against army. 22. And David left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage, and ran into the army, and came and saluted his brethren. 23. And as he talked with them, behold, there came up the champion, (the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name,) out of the armies of the Philistines, and spake according to the same words: and David heard them. 24. And all the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid. 25. And the men of Israel said, Have ye seen this man that is come up? surely to defy Israel is he come up: and it shall be, that the man who killeth him, the king will enrich him with great riches, and will give him his daughter, and make his father's house free in Israel. 26. And David spake to the men that stood by him, saying, What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? for who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy the armies of the living God? 27. And the people answered him after this manner, saying, So shall it be done to the man that killeth him. 28. And Eliab, his eldest brother, heard when he spake unto the men; and Eliab's anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle. 29. And David said, What have I now done? Is there not a cause? 30. And he turned from him toward another, and spake after the same manner: and the people answered him again after the former manner.

Forty days the two armies lay encamped facing one another, each advantageously posted; but neither forward to engage. Either they were parleying, and treating of an accommodation, or waiting for recruits; and perhaps there were frequent skirmishes between small detached parties. All this while, twice a day, morning and evening, did the insulting champion appear in the field, and repeat his challenge; his own heart growing more and more proud for his not being answered, and the people of Israel more and more timorous; while God designed hereby to ripen him for destruction, and to make Israel's deliverance the more illustrious. All this while, David is keeping his father's sheep, but at the end of forty days, Providence brings him to the field, to win and wear the laurel, which no other Israelite dares venture for.

We have in these verses,

I. The present state of his family. His father was old, v. 12. he went among men for an old man, was taken notice of for his great age, above what was usual at that time, and therefore was excused from public services, and went not in person to the wars, but sent his sons; he had the honours paid him that were due to his age, his hoary head was a crown of glory to him. David's three elder brethren, who perhaps envied his place at the court, got their father to send for him home, and let them go to the camp, where they hoped to signalize themselves, and eclipse him; (v. 13, 14.) while David himself was so far from being proud of the services he had done his prince, or ambitious of further preferment, that he not only returned from court to the obscurity of his father's house, but to the care, and toil, and (as it proved, v. 34.) the peril, of keeping his father's sheep. It was the praise of this humility, that it came after he had the honour of a courtier; and the reward of it, that it came before the honour of a conqueror; before honour is humility. Now he had that opportunity of meditation and prayer, and other acts of devotion, which fitted him for what he was destined to, more than all the military exercises of that inglorious camp could do.

II. The orders his father gave him to go visit his brethren in the camp. He did not himself ask leave to go, to satisfy his curiosity, or to gain experience and make observations; but his father sent him on a mean and homely errand, which any of his servants might have done. He must carry some bread and cheese to his brethren, ten loaves with some parched corn for themselves, (v. 17.) and ten cheeses, which it seems, he thought too good for them, but might be acceptable as a present to their colonel, v. 18. David must still be the drudge of the family, though he was to be the greatest ornament of it. He had not so much as an ass, at command, to carry his load, but must take it on his back, and yet run to the camp. Jesse, we thought, was privy to his being anointed, and yet industriously kept him thus mean and obscure, probably, to hide him from the eye of suspicion and envy, knowing that he was anointed to a crown in reversion. He must observe how his brethren fared, whether they were not reduced to short allowance, now that the encampment continued so long, that, if need were, he might send them more provisions. And he must take their pledge, that is, if they had pawned any thing, he must redeem it; take notice of their company, so some observe, whom they associate with, and what sort of life they lead; perhaps David, like Joseph, had formerly brought to his father their evil report, and now he sends him to inquire concerning their manners. See the care of pious parents about their children when they are abroad from them, especially in places of temptation; they are solicitous how they conduct themselves, and particularly what company they keep. Let children think of this, and conduct themselves accordingly, remembering, that, when they are from under their parents' eye, they are still under God's eye.

III. David's dutiful obedience to his father's command. His prudence and care made him be up early, v. 20. and yet not to leave his sheep without a keeper, so faithful was he in a few things, and therefore the fitter to be made ruler over many things; and so well had he learnt to obey, before he pretended to command. God's providence brought him to the camp very seasonably, when both sides had set the battle in array, and, as it should seem, were more likely to come to an engagement than they had yet been, all the forty days, v. 21. Both sides were now preparing to fight. Jesse little thought of sending his son to the army, just at that critical juncture, but the wise God orders the time and all the circumstances of actions and affairs, so as to serve his designs of securing the interests of Israel, and advancing the man after his own heart. Now observe here,

1. How brisk and lively David was, v. 22. What articles he brought, he honestly took care of, and left them with those that had the charge of the bag and baggage; but though he had come a long journey with a great load, he ran into the army, to see what was doing there, and to pay his respects to his brethren. Seest thou a man thus diligent in his business? He is in the way of preferment, he shall stand before kings.

2. How bold and daring the Philistine was, v. 23. Now that the armies were drawn out into a line of battle, he appeared first to renew his challenge, vainly imagining that he was in the eager chase of his own glory and triumph, whereas really he was but courting his own destruction.

3. How timorous and faint-hearted the men of Israel were. Though they had, for forty days together, been used to his haughty looks and threatening language, and, having seen no execution done by either, might have learned to despise both; yet, upon his approach, they fled from him and were sore afraid, v. 24. One Philistine could never thus have chased a thousand Israelites, and put ten thousand to flight, unless their Rock, being treacherously forsaken by them, had only sold them and shut them up, Deut. 32. 30.

4. How high Saul bid for a champion. Though he was the tallest of all the men of Israel, and, if he had not been so, while he kept close to God, might himself have safely taken up the gauntlet which the insolent Philistine threw down, yet the Spirit of the Lord being departed from him, he durst not do it, nor press Jonathan to do it: but whoever will do it, shall have as good preferment as he can give him, v. 25. If the hope of wealth and honour will prevail with any man to expose himself so far, as it is proclaimed, that the bold adventurer, if he come off, shall marry the king's daughter, and have a good portion with her: but, as it should seem, whether he come off or no, his father's house shall be free in Israel, from all toll, tribute, custom, and services to the crown; or shall be ennobled, and advanced to the peerage.

5. How much concerned David was to assert the honour of God and Israel against the impudent challenges of this champion. He asked what reward was promised to him that should slay this Philistine, v. 26. Though he knew already; not because he was ambitious of the honours, but because he would have it taken notice of, and reported to Saul, how much he resented the indignity hereby done to Israel and Israel's God. He might have presumed so far upon his acquaintance and interest at court, as to have gone himself to Saul to offer his service; but his modesty would not let him do that; it was one of his own rules, before it was one of his son's proverbs, Put not forth thyself in the presence of the king, and stand not in the place of great men; (Prov. 25. 6.) yet his zeal put him upon that method which, he hoped, would bring him into this great engagement. Two considerations, it seems, fired David with a holy indignation. (1.) That the challenger was one that was uncircumcised, a stranger to God, and out of covenant with him. (2.) That the challenged were the armies of the living God devoted to him, employed by him and for him, so that the affronts done to them, reflected upon the living God himself, and that he cannot bear. When therefore some had told him, what was the reward proposed for killing the Philistine, (v. 27.) he asked others, (v. 30.) with the same resentment, which he expected would at length come to Saul's ear.

6. How he was brow-beaten and discouraged by his elder brother Eliab, who, taking notice of his forwardness, fell into a passion upon it, and gave David very abusive language, v. 28. Consider it,

(1.) As the fruit of Eliab's jealousy. He was the eldest brother and David the youngest, and, perhaps, it had been customary with him (as it is with too many elder brothers) to trample upon him, and take every occasion to chide him. But those who thus exalt themselves over their juniors, may perhaps live to see themselves, by a righteous providence, abased, and those whom they are abusive to, exalted. Time may come when the elder may serve the younger. But Eliab was now vexed that his younger brother should speak these bold words against the Philistine which he himself durst not say. He knew what honour David had already in the court, and if he should now get him honour in the camp, (from which he thought he had found means effectually to seclude him, v. 15.) the glory of his elder brother would be eclipsed and stained; and therefore, (such is the nature of jealousy,) he would rather that Goliath should triumph over Israel, than that David should be the man that should triumph over him. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous, but who can stand before envy, especially the envy of a brother, which Jacob, and Joseph, and David here, experienced the keenness of? See Prov. 18. 19. It is very ill-favoured language that Eliab here gives him; not only unjust and unkind, but, at this time, basely ungrateful; for David was now sent by his father, as Joseph by his, on a kind visit to his brethren. Eliab intended, in what he said, not only to grieve and discourage David himself, and quench that noble fire which he perceived glowing in his breast, but to represent him to those about him as an idle proud lad, not fit to be taken notice of. He gives them to understand that his business was only to keep sheep, and falsely insinuates that he was a careless, unfaithful, shepherd; though he had left his charge in good hands, v. 20. yet he must tauntingly be asked, With whom hast thou left those few sheep? Though he came down now to the camp in obedience to his father and kindness to his brethren, and Eliab knew it, yet this is turned to his reproach; "Thou art come down, not to do any service, but to gratify thy own curiosity, and only to look about thee;" and from thence he will infer the pride and naughtiness of his heart, and pretends to know it as certainly as if he were in his bosom. David could appeal to God concerning his humility and sincerity, (Ps. 17. 3.—131. 1.) and at this time gave proofs of both, and yet could not escape this hard character from his own brother. See the folly, absurdity, and wickedness, of a proud and envious passion; how groundless its jealousies are, how unjust its censures, how unfair its representations, how bitter its invectives, and how indecent its language. God, by his grace, keep us from such a spirit!

(2.) As a trial of David's meekness, patience, and constancy; a short trial it was, and he approved himself well in it: for, [1.] He bore the provocation with admirable temper; v. 29. "What have I now done? What fault have I committed, for which I should thus be chidden? Is there not a cause for my coming to the camp, when my father sent me? Is there not a cause, for my resenting the injury done to Israel's honour by Goliath's challenge?" He had right and reason on his side, and knew it, and therefore did not render railing for railing, but with a soft answer turned away his brother's wrath. This conquest of his own passion was, in some respects, more honourable than that of Goliath. He that hath rule over his own spirit, is better than the mighty. It was no time for David to quarrel with his brother, when the Philistines were upon them. The more threatening the church's enemies are, the more forbearing her friends should be with one another. [2.] He broke through the discouragement with admirable resolution. He would not be driven off from his thoughts of engaging the Philistine, by the ill-will of his brother. Those that undertake great and public services, must not think it strange if they be discountenanced and opposed by those from whom they had reason to expect support and assistance; but must humbly go on with their work, in the face not only of their enemies' threats, but of their friends' slights and suspicions.

31. And when the words were heard which David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul; and he sent for him. 32. And David said to Saul, Let no man's heart fail because of him: thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine. 33. And Saul said to David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth. 34. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion, and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock; 35. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth: and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and smote him, and slew him. 36. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear; and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God. 37. David said, moreover, The LORD that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, Go, and the LORD be with thee. 38. And Saul armed David with his armour, and he put a helmet of brass upon his head; also he armed him with a coat of mail. 39. And David girded his sword upon his armour, and he assayed to go; for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them. And David put them off him.

David is at length presented to Saul for his champion, (v. 31.) and he bravely undertakes to fight the Philistine; (v. 32.) Let no man's heart fail because of him: it would have reflected too much upon the valour of his prince, if he had said, Let not thy heart fail; therefore he speaks generally, Let no man's heart fail. A little shepherd, come but this morning from keeping sheep, has more courage than all the mighty men of Israel, and encourages them. Thus does God often send good words to his Israel, and do great things for them, by the weak and foolish things of the world. David only desires a commission from Saul to go and fight with the Philistine, but says nothing to him of the reward he had proposed, because that was not the thing he was ambitious of, but only the honour of serving God and his country. nor would he seem to question Saul's generosity.

Two things David had to do with Saul;

I. To get clear of the objection Saul made against his undertaking. "Alas," says Saul, "thou hast a good heart to it; but art by no means an equal match for this Philistine: to engage with him is to throw away a life which may better be reserved for more agreeable services: thou art but a youth, rash and inconsiderate, weak and unversed in arms; he is a man that has the head and hand of a man, a man of war, trained up and inured to it from his youth, (v. 33.) and how canst thou expect but that he will be too hard for thee?"

David, as he had answered his brother's passion with meekness, so he answered Saul's fear with faith, and gives a reason of the hope which was in him, that he should conquer the Philistine to the satisfaction of Saul. We have reason to fear that Saul had no great acquaintance with, or regard to, the word of God, and therefore David, in reasoning with him, fetched not his arguments and encouragements from thence, how much soever he had an eye to that in his own mind: but he argues from experience; though he was but a youth, and never in the wars, yet perhaps he had done as much as the killing of Goliath came to; for he had had, by divine assistance, spirit enough to encounter, and strength enough to subdue, a lion once, and another time a bear, that robbed him of his lambs: (v. 34.—36.) to these he compares this uncircumcised Philistine, looks upon him to be as much a ravenous beast as either of them, and therefore doubts not but to deal as easily with him; and hereby gives Saul to understand, that he was not so unexperienced in hazardous conflicts, as he took him to be.

1. He tells his story like a man of spirit; he is not ashamed to own that he kept his father's sheep, which his brother had just now upbraided him with; so far is he from concealing it, that from his employment as a shepherd, he fetches the experience that now animated him. But he lets those about him know that he was no ordinary shepherd. Whatever our profession or calling is, be it ever so mean, we should labour to excel in it, and do the business of it in the best manner. When David kept sheep, (1.) He approved himself very careful and tender of his flock, though it was not his own, but his father's. He could not see a lamb in distress but he would venture his life to rescue it. This temper made him fit to be a king, to whom the lives of his subjects should be dear, and their blood precious, (Ps. 72. 14.) and fit to be a type of Christ the good Shepherd, who gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, (Isa. 40. 11.) and who not only ventured, but laid down, his life for the sheep. Thus too was David fit to be an example to ministers, with the utmost care and diligence to watch for souls, that they be not a prey to the roaring lion. (2.) He approved himself very bold and brave in the defence of his flock. This was that which he was now concerned to give proof of, and better evidence could not be demanded than this! "Thy servant not only rescued the lambs, but, to revenge the injury, slew both the lion and the bear."

2. He applies his story like a man of faith. He owns (v. 37.) it was the Lord that delivered him from the lion and the bear; to him he gives the praise of that great achievement, and from thence he infers, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. "The lion and the bear were enemies only to me and my sheep, and it was in defence of my own interest that I attacked them; but this Philistine is an enemy to God and Israel, defies the armies of the living God, and it is for their honour that I attack him." Note, (1.) Our experiences ought to be approved by us, as our encouragements to trust in God, and venture in the way of duty. He that has delivered, does and will. (2.) By the care which common Providence takes of the inferior creatures, and the protection they are under, we may be encouraged to depend upon that special Providence which surrounds the Israel of God. He that sets bounds to the waves of the sea and the rage of wild beasts, can and will restrain the wrath of wicked men. St. Paul seems to allude to this of David; (2 Tim. 4. 17, 18.) "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, and therefore, I trust, the Lord shall deliver me." And perhaps David here thought of the story of Samson, and encouraged himself with it; for his slaying of a lion was a happy presage of his many illustrious victories over the Philistines in single combat.

Thus David took off Saul's objection against his undertaking, and gained a commission to fight the Philistine, with which Saul gave him a hearty good wish; since he would not venture himself, he prayed for him that would, Go, and the Lord be with thee; a good word, if it was not spoken customarily, and in a formal manner, as too often it is.

II. But David has somewhat to do likewise, to get clear of the armour wherewith Saul would, by all means, have him dressed up, when he went upon this great action; (v. 38.) He armed David with his armour; not that which he wore himself, the disproportion of his stature would not admit that, but some that he kept in his armoury; little thinking that he on whom he now put his helmet and coat of mail must shortly inherit his crown and robe. David being not yet resolved which way to attack his enemy, girded on his sword, not knowing, as yet, but he should have occasion to make use of it; but he found the armour would but incumber him, and would be rather his burthen than his defence, and therefore he desires leave of Saul to put them off again; I cannot go with these, for I have not proved them, that is, "I have never been accustomed to such accoutrements as these." We may suppose Saul's armour to be very fine and very firm; but what good would it do David, if it were not fit, or if he knew not how to manage himself in it? Those that aim at things above their education and usage, and covet the attire and armour of princes, forget that that is the best for us, which we are fit for and accustomed to; if we had our desire, we should wish to be in our own coat again, and should say, "We cannot go with these;" we had therefore better go without them.

40. And he took his staff in his hand, and chose him five smooth stones out of the brook, and put them in a shepherd's bag which he had, even in a scrip; and his sling was in his hand: and he drew near to the Philistine. 41. And the Philistine came on, and drew near unto David; and the man that bare the shield went before him. 42. And when the Philistine looked about and saw David, he disdained him; for he was but a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance. 43. And the Philistine said unto David, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And the Philistine cursed David by his gods. 44. And the Philistine said to David, Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field. 45. Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield but I come to thee in the name of the LORD of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. 46. This day will the LORD deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcases of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel. 47. And all this assembly shall know that the LORD saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the LORD's, and he will give you into our hands.

We are now coming near this famous combat, and have in these verses, the preparations and remonstrances made on both sides.

I. The preparations made on both sides for the encounter. The Philistine was already fixed, as he had been daily for the last forty days; well might he go with his armour, for he had sufficiently proved it. Only we are told, (v. 41.) that he came on and drew near; a signal, it is likely, being given that his challenge was accepted, and as if he trusted his helmet and coat of mail, a man went before him, carrying his shield; for his own hands are full with his sword and spear, v. 45. But what arms and ammunition is David furnished with? Truly none but what he brought with him as a shepherd; no breast-plate, or corselet, but his plain shepherd's coat; no spear, but his staff; no sword or bow, but his sling; no quiver, but his scrip; nor any arrows, but, instead of them, five smooth stones picked out of the brook, v. 40. By this it appeared that his confidence was purely in the power of God, and not in any sufficiency of his own, and that, now at length, he who put it into his heart to fight the Philistine, put it into his head with what weapons to do it.

II. The conference which precedes the encounter. In which observe,

1. How very proud Goliath was. (1.) With what scorn he looked upon his adversary, v. 42. He looked about, expecting to meet some tall strong man; but when he saw what a mean figure he made with whom he was to engage, he disdained him, thought it below him to enter the lists with him, fearing that the contemptibleness of the champion he contended with would lessen the glory of his victory. He took notice of his person, that he was but a youth, not come to his strength, ruddy and of a fair countenance, fitter to accompany the virgins of Israel in their dances, (if mixed dancing was then in use,) than to lead on the men of Israel in their battles. He took notice of his array with great indignation; (v. 43.) "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" Dost thou think to beat me as easily as thou dost thy shepherd's dog?" (2.) With what confidence he presumed upon his success. He cursed David by his gods, imprecating the impotent vengeance of his idols against him, thinking those fire-balls thrown about him would secure him success: and therefore, in confidence of that, he darts his menaces, as if threatening words would kill; (v. 44.) "Come to me, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air;" it will be a tender and delicate feast for them." Thus the security and presumption of fools destroy them.

2. How very pious David was. His speech savours nothing of ostentation, but God is all in all in it, v. 45-47.

(1.) He derives his authority from God. "I come to thee, by warrant and commission from heaven, in the name of the Lord, who has called me to, and animated me for, this undertaking; who, by his universal providence, is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts; and therefore has power to do what he pleases; and, by the special grace of his covenant, is the God of the armies of Israel, and therefore has engaged, and will employ, his power for their protection, and against thee who hast impiously defied them." The name of God David relied on, as Goliath did on his sword and spear. See Ps. 20. 7.—118. 10, 11.

(2.) He depends for success upon God, v. 46. David speaks with as much assurance as Goliath had done, but upon better ground; it is his faith that says, "This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand;" and not only thy carcase, but the carcasses of the host of the Philistines, shall be given to the birds and beasts of prey."

(3.) He devotes the praise and glory of all to God. He did not, like Goliath, seek his own honour, but the honour of God; not doubting but by the success of this action, [1.] All the world should be made to know that there is a God, and that the God of Israel is the one only living and true God, and all other pretended deities are vanity and a lie. [2.] All Israel (whom he calls not this army, but this assembly, or church, because they were now religiously attending the goings of their God and King, as they used to do in the sanctuary) all Israel shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear, (v. 47.) but can, when he pleases, save without either and against both, Ps. 46. 9. David addresses himself to this combat rather as a priest that was going to offer a sacrifice to the justice of God, than as a soldier that was going to engage an enemy of his country.

43. And it came to pass, when the Philistine arose, and came and drew nigh to meet David, that David hasted, and ran toward the army to meet the Philistine. 49. And David put his hand into his bag, and took thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead, that the stone sunk into his forehead; and he fell upon his face to the earth. 50. So David prevailed over the Philistine with a sling and with a stone, and smote the Philistine, and slew him; but there was no sword in the hand of David. 51. Therefore David ran, and stood upon the Philistine, and took his sword, and drew it out of the sheath thereof, and slew him, and cut off his head therewith. And when the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they fled. 52. And the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted, and pursued the Philistines, until thou come to the valley, and to the gates of Ekron: and the wounded of the Philistines fell down by the way to Shaaraim, even unto Gath, and unto Ekron. 53. And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and they spoiled their tents. 54. And David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem: but he put his armour in his tent. 55. And when Saul saw David go forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of the host, Abner, whose son is this youth? And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell. 56. And the king said, Inquire thou whose son the stripling is. 57. And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him, and brought him before Saul, with the head of the Philistine in his hand. 58. And Saul said to him, Whose son art thou, thou young man? And David answered, I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite.

Here is, 1. The engagement between the two champions, v. 48. To this engagement, (1.) The Philistine advanced with a great deal of state and gravity: if he must encounter a pigmy, yet it shall be with the magnificence of a giant and a grandee. This is intimated in the manner of expression. He arose, and came, and drew nigh, like a stalking mountain, overlaid with brass and iron, to meet David. (2.) David advanced with no less activity and cheerfulness, as one that aimed more to do execution, than to make a figure; he hasted, and ran, being lightly clad, to meet the Philistine. We may imagine with what tenderness and compassion the Israelites saw such a pleasing youth as this, throwing himself into the mouth of destruction; but he knew whom he had believed, and for whom he acted.

2. The fall of Goliath in this engagement. He was in no haste, because in no fear, but confident that he should soon at one stroke cleave his adversary's head: but while he was preparing to do it solemnly, David did his business effectually, without any parade; he slung a stone which hit in the forehead, and, in the twinkling of an eye, fetched him to the ground, v. 49. He knew there were famous slingers in Israel, (Judg. 20. 16.) yet was either so forgetful or presumptuous, as to go with the beaver of his helmet open, and thither, to the only part left exposed, not so much David's art, as God's providence, directed the stone, and brought it with such force that it sunk into his head, notwithstanding the impudence with which his forehead was brazened. See how frail and uncertain life is, even then when it thinks itself best fortified, and how quickly, how easily, and with how small a matter, the passage may be opened for life to go out and death to enter. Goliath himself has not power over the spirit to retain the spirit, Eccl. 8. 8. Let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor the armed man in his armour. See how God resists the proud, and pours contempt upon those that bid defiance to him and his people. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. One of the rabbins thinks, that when Goliath said to David, Come, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, he drew up his head so hastily, that his helmet fell off, and so left his broad forehead a fair mark for David. To complete the execution, he drew Goliath's own sword, a two-handed weapon for David, and with it cut off his head, v. 51. What need had David to take a sword of his own? His enemy's sword shall serve his purpose, when he has occasion for one. God is greatly glorified, when his proud enemies are cut off with their own sword, and he makes their own tongues to fall upon them, Ps. 64. 8. David's victory over Goliath was typical of the triumphs of the Son of David over Satan and all the powers of darkness, whom he spoiled, and made a show of them openly; (Col. 2. 15.) and we through him are more than conquerors.

3. The defeat of the Philistines' army hereupon, They relied wholly upon the strength of their champion, and therefore, when they saw him slain, they did not, as Goliath had offered, throw down their arms and surrender themselves servants to Israel, (v. 9.) but took flight, being wholly dispirited, and thinking it to no purpose to oppose one before whom such a mighty man was fallen: they fled, (v. 51.) and this put life into the Israelites; they shouted and pursued them, v. 52. David, it is probable, leading them on in the pursuit, even to the gates of their own cities. In their return from the chase, they seized all their baggage, plundered their tents, (v. 53.) and enriched themselves with the spoil.

4. David's disposal of his trophies, v. 54. He brought the head of the Philistine to Jerusalem, to be a terror to the Jebusites, who held the stronghold of Zion: it is probable that he carried it in triumph to other cities; his armour he laid up in his tent; only the sword was preserved behind the ephod in the tabernacle as consecrated to God, and a memorial of the victory to his honour, ch. 21. 9.

5. The notice that was taken of David. Though he had been at court formerly, yet, having been for some time absent, (v. 15.) Saul had forgotten him, being melancholy and mindless, and little thinking that his musician should have spirit enough to be his champion; and therefore, as if he had never seen him before, he asked whose son he was. Abner was a stranger to him, but brought him to Saul himself, (v. 57.) and he gave a modest account of himself, v. 58. And now he was introduced to the court with much greater advantages than before; in which he owned God's hand performing all things for him.

CHAP. XVIII.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we left David in triumph; now in this chapter we have, 1. The improvement of his triumphs; he soon became, 1. Saul's constant attendant, v. 2. 2. Jonathan's covenant friend, v. 1, 3, 4. 3. The darling of his country, v. 5, 7, 16. 11. The allays of his triumphs. This is the vanity that accompanies even a right work, that for it a man is envied, Eccl. 4. 4. So David was by Saul, 1. He hated him, and sought to kill him himself, v. 8. 11. 2. He feared him, and contrived how he might have some mischief done him, v. 12. 17. Proposed to marry his daughter to him; but, (1.) Cheated him of the eldest to provoke him, (v. 19.) and, (2.) Gave him the younger, upon conditions which would endanger his life, v. 20. 25. But David performed his conditions bravely, (v. 26, 27.) and grew to be more and more esteemed, v. 28. 30. Still David is rising, but (as all that aim at the crown of life must expect) he had a great deal of difficulty and opposition to grapple with.

1. AND it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David; and Jonathan loved him as his own soul. 2. And Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house. 3. Then Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul. 4. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle. 5. And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, and behaved himself wisely: and Saul set him over the men of war; and he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.

David was anointed to the crown, to take it out of Saul's hand, and over Jonathan's head; and yet here we find,

I. That Saul, who was now in possession of the crown, reposed a confidence in him, God so ordering it, that he might by his preferment at court be prepared for future service. Saul now took him home with him, and would not suffer him to return again to his retirement, v. 2. And David having signalized himself above the men of war, in taking up the challenge which they declined, Saul set him over the men of war; (v. 5.) not that he made him general, Abner was in that post, but perhaps captain of the life-guard; or, though he was youngest, he ordered him to have the precedence, in recompense of his great services. He employed him in the affairs of government; and David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, showing himself as dutiful as he was bold and courageous. Those that hope to rule, must first learn to obey. He had approved himself a dutiful son to Jesse his father, and now a dutiful servant to Saul his master; those that are good in one relation, it is to be hoped will be so in another.

II. That Jonathan, who was heir to the crown, entered into covenant with him: God so ordering it, that David's way might be the clearer, when his rival was his friend.

I. Jonathan conceived an extraordinary kindness and affection for him, v. 1. When he had made an end of speaking to Saul, he fell perfectly in love with him. Whether it refers to his conference with Saul before the battle, (ch. 17. 34.. 37.) or to that after, (v. 53.) in which it is probable much more was said than is there set down, is uncertain. But in both David expressed himself with so much prudence, modesty, and piety, such a felicity of expression, with so much boldness and yet so much sweetness, and all this so natural and unaffected, and the more surprising because of the disadvantages of his education and appearance, that the soul of Jonathan was immediately knit unto the soul of David. Jonathan had formerly set upon a Philistine army with the same faith and bravery that David had now attacked a Philistine giant: so that there was between them a very near resemblance of affections, dispositions, and counsels, which made their spirits unite so easily, so quickly, so closely, that they seemed but as one soul in two bodies. None had so much reason to dislike David as Jonathan had, because he was to put him by the crown, yet none regards him more. Those that are governed in their love by principles of wisdom and grace, will not suffer their affections to be alienated by any secular regards or considerations: the greater thoughts will swallow up and overrule the lesser.

2. He testified his love to David by a generous present he made him, v. 4. He was concerned to see so great a soul, though lodged in so fair a body, yet disguised in the mean and despicable dress of a poor shepherd, and therefore takes care to put him speedily into the habit of a courtier, for he gave him a robe, and of a soldier, for he gave him, instead of his staff and sling, a sword and bow, and, instead of his shepherd's scrip, a girdle, either a belt or a sash; and, which made the present much more obliging, they were the same that he himself had worn, and (as a presage of what would follow) he stripped himself of them to dress David in them. Saul's would not fit him, but Jonathan's did; their bodies were of a size, a circumstance which well agreed with the suitableness of their minds. When Saul put these marks of honour on David, he put them off again, because he would first earn them, and then wear them; but now that he had given proofs of the spirit of a prince and soldier, he was not ashamed to wear the habits of a prince and soldier. David is seen in Jonathan's clothes, that all may take notice he is Jonathan's second self. Our Lord Jesus had thus showed his love to us, that he stripped himself to clothe us, emptied himself to enrich us; nay he did more than Jonathan, he clothed himself with our rags, whereas Jonathan did not put on David's.

3. He endeavoured the perpetuating of his friendship: so entirely satisfied were they in each other, even at the first interview, that they made a covenant with each other, v. 3. Their mutual affection was sincere; and he that bears an honest mind startles not at assurances. True love desires to be constant. Those who love Christ as their own souls, will be willing to join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant.

III. That both court and country agree to bless him: it is but seldom that they agree in their favourites; yet David was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also (which was strange) in the sight of Saul's servants, v. 5. The former cordially loved him, the latter could not for shame but caress and compliment him. And it was certainly a great instance of the power of God's grace in David, that he was able to bear all this respect and honour flowing in upon him of a sudden, without being lifted up above measure. Those that climb so fast, have need of good heads and good hearts: it is harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased.

6. And it came to pass, as they came, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, that the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet king Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music. 7. And the women answered one another as they played, and said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. 8. And Saul was very wroth, and the saying displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands: and what can he have more but the kingdom? 9. And Saul eyed David from that day and forward. 10. And it came to pass, on the morrow, that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied in the midst of the house; and David played with his hand, as at other times: and there was a javelin in Saul's hand. 11. And Saul cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it. And David avoided out of his presence twice.

Now begin David's troubles, and they not only tread on the heels of his triumphs, but take rise from them; such is the vanity of that in this world which seems greatest.

I. He was too much magnified by the common people. Sometime after the victory, Saul went a triumphant progress through the cities of Israel that lay next him, to receive the congratulations of the country. And when he made his public entry into any place, the women were most forward to show him respect, as was usual then in public triumphs, v. 6. and they had got a song, it seems, which they sang in their dances, (made by some poet or other, that was a great admirer of David's bravery, and was more just than wise, in giving his achievements in the late action the preference before Saul's,) the burthen of which was, Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. Such a difference as this, Moses made between the numbers of Ephraim and Manassch, Deut. 33. 17.

II. This mightily displeased Saul, and made him envy David, v. 3, 9. He ought to have considered that they referred only to this late action, and intended not to diminish any of Saul's former exploits; and that in the action now celebrated, it was undeniably true, that David, in killing Goliath, did, in effect, slay all the Philistines that were slain that day, and defeated the whole army; so that they did but give David his due: it may be, he that composed the song, only used a poetical liberty, and intended not any invidious comparison between Saul and David; or, if he did, it was below the great mind of a prince to take notice of such a reflection upon his personal honour, when it appeared that the glory of the public was sincerely intended. But Saul was very wroth, and presently suspected some treasonable design at the bottom of it: What can he have more but the kingdom? This made him eye David, as one he was jealous of, and sought advantages against; (v. 9.) his countenance was not toward him as it had been. Proud men cannot endure to hear any praised but themselves, and think all the honour lost that goes by themselves. It is a sign that the Spirit of God is departed from men, if they be peevish in their resentment of affronts, envious and suspicious of all about them, and ill-natured in their conduct; for the wisdom from above makes us quite otherwise.

III. In his fury he aimed to kill David, v. 10, 11. Jealousy is the rage of a man; it made Saul outrageous against David, and impatient to get him out of the way.

1. His fits of phrensy returned upon him. The very next day after he conceived malice against David, the evil spirit from God, that had formerly haunted him, seized him again. Those that indulge themselves in envy and uncharitableness, give place to the Devil, and prepare for the re-entry of the unclean spirit, with seven others more wicked. Where envy is, there is confusion. Saul pretended a religious ecstasy; he prophesied in the midst of the house; that is, he had the gestures and notions of a prophet, and humoured the thing well enough to decoy David into a snare, and that he might be fearless of any danger, and off his guard; and, perhaps, designing, if he could but kill him, to impute it to a divine impulse, and to charge it upon the spirit of prophecy with which he seemed to be animated; but really it was a hellish fury that actuated him.

2. David, though advanced to a much higher post of honour, disdained not, for his master's service, to return to his harp; he played with his hand, as at other times. Let not the highest think any thing below them, whereby they may do good, and be serviceable to those they are obliged to.

3. He took this opportunity to endeavour the death of David. A sword in a madman's hand is a dangerous thing, especially such a madman as Saul was, that was mad with malice. Yet he had a javelin or dart in his hand, with which he projected and endeavoured to slay David; not in a sudden passion, but deliberately: I will smite David to the wall with it; with such a desperate force did he throw it. Justly does David complain of his enemies, that they hated him with a cruel hatred, Ps. 25. 19. No life is thought too precious to be sacrificed to malice. If a grateful sense of the great service David had done to the public could not assuage Saul's fury, yet one would think he should have allowed himself to consider the kindness he was now doing to himself, relieving him, so as no one else could, against the worst of troubles. Those are possessed with a devilish spirit indeed, that render evil for good. Compare David, with his harp in his hand, aiming to serve Saul, and Saul, with his javelin in his hand, aiming to slay David; and observe the sweetness and usefulness of God's persecuted people, and the brutishness and barbarity of their persecutors. The blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul, Prov. 29. 10.

4. David happily avoided the blow twice, namely, now, and afterwards, ch. 19. 10. He did not throw the javelin at Saul again; he withdrew, not fighting, but flying, for his own preservation. Though he had both strength and courage enough, and colour of right, to make resistance and revenge the injury, yet he did no more than secure himself, by getting out of the way of it. David, no doubt, had a watchful eye upon Saul's hand, and the javelin in it, and did as bravely in running from it, as he did lately in running upon Goliath. Yet his safety must be ascribed to the watchful eye of God's providence upon him, saving his servant from the hurtful sword; and by this narrow escape it seemed he was designed for something extraordinary.

12. And Saul was afraid of David, because the LORD was with him, and was departed from Saul. 13. Therefore Saul removed him from him, and made him his captain over a thousand: and he went out and came in before the people. 14. And David behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and the LORD was with him. 15. Wherefore, when Saul saw that he behaved himself very wisely, he was afraid of him. 16. But all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went out and came in before them. 17. And Saul said to David, Behold, my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife; only be thou valiant for me, and fight the LORD's battles: for Saul said, Let not mine hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him. 18. And David said unto Saul, Who am I? and what is my life, or my father's family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the king? 19. But it came to pass, at the time when Merab, Saul's daughter, should have been given to David, that she was given unto Adriel the Meholathite to wife. 20. And Michal, Saul's daughter, loved David: and they told Saul, and the thing pleased him. 21. And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him, and that the hand of the Philistines may be against him. Wherefore Saul said to David, Thou shalt this day be my son-in-law in the one of the twain. 22. And Saul commanded his servants, saying, Commune with David secretly, and say, Behold, the king hath delight in thee, and all his servants love thee: now, therefore, be the king's son-in-law. 23. And Saul's servants spake those words in the ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed? 24. And the servants of Saul told him, saying, On this manner spake David. 25. And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines, to be avenged of the king's enemies. But Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines. 26. And when his servants told David these words, it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law: and the days were not expired. 27. Wherefore David arose, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two hundred men; and David brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law. And Saul gave him Michal his daughter to wife. 28. And Saul saw and knew that the LORD was with David, and that Michal, Saul's daugh ter, loved him. 29. And Saul was yet the more afraid of David; and Saul became David's enemy continually. 30. Then the princes of the Philistines went forth: and it came to pass, after they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul; so that his name was much set by.

Saul had now, in effect, proclaimed war with David; he began in open hostility, when he threw the javelin at him; now we are here told, how his enmity proceeded, and how David received the attack of it.

I. See how Saul expressed his malice against David.

1. He was afraid of him, v. 12. Perhaps he pretended to be afraid that David would do him mischief, to force his way to the crown. Those that design ill against others, are commonly willing to have it thought that others design ill against them; but David's withdrawing, (v. 11.) was a plain evidence that he was far from such a thought. However, he really stood in awe of him, as Herod feared John, Mark 6. 20. Saul was sensible he had lost the favourable presence of God himself, and that David had it, and for this reason, he feared him. Note, Those are truly great and to be revered, that have God with them. The more wisely David behaved himself, the more Saul feared him, v. 15. and again, v. 29. Men think the way to be feared, is, to hector and threaten, which makes them feared by fools only, but despised by the wise and good; whereas the way to be both feared and loved, feared by those to whom we would wish to be a terror, and loved by those to whom we would wish to be a delight, is, to behave ourselves wisely. Wisdom makes the face to shine, and commands respect.

2. He removed him from court, and gave him a regiment in the country, v. 13. He made him captain over a thousand, that he might be from under his eye, because he hated the sight of him; and that he might not secure the interest of the courtiers. Yet herein he did impolitically; for he gave David an opportunity of ingratiating himself with the people, who therefore loved him, (v. 16.) because he went out and came in before them; that is, he presided in the business of his country, civil as well as military, and gave universal satisfaction.

3. He stirred him up to take all occasions of quarrelling with the Philistines and engaging them, (v. 17.) insinuating to him, that hereby he would do good service to his prince, Be thou valiant for me; and good service to his God, Fight the Lord's battles; and a kindness to himself too, for hereby he would qualify himself for the honour he designed him, which was to marry his eldest daughter to him. This he had merited by killing Goliath, for it was promised by proclamation to him that should do that exploit; (ch. 17. 25.) but David was so modest, as not to demand it, and now, when Saul proposed it, it was with design of mischief to him, to make him venture upon hazardous attempts, saying in his heart, Let the hand of the Philistines be upon him, hoping they would sometime or other be the death of him, yet how could he expect this, when he saw that God was with him?

4. He did what he could to provoke him to discontent and mutiny, by breaking his promise with him, and giving his daughter to another, when the time was come that she should have been given to him, v. 19. This was as great an affront as he could possibly put upon him, and touched him both in his honour and in his love: he therefore thought David's resentments of it would break out in some indecency or other, in word or deed, which might give him an advantage against him to take him off by course of law. Thus evil men seek mischief.

5. When he was disappointed in this, he proffered him his other daughter, (who it seems had a secret kindness for David, v. 20.) but with this design, that she might be a snare to him, v. 21. (1.) Perhaps he hoped that she would, even after her marriage to David, take part with her father against her husband, and give him an opportunity of doing him an unkindness. However, (2.) The condition of the marriage, he hoped, would be his destruction; for (so zealous will Saul seem against the Philistines) the conditions of the marriage must be, that he killed a hundred Philistines, and, as proofs that those he had slain were uncircumcised, he must bring in their foreskins cut off; this would be a just reproach upon the Philistines, who hated circumcision, as it was an ordinance of God; and perhaps David, in doing this, would the more exasperate them against him, and make them seek to be revenged on him, which was the thing that Saul desired and designed, much more than to be avenged on the Philistines: For Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines, v. 25. See here, [1.] What cheats bad men put upon themselves. Saul's conscience would not suffer him, except when the evil spirit was actually upon him, to aim at David's life himself, for even he could not but conceive horror at the thought of murdering such an innocent and excellent person; but he thought that to expose him to the Philistines had nothing bad in it; Let not my hand be upon him, but the hand of the Philistines; whereas the malicious design against him was as truly murder before God, as if he had slain him with his own hands. [2.] What cheats they put upon the world. Saul pretended extraordinary kindness for David, even then when he aimed at his ruin, and was actually plotting it: Thou shalt be my Son-in-law, says he, (v. 21.) notwithstanding he hated him implacably. Perhaps David refers to this, when (Ps. 55. 21.) he speaks of his enemy, as one whose words were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart. It is probable that Saul's employing his servants to persuade David to enter into a treaty of a match with his daughter Michal, (v. 22.) arose from an apprehension that either his having cheated him about his elder daughter, (v. 19.) or the hardness of the terms he intended now to propose, would make him decline it.

II. See how David conducted himself, when the tide of Saul's displeasure ran thus high against him.

1. He behaved himself wisely in all his ways, v. 14. He perceived Saul's jealousy of him, which made him very cautious and circumspect in every thing he said and did, and careful to give no offence. He did not complain of hard measure, nor make himself the head of a party, but managed all the affairs he was intrusted with, as one that made it his business to do real service to his king and country, looking upon that to be the end of his preferment. And then the Lord was with him to give him success in all his undertakings. Though he contracted Saul's ill-will by it, yet he obtained God's favour. Compare this with Ps. 101. 2. where it is David's promise, I will behave myself wisely; and that promise he here performed; and it is his prayer, O! when wilt thou come unto me? And that prayer God here answered, the Lord was with him. However blind Fortune may seem to favour fools, God will own and bless those that behave themselves wisely.

2. When it was proposed to him to be son-in-law to the king, he once and again received the proposal with all possible modesty and humility. When Saul proposed his eldest daughter to him, (v. 18.) he said, Who am I, and what is my life? When the courtiers proposed the younger, he took no notice of the affront Saul had given him in disposing of the elder from him, but continued in the same mind; (v. 23.) Seemeth it a light thing to you to be a king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man and lightly esteemed? He knew Michal loved him, and yet did not offer to improve his interest in her affections, for the gaining of her without her father's consent, but waited till it was proposed to him. And then see, (1.) How highly he speaks of the honour offered him. To be son-in-law to the king! Though the king was but an upstart, in his original as mean as himself, in his management no better than he should be, yet, being a crowned head, he speaks of him and the royal family with all due respect. Note, Religion is so far from teaching us, that it does not allow us to be rude and unmannerly. We must render honour to whom honour is due. (2.) How humbly he speaks of himself. Who am I? This did not proceed from a mean, abject, sneaking spirit, for when there was occasion, he made it appear that he had as high a sense of honour as most men; nor was it from his jealousy of Saul, (though he had reason enough to fear a snake under the green grass,) but from his true and deep humility. Who am I? A poor man and lightly esteemed! David had as much reason as any man to value himself. He was of an ancient and honourable family of Judah, a comely person, a great statesman and soldier; his achievements were great, for he had won Goliath's head and Michal's heart: he knew himself destined by the divine counsels to the throne of Israel, and yet, Who am I, and what is my life? Note, It well becomes us, however God has advanced us, always to have low thoughts of ourselves. He that humbleth himself, shall be exalted. And if David thus magnified the honour of being son-in-law to the king, how should we magnify the honour of being sons (not in law, but in gospel) to the King of kings! Behold what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us! Who are we, that we should be thus dignified?

3. When the slaying of a hundred Philistines was made the condition of David's marrying Saul's daughter, he readily closed with it; (v. 26.) it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law upon those terms; and before the time given him for the action was expired, he doubled the demand, and slew two hundred, v. 27. He would not seem to suspect that Saul designed his hurt by it, (though he had reason enough,) but rather, he would act as if Saul had meant to consult his honour, and therefore cheerfully undertook it, as became a brave soldier and a true lover, though we may suppose it uneasy to Michal. David hereby discovered likewise, (1.) A great confidence in the divine protection; he knew God was with him, and therefore, whatever Saul hoped, David did not fear falling by the Philistines, though he must needs expose himself much by such an undertaking as this. (2.) A great zeal for the good of his country, which he would not decline any occasion of doing service to, though with the hazard of his life. (3.) A right notion of honour, which consists not so much in being preferred, as in deserving to be so. David was then pleased with the thoughts of being the king's son-in-law, when he found the honour set at this high price; being more solicitous how to merit it, than how to obtain it; nor could he wear it with satisfaction, till he had won it.

4. Even after he was married, he continued his good services to Israel. When the princes of the Philistines began to move towards another war, David was ready to oppose them, and behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, v. 30. The law dispensed with men from going to war the first year after they were married, (Deut. 24. 5.) but David loved his country too well to make use of that dispensation. Many that have showed themselves forward to serve the public when they have been in pursuit of preferment, have declined it when they have gained their point; but David acted from more generous principles.

Lastly, Observe how God brought good to David out of Saul's projects against him. 1. Saul gave him his daughter to be a snare to him, but, in this respect, that marriage was a kindness to him, that his being Saul's son-in-law, made his succeeding him much the less invidious, especially when so many of his sons were slain with him, ch. 31. 2. Saul thought, by putting him upon dangerous services, to have him taken off, but that very thing confirmed his interest in the people; for the more he did against the Philistines, the better they loved him, so that his name was much set by, (v. 30.) which would make his coming to the crown the more easy. Thus God makes even the wrath of man to praise him, and serves his designs of kindness to his own people by it.

CHAP. XIX.

Immediately after David's marriage, which should have secured him Saul's affection, we find his troubles coming upon him faster than ever, and Saul's enmity to him the cause of all. His death was vowed, and four fair escapes of his from the hurtful sword of Saul, we have an account of in this chapter. The first by the prudent mediation of Jonathan, v. 1..7. The second by his own quickness, v. 8..10. The third by Michal's fidelity, v. 11..17. The fourth by Samuel's protection, and a change, for the present, wrought upon Saul, v. 18..24. Thus God has many ways of preserving his people. Providence is never at a loss.

1. AND Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David. 2. But Jonathan, Saul's son, delighted much in David: and Jonathan told David, saying, Saul my father seeketh to kill thee. Now, therefore, I pray thee, take heed to thyself until the morning, and abide in a secret place, and hide thyself: 3. And I will go out and stand beside my father in the field where thou art, and I will commune with my father of thee; and what I see, that I will tell thee. 4. And Jonathan spake good of David unto Saul his father, and said unto him, Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and because his works have been to thee-ward very good. 5. For he did put his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine, and the LORD wrought a great salvation for all Israel: thou sawest it, and didst rejoice; wherefore then wilt thou sin against innocent blood, to slay David without a cause? 6. And Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan: and Saul sware, As the LORD liveth, he shall not be slain. 7. And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan showed him all those things: and Jonathan brought David to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past.

Saul and Jonathan appear here in their different characters, with reference to David.

I. Never was enemy so unreasonably cruel as Saul. He spake to his son and all his servants, that they should kill David, v. 1. His projects to take him off, had failed, and therefore he proclaims him an outlaw, and charges all about him, upon their allegiance, to take the first opportunity to kill David. It is strange that he was not ashamed thus to avow his malice, when he could give no reason for it; and that, knowing that all his servants loved him, for so he had said himself, (ch. 18. 22.) he was not afraid of provoking them to rebel by this bloody order. Either malice was not then so politic, or justice was not so corrupted, as it has been since, or else Saul would have had him indicted, and have suborned witnesses to swear treason against him, and so have had him taken off, as Naboth was, by colour of law: but there is least danger from this undesigned malice. It was strange that he who knew how well Jonathan loved him, should expect him to kill him; but he thought, because he was heir to the crown, he must needs be as envious at David as himself was. And Providence ordered it thus, that he might befriend David's safety.

II. He was friend so surprisingly kind as Jonathan, A friend in need is a friend indeed: such a one Jonathan was to David. He not only continued to delight much in him, though David's glory eclipsed his, but bravely appeared for him now that the stream ran so strong against him.

1. He took care for his present security, by letting him know his danger; (v. 2.) "Take heed to thyself, and keep out of harm's way." Jonathan knew not but some of the servants might be either so obsequious to Saul, or so envious at David, as to put the orders into execution which Saul had given, if they could light on David.

2. He took pains to pacify his father and reconcile him to David. The next morning, he ventured to commune with him concerning David; (v. 3.) not that night, either because he observed Saul to be drunk, and not fit to be spoken to, or because he hoped that, when he had slept upon it, he would himself revoke the order, or because he could not have an opportunity of speaking to him till morning. His intercession for David was, (1.) Very prudent. It was managed with a great deal of the meekness of wisdom; and he showed himself faithful to his friend by speaking good of him, though he was in danger of incurring his father's displeasure by it. A rare instance of valuable friendship! He pleads, [1.] The good services David had done to the public, and particularly to Saul; His work has been to thee-ward very good, v. 4. Witness the relief he had given him against his distemper with his harp, and his bold encounter with Goliath, that memorable action, which did, in effect, save Saul's life and kingdom; he appeals to himself concerning that, Thou thyself sawest it, and didst rejoice. In that, and other instances, it appeared that David was a favourite of Heaven and a friend to Israel, as well as a good servant to Saul, for by him the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel; so that to order him to be slain, was not only base ingratitude to so good a servant, but a great affront to God, and a great injury to the public. [2.] He pleads his innocence: though he had formerly done many good offices, yet if he had now been chargeable with any crimes, it had been another matter, but he has not sinned against thee; (v. 4.) his blood is innocent,

(v. 5.) and if he be slain, it is without cause. And Jonathan had therefore reason to protest against it, because he could not entail any thing upon his family more pernicious than the guilt of innocent blood. (2.) His intercession, being thus prudent, was prevalent. God inclined the heart of Saul to hearken to the voice of Jonathan. Note, We must be willing to hear reason, and to take all reproof and good advice even from our inferiors; parents from their own children. How forcible are right words! Saul was, for the present, so far convinced of the unreasonableness of his enmity to David, that, [1.] He recalled the bloody warrant for his execution; (v. 6.) As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain. Whether Saul swore here with due solemnity or no, does not appear; perhaps he did, and the matter was of such moment as to deserve it, and of such uncertainty as to need it; but, at other times, Saul swore rashly and profanely, which made the sincerity of this oath justly questionable: for it may be feared that those who can so far jest with an oath as to make a by-word of it, and prostitute it to a trifle, have not such a due sense of the obligation of it, but that, to serve a turn, they will prostitute it to a lie. Some suspect that Saul said and swore this with a malicious design to bring David within his reach again, intending to take the first opportunity to slay him: but as bad as Saul was, we can scarcely think so ill of him; and therefore we suppose that he spake as he thought, for the present, but the convictions soon wore off, and his corruptions prevailed and triumphed over them.

[2.] He renewed the grant of his place at court. Jonathan brought him to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past, (v. 7.) hoping that now the storm was over, and that his friend Jonathan would be instrumental to keep his father always in this good mind.

8. And there was war again: and David went out and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter; and they fled from him. 9. And the evil spirit from the LORD was upon Saul, as he sat in his house with his javelin in his hand: and David played with his hand. 10. And Saul sought to smite David even to the wall with the javelin; but he slipped away out of Saul's presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall: and David fled, and escaped that night.

Here,

I. David continues his good services to his king and country. Though Saul had requited him evil for good, and even his usefulness was the very thing for which Saul envied him, yet he did not therefore retire in sullenness, and decline public service. Those that are ill paid for doing good, yet must not be weary in well-doing, remembering what a bountiful Benefactor our heavenly Father is, even to the froward and unthankful.

Notwithstanding the many affronts Saul had given to David, yet we find him, (1.) As bold as ever in using his sword for the service of his country, v. 8. The war broke out again with the Philistines, which gave David occasion again to signalize himself: it was with a great deal of bravery that he charged them; he came off victorious, slaying many, and putting the rest to flight. (2.) As cheerful as ever in using his harp for the service of his prince. When Saul was disturbed with his former fits of melancholy, David played with his hand, v. 9. He might have pleaded that that was a piece of service now below him; but an humble good man will think nothing below him by which he may do good. He might have objected the danger he was in the last time he did this office for Saul, ch. 18. 10. But he had learned to render good for evil, and to trust God with his safety in the way of his duty. See how David was affected when his enemy was sick; (Ps. 35. 13, 14.) which, perhaps, refers to Saul's sickness.

2. Saul continues his malice against David. He that but the other day had sworn by his Maker, that he should not be slain, now endeavours to slay him himself. So implacable, so incurable, is the enmity of the seed of the serpent against that of the woman; so deceitful and desperately wicked is the heart of man without the grace of God, Jer. 17. 9. The fresh honours David had won in this last war with the Philistines, instead of extinguishing Saul's ill-will to him, and confirming his reconciliation, revived his envy and exasperated him yet more. And when he indulged this wicked passion, no marvel that the evil spirit came upon him; (v. 9.) for when we let the sun go down on our wrath, we give place to the devil, (Eph. 4. 26, 27.) we make room for him and invite him. Discomposure of mind, though helped forward by the agency of Satan, commonly owe their original to men's own sins and follies. Saul's fear and jealousy made him a torment to himself, so that he could not sit in his house without a javelin in his hand, pretending it was for his preservation, but designing it for David's destruction; for he endeavoured to nail him to the wall, running at him so violently, that he struck the javelin into the wall, v. 10. So strong was the devil in him, so strong his own rage and passion. Perhaps he thought, if he had killed him now, he had been excusable both before God and man, as being non compos mentis—not right in his mind, and that it would have been imputed to his distraction. But God cannot be deceived by pretences, whatever men may be.

3. God continues his care of David, and still watches over him for good. Saul missed his blow; David was too quick for him and fled, and by a kind providence escaped that night. To these preservations, among others, David often refers in his Psalms, when he speaks of God being his Shield and Buckler, his Rock and Fortress, and delivering his soul from death.

11. Saul also sent messengers unto David's house, to watch him, and to slay him in the morning: and Michal, David's wife, told him, saying, If thou save not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain. 12. So Michal let David down through a window: and he went, and fled, and escaped. 13. And Michal took an image, and laid it in the bed, and put a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster, and covered it with a cloth. 14. And when Saul sent messengers to take David, she said, He is sick. 15. And Saul sent the messengers again to see David, saying, Bring him up to me in the bed, that I may slay him. 16. And when the messengers were come in, behold, there was an image in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster. 17. And Saul said unto Michal, Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped? And Michal answered Saul,

He said unto me, Let me go; why should I kill thee?

Here is,

I. Saul's further design of mischief to David. When he had escaped the javelin, supposing he went straight to his own house, as indeed he did, he sent some of his guards after him to lay wait at the door of his house, and to assassinate him in the morning as soon as he stirred out, v. 11. Josephus says, the design was to seize him, and to hurry him before a court of justice that was ordered to condemn him, and put him to death, as a traitor; but we are here told, it was a shorter way they were to take with him, they were ordered to slay him. Well might David complain that his enemies were bloody men, as he did in the Psalm which he penned at this time, and upon this occasion, (Ps. 59.) when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him. See v. 2, 3, and 7. He complains that swords were in their lips.

II. David's wonderful deliverance out of this danger; Michal was the instrument of it, whom Saul gave him to be a snare to him, but she proved his protector and helper; often is the devil out-shot with his own bow. How Michal came to know the danger he was in, does not appear; perhaps she had notice sent her from court, or, rather, was herself aware of the soldiers about the house, when they were going to bed, though they kept so still and silent, that they said, Who does hear? as David takes notice of this in that Psalm, v. 7. She, knowing her father's great indignation at David, soon suspected the design, and bestirred herself for her husband's safety.

1. She got David out of the danger. She told him how imminent the peril was, (v. 11.) To-morrow thou wilt be slain. She told him, as Josephus paraphrases it, that if the sun saw him there next morning it would never see him more; and then put him in a way of escape. David himself was better versed in the art of fighting than of flying, and had it been lawful, it would have been easy for him to have cleared his house, by dint of sword, from those that haunted it, but Michal let him down through a window, (v. 12.) all the doors being guarded; and so he fled and escaped. And now it was, that, either in his own closet before he went, or in the hiding-place to which he fled, he penned that fifty-ninth Psalm, which shows that, in his fright and hurry, his mind was composed, and, in this great danger, his faith was strong and fixed in God; and whereas the plot was to slay him in the morning, he speaks there with the greatest assurance, (v. 16.) I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning.

2. She practised a deception upon Saul and those whom he employed to be the instruments of his cruelty. When the doors of the house were opened in the morning, and David did not appear, the messengers would search the house for him; and did so. But Michal told them he was sick in bed, (v. 14.) and if they would not believe her, they might see; for (v. 13.) she had put a wooden image in the bed, and wrapt it up close and warm as if it had been David asleep, and not in a condition to be spoken to: the goat's hair about the image was to resemble David's hair, the better to impose upon them. Michal can by no means be justified in telling a lie, and covering it thus with a cheat; God's truth needed not her lie: but she intended hereby to keep Saul in suspense for a while, that David might have time to secure himself, not doubting but those messengers would pursue him, if they found he was gone. The messengers had so much humanity as not to offer him any disturbance, when they heard he was sick; for to them that are in that misery, pity should be shown; but Saul, when he heard it, gave positive orders that he should be brought to him, sick or well: (v. 15.) Bring him to me in the bed that I may slay him. It was base and barbarous thus to triumph over a sick man; and to vow the death of one who, for aught he knew, was dying by the hand of nature. So earnestly did he thirst after his blood, and so greedy was his revenge, that he could not be pleased to see him dead, unless he himself was the death of him; though a while ago he said, Let not mine hand be upon him. Thus when men lay the reins on the neck of their passions, they grow more and more outrageous. When the messengers were sent again, the cheat was discovered, v. 16. But by this time it was to be hoped that David was safe, and therefore Michal was not then much concerned at the discovery. Saul chid her for helping David to escape; (v. 17.) Why hast thou deceived me so? What a base spirit was Saul of, to expect that, because Michal was his daughter, she must therefore betray her own husband to him unjustly! Ought she not to forsake and forget her father and her father's house, to cleave to her husband! Those that themselves will be held by no bonds of reason or religion, are ready to think that others should as easily break those bonds. In answer to Saul's chiding, Michal is not so careful of her husband's reputation as she had been of his person, when she makes this her excuse, He said, Let me go; why should I kill thee? As her insinuating that she should have hindered his flight, was false, (it was she that put him upon it and furthered it,) so it was an unjust unworthy reflection upon him, to suggest that he threatened to kill her, if she would not let him go, and might confirm Saul in his rage against him. David was far from being so barbarous a man and so imperious a husband, so brutish in his resolves, and so haughty in his menaces, as she here represented him. But David suffered both from friends and foes, and so did the Son of David.

18. So David fled, and escaped, and came to Samuel to Ramah, and told him all that Saul had done to him: and he and Samuel went and dwelt in Naioth. 19. And it was told Saul, saying, Behold, David is at Naioth in Ramah. 20. And Saul sent messengers to take David: and when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed over them, the Spirit of God was upon the messengers of Saul, and they also prophesied. 21. And when it was told Saul, he sent other messengers, and they prophesied likewise. And Saul sent messengers again the third time, and they prophesied also. 22. Then went he also to Ramah, and came to a great well that is in Sechu: and he asked and said, Where are Samuel and David? And one said, Behold, they be at Naioth in Ramah. 23. And he went thither to Naioth in Ramah: and the Spirit of God was upon him also, and he went on and prophesied, until he came to Naioth in Ramah. 24. And he stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day, and all that night. Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets!

Here is,

I. David's place of refuge. Being got away in the night from his own house, he fled not to Bethlehem to his relations, or to any of the cities of Israel that had caressed and cried him up, to make an interest in them for his own preservation; but he ran straight to Samuel, and told him all that Saul had done to him, v. 18. 1. Because Samuel was the man that had given him assurance of the crown; and his faith in that assurance now beginning to fail, and he being ready to say in his haste, (or, in his flight, as some read it, Ps. 116. 11.) All men are liars, ("not only Saul that promised me my life, but Samuel himself that promised me the throne,") whither should he go but to Samuel, for such encouragements, in this day of distress, as would support his faith? In flying to Samuel, he made God his Refuge, trusting in the shadow of his wings; where else can a good man think himself safe? 2. Because Samuel, as a prophet, was best able to advise him what to do in this day of his distress. In the Psalm he penned the night before, he had lifted up his prayer to God; and now he takes the first opportunity of waiting upon Samuel, to receive direction and instruction from God. If we expect answers of peace to our prayers, we must have our ears open to God's word, v. 3. Because with Samuel there was a college of prophets with whom he might join in praising God, and the pleasure of that would be the greatest relief imaginable to him in his present distress, he met with little rest or satisfaction in Saul's court, and therefore went to seek it in Samuel's church. And, doubtless, what little pleasure is to be had in this world, they have it, that live a life of communion with God; so that David retired in the time of trouble, Ps. 27. 4. . 6.

II. David's protection in this place. He and Samuel went and dwelt (or lodged) in Naioth, where the school of the prophets was, in Ramah, as in a privileged place, for the Philistines themselves would not disturb that meeting, ch. 10. 10. But Saul, having notice of it by some of his spies, (v. 19.) set officers to seize David, v. 20. When they did not bring him, he sent more; when they returned not, he sent the third time; (v. 21.) and hearing no tidings of these, he went himself, v. 22. So impatient was he in his thirst after David's blood, so restless to compass his design against him, though baffled by one providence after another, that he could not perceive that David was under the special protection of Heaven. It was below the king, to go himself on such an errand as this; but persecutors will stoop to any thing, and stick at nothing, to gratify their malice. Saul lays aside all public business to hunt David. How was David delivered, now that he was just ready to fall (like his own lamb formerly) into the mouth of the lion! Not as he delivered his lamb, by slaying the lion, or as Elijah was delivered, by consuming the messengers with fire from heaven, but by turning the lions for the present into lambs.

1. When the messengers came into the congregation where David was among the prophets, the Spirit of God came upon them, and they prophesied; that is, they joined with the rest in praising God. Instead of seizing David, they themselves were seized. And thus, (1.) God secured David, for either they were put into such an ecstasy by the spirit of prophecy, that they could not think of any thing else, and so forgot their errand, and never minded David; or they were by it put, for the present, into so good a frame, that they could not entertain the thought of doing so bad a thing. (2.) He put an honour upon the sons of the prophets, and the communion of saints, and showed how he can, when he pleases, strike an awe upon the worst of men, by the tokens of his presence in the assemblies of the faithful, and force them to acknowledge, that God is with them of a truth, 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. See also the benefit of religious societies, and what good impressions may be made by them on minds that seemed unapt to receive such impressions. And where may the influence of the Spirit be expected, but in the congregations of the saints? (3.) He magnified his power over the spirits of men. He that made the heart and tongue, can manage both to serve his own purposes. Balaam prophesied of the happiness of Israel, whom he would have cursed; and some of the Jewish writers think these messengers prophesied of the advancement of David to the throne of Israel.

2. Saul himself was likewise seized with the spirit of prophecy, before he came to the place. One would have thought that so bad a man as he had been in no danger of being turned into a prophet; yet, when God will take this way of protecting David, even Saul is no sooner come (as Bishop Hall expresses it) within smell of the smoke of Naioth, but he prophesies, as his messengers did, v. 23. He stripped off his royal robe and warlike habiliments, because they were either too fine, or too heavy, for this service, and fell into a trance, as it should seem, or into a rapture, which continued all that day and night. The saints at Damascus were delivered from the rage of the New Testament Saul, by a change wrought on his spirit, but of another nature from this. This was only amazing, but that sanctifying. This for a day, that for ever. Note, Many have great gifts, and yet no grace; prophesy in Christ's name, and yet are disowned by him, Matth. 7. 22. Now the proverb recurs, Is Saul among the prophets? See ch. 10. 12. Then it was different from what it had been, but now contrary. He is rejected of God, and actuated by an evil spirit, and yet among the prophets.

CHAP. XX.

David, having several times narrowly escaped Saul's fury, begins to consider at last, whether it were not necessary for him to retire into the country, and take up arms in his own defence. But he will not do so daring a thing, without consulting his faithful friend Jonathan; how that was done, and what passed between them, we have an account in this chapter, where we have as surprising instances of supernatural love, as we had in the chapter before of unnatural hatred. I. David complains to Jonathan of his present distress, and engaged him to be his friend, v. 1. .8. II. Jonathan faithfully promises to get and give him intelligence how his father stood affected to him, and renews the covenant of friendship with him, v. 9. .23. III. Jonathan, upon trial, finds, to his grief, that his father was implacably enraged against David, v. 24. .34. IV. He gives David notice of this, according to the appointment between them, v. 35. .42.

1. AND David fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan, What have I done? what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life? 2. And he said unto him, God forbid: thou shalt not die: behold, my father will do nothing, either great or small, but that he will show it me; and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so. 3. And David sware moreover, and said, Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes; and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved: but truly, as the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death. 4. Then said Jonathan unto David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it for thee. 5. And David said unto Jonathan, Behold, tomorrow is the new moon, and I should not fail to sit with the king at meat; but let me go, that I may hide myself in the field unto the third day at even. 6. If thy father at all miss me, then say, David earnestly asked leave of me, that he might run to Beth-lehem his city: for there is a yearly sacrifice there for all the family. 7. If he say thus, It is well; thy servant shall have peace: but if he be very wroth, then be sure that evil is determined by him. 8. Therefore thou shalt deal kindly with thy servant; for thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the LORD with thee: notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself; for why shouldst thou bring me to thy father?

Here,

1. David makes a representation to Jonathan of his present troubles. While Saul lay bound by his trance at Naioth, David escaped to the court, and got to speak with Jonathan. And it was happy for him, that he had such a friend at court, when he had such an enemy on the throne. If there be those that hate and despise us, let us not be disturbed at that, for there are those also that love and respect us; God hath set the one against the other, and so must we. Jonathan was a friend that loved at all times; loved David as well now in distress, and bid him as welcome into his arms, as he had done when he was in his triumph; (ch. 18. 1.) and he was a brother that was born for adversity, Prov. 17. 17. Now, 1. David appeals to Jonathan himself concerning his innocency, and he needed not say much to him for the proof of that, only desires him, that if he knew of any just offence he had given his father, he would tell him, that he might humble himself, and beg his pardon. What have I done? v. 1. 2. He endeavours to convince him, that, notwithstanding his innocency, Saul sought his life. Jonathan, from a principle of filial respect to his father, was very loath to believe that he designed, or would ever do, so wicked a thing, v. 2. He the rather hoped so, because he knew nothing of any such design; and he had usually been made privy to all his counsels. Jonathan, as became a dutiful son, endeavoured to cover his father's shame, as far as was consistent with justice and fidelity to David. Charity is not forward to think evil of any, especially of a parent, 1 Cor. 13. 5. David therefore gives him the assurance of an oath concerning his own danger; swears the peace upon Saul, that he was in fear of his life by him; As the LORD liveth, than which nothing more sure in itself; and as thy soul liveth, than which nothing more certain to thee; whatever thou thinkest, there is but a step between me and death, v. 3. And as for Saul's concealing it from Jonathan, it was easy to account for that, he knew the friendship between him and David; and therefore, though in other things he advised with him, yet not in that. None more fit than Jonathan to serve him in every design that was just and honourable, but he knew him to be a man of more virtue than to be his confidant in so base a design as the murder of David.

II. Jonathan generously offers him his service; (v. 4.) Whatsoever thou desirest, he needed not insert the provision of lawful and honest, (for he knew David too well to think he would ask any thing that was otherwise,) I will even do it for thee. 'This is true friendship. Thus Christ testifies his love to us, Ask, and it shall be done for you: and we must testify our's to him, by keeping his commandments.

III. David only desires him to satisfy himself, and then to satisfy him, whether Saul did really design his death or no. Perhaps David proposed this, more for Jonathan's conviction than his own, for he himself was well satisfied.

1 The method of trial he proposes, was very natural, and would certainly discover how Saul stood affected to him. The two next days, Saul was to dine publicly, upon occasion of the solemnities of the new moon, when extraordinary sacrifices were offered, and feasts made upon the sacrifices. Saul was rejected of God, and the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him, and yet he kept up his observance of the holy feasts. There may be the remains of external devotion, where there is nothing but the ruins of real virtue. At these solemn feasts, Saul had either all his children to sit with him, and David had a seat as one of them; or all his great officers, and David had a seat as one of them. However it was, David resolved his seat should be empty (and that it never used to be at a sacred feast) those two days, (v. 5.) and he would abscond till the solemnity was over, and put it upon this issue; If Saul admitted an excuse for his absence, and dispensed with it, he would conclude he had changed his mind, and was reconciled to him; but if he resented it, and was put into a passion by it, it was easy to conclude he designed him a mischief, since it was certain he did not love him so well as to desire his presence for any other end, than he might have an opportunity to do him a mischief, v. 7.

2. The excuse he desires Jonathan to make for his absence, we have reason to think, was true; that he was invited by his elder brother to Beth-lehem, his own city, to celebrate this new moon with his relations there, because beside the monthly solemnity, in which they held communion with all Israel, they had now a yearly sacrifice, and a holy feast upon it, for all the family, v. 6. They kept a day of thanksgiving in their family for the comforts they enjoyed, and a prayer, for the continuance of them. By this it appears that the family David was of, was a very religious family, a house that had a church in it.

3. The arguments he uses with Jonathan, to persuade him to do this kindness for him, are very pressing, v. 8. (1.) That he had entered into a league of friendship with him, and it was Jonathan's own proposal. Thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee. (2.) That he would by no means urge him to espouse his cause, if he was not sure that it was a righteous cause; "If there be iniquity in me, I am so far from desiring or expecting that the covenant between us should bind thee to be a confederate with me in that iniquity, that I freely release thee from it, and wish that thy hand may be first upon me: slay me thyself." No honest man will urge his friend to do a dishonest thing for his sake.

9. And Jonathan said, Far be it from thee: for if I knew certainly that evil were determined by my father to come upon thee, then would not I tell it thee? 10. Then said David to Jonathan, Who shall tell me? or what if thy father answer thee roughly? 11. And Jonathan said unto David, Come, and let us go out into the field. And they went out both of them into the field. 12. And Jonathan said unto David, O LORD God of Israel, when I have sounded my father about to-morrow any time, or the third day, and behold, if there be good towards David, and I then send not unto thee, and show it thee, 13. The LORD do so and much more to Jonathan: but if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will show it thee, and send thee away, that thou mayest go in peace: and the LORD be with thee, as he hath been with my father. 14. And thou shalt not only while yet I live show me the kindness of the LORD, that I die not: 15. But also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever: no, not when the LORD hath cut off the enemies of David every one from the face of the earth. 16. So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the LORD even require it at the hand of David's enemies. 17. And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him: for he loved him as he loved his own soul. 18. Then Jonathan said to David, To-morrow is the new moon: and thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty. 19. And when thou hast stayed three days, then thou shalt go down quickly, and come to the place where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand, and shalt remain by the stone Ezel. 20. And I will shoot three arrows on the side thereof, as though I shot at a mark. 21. And behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go, find out the arrows. If I expressly say unto the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them; then come thou: for there is peace to thee, and no hurt; as the LORD liveth. 22. But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold, the arrows are beyond thee; go thy way: for the LORD hath sent thee away. 23. And as touching the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold, the LORD be between thee and me for ever.

Here,

I. Jonathan protests his fidelity to David in his distress. Notwithstanding the strong confidence David had in Jonathan, yet, because he might have some reason to fear that his father's influence, and his own interest, should make him warp, or grow cool toward him, Jonathan thought it requisite solemnly to renew the professions of his friendship to him; (v. 9.) "Far be it from thee to think that I suspect thee of any crime, for which I should either slay thee myself, or deliver thee to my father; no, if thou hast any jealousy of that, come, let us go into the field, v. 11. and talk it over more fully." He does not challenge him to the field to fight him for an affront, but to fix him in his friendship. He faithfully promises him that he would let him know how, upon trial, he found his father affected toward him, and would make the matter neither better nor worse than it was. "If there be good toward thee, I will show it thee, that thou mayest be easy: (v. 12.) if evil, I will send thee away, that thou mayest be safe;" (v. 13.) and thus would help to deliver him from the evil, if it were real, and from the fear of evil, if it were but imaginary. For the confirmation of his promise, he appeals to God, 1. As a witness; (v. 12.) "O Lord God of Israel, thou knowest I mean sincerely, and think as I speak." The strength of his passion made the manner of his speaking concise and abrupt. 2. As a judge; "The Lord do so, and much more, to Jonathan, v. 13. if I speak deceitfully, or break my word with my friend:" he expresses himself thus solemnly, that David might be abundantly assured of his sincerity. And thus God has confirmed his promises to us, that we might have strong consolation, Heb. 6. 17, 18. Jonathan adds to his protestations his hearty prayers, "The Lord be with thee, to protect and prosper thee, as he has been formerly with my father, though now he be withdrawn." This intimates his belief that David would be in his father's place, and his good wishes that he might prosper in it better than his father now did.

II. He provides for the entail of the covenant of friendship with David upon his posterity; (v. 14-16.) he engages David to be a friend to his family when he was gone; (v. 15.) "Thou shalt promise that thou wilt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever." This he spoke from a natural affection he had to his children, whom he desired it might go well with when he was gone, and for his future welfare he desired to improve his present interest. It also bespeaks his firm belief of David's advancement, and that it would be in the power of his hand to do a kindness or unkindness to his seed; for, in process of time, the Lord would cut off his enemies, Saul himself not excepted: then "Do not thou cut off thy kindness from my house, nor revenge my father's wrongs upon my children." The house of David must likewise be bound to the house of Jonathan from generation to generation; he made a covenant (v. 16.) with the house of David. Note, True friends cannot but covet to transmit to their's after them their mutual affections. Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not. This kindness, 1. He calls the kindness of the Lord, because it is such kindness as the Lord shows to those whom he takes into covenant with himself; for he is a God to them, and to their seed; they are beloved for their father's sake. 2. He secures it by an imprecation, v. 16. The Lord requires it at the hand of David's seed, (for of David himself he had no suspicion,) if they prove so far David's enemies, as to deal wrongfully with the posterity of Jonathan, David's friend. He feared lest David, or some of his, should hereafter be tempted, for the clearing and confirming of their title to the throne, to do by his seed, as Abimelech had done by the sons of Gideon; (Jud. 9. 5.) and this he would effectually prevent: but the reason given (v. 17.) why Jonathan was so earnest to have the friendship entailed, is purely generous, and has nothing of self in it; it was because he loved him as he loved his own soul, and therefore desired that he and his might be loved by him. David, though now in disgrace at court, and in distress, was as amiable in the eyes of Jonathan as ever he had been; so pure were the principles on which his friendship was built. Having himself sworn to David, he caused David to swear to him, and (as we read it) to swear again, which David consented to; (for he that bears an honest mind, does not startle at assurances;) to swear by his love to him, which he looked upon as a sacred thing. Jonathan's heart was so much upon it, that, when they parted this time, he concludes with a solemn appeal to God, The Lord be between thee and me for ever; (v. 23.) that is, "God himself be judge between us and our families for ever, if on either side this league of friendship be violated." It was in remembrance of this covenant, that David was kind to Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. 9. 7.—21. 7. It will be a kindness to ourselves and our's, to secure an interest in those whom God favours, and to make his friends ours.

III. He settles the method of intelligence, and by what signs and tokens he would give him notice how his father stood affected toward him. He would be missed the first day, or at least the second day, of the new moon, and would be inquired after, v. 18. On the third day, by which time he would be returned from Beth-lehem, he must be at such a place, (v. 19.) and Jonathan would come toward that place with his bow and arrows to shoot for diversion; (v. 20.) would send his lad to fetch his arrows, and if they were shot short of the lad, David must take it for a signal of safety, and not be afraid to show his head; (v. 21.) but if he shot beyond the lad, it was a signal of danger, and he must shift for his safety, v. 22. This expedient he fixed upon, lest he should not have the opportunity, which yet it proved he had, of talking with him, and making the report by word of mouth.

24. So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the king sat him down to eat meat. 25. And the king sat upon his seat, as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall: and Jonathan arose, and Abner sat by Saul's side, and David's place was empty. 26. Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day: for he thought; Something hath befallen him, he is not clean; surely he is not clean. 27. And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty: and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat, neither yesterday, nor to-day? 28. And Jonathan answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Beth-lehem: 29. And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for our family hath a sacrifice in the city; and my brother he hath commanded me to be there: and now if I have found favour in thine eyes, let me get away, I pray thee, and see my brethren. Therefore he cometh not unto the king's table. 30. Then Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman, do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thine own confusion, and unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness? 31. For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom. Wherefore now send and fetch him unto me, for he shall surely die. 32. And Jonathan answered Saul his father, and said unto him, Wherefore shall he be slain? what hath he done? 33. And Saul cast a javelin at him to smite him: whereby Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David. 34. So Jonathan arose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month: for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.

Jonathan is here effectually convinced of that which he was so loath to believe, that his father had an implacable enmity to David, and would certainly be the death of him if it were in his power; and he had like to have paid very dear himself for the conviction.

I. David is missed from the feast on the first day, but nothing is said of him. The king sat upon his seat, to feast upon the peace-offerings, as at other times, v. 25. and yet had his heart as full of envy and malice against David as it would hold: he should first have been reconciled to him, and then come and offered his gift; but, instead of that, he hoped, at this feast, to drink the blood of David. What an abomination was that sacrifice, which was brought with such a wicked mind as this! Prov. 21. 27. When the king came to take his seat, Jonathan arose, in reverence to him, both as his father and as his sovereign; every one knew his place, but David's was empty. It did not use to be so. None more constant than he in attending holy duties; nor had he been absent now, but that he must have come at the peril of his life, self-preservation obliged him to withdraw. In imminent peril present opportunities may be waved, nay, we ought not to throw ourselves into the mouth of danger. Christ himself absconded often, till he knew that his hour was come. But that day Saul took no notice that he missed David, but said within himself, Surely he is not clean, v. 26. Some ceremonial pollution has befallen him, which forbids him to eat of the holy things, till he has washed his clothes, and bathed his flesh in water, and been unclean until the even. Saul knew what conscience David made of the law, and that he would rather keep away from the holy feast, than come in his uncleanness. Blessed be God, no uncleanness is now a restraint upon us, but what we may by faith and repentance be washed from in the fountain opened, Ps. 26. 6.

II. He is inquired for the second day, v. 27. Saul asked Jonathan, who he knew was his confidant, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat? He was his own son by marriage, but he calls him in disdain, the son of Jesse. He asks for him, as if he were not pleased that he should be absent from a religious feast: and so it should be an example to masters of families to see to it, that those under their charge be not absent from the worship of God, either in public or in the family. It is a bad thing for us, except in case of necessity, to omit any opportunity of stately attending on God in solemn ordinances. Thomas lost a sight of Christ by being once absent from a meeting of the disciples. But that which displeased Saul, was, that hereby he missed the opportunity he expected, of doing David a mischief.

III. Jonathan makes his excuse, v. 28, 29. 1. That he was absent upon a good occasion; keeping the feast in another place, though not here; sent for by his elder brother, who was now more respectful to him than he had been, (ch. 17. 28.) and that he was gone to pay his respects to his relations, for the keeping up of brotherly love; and no master would deny a servant liberty to do that at proper times. He pleads, 2. That he did not go without leave, humbly asked and obtained from Jonathan, who, as his superior officer, was proper to be applied to for it. Thus he represents David, as not wanting in any instance of respect and duty to the government.

IV. Saul, hereupon, breaks out into a most extravagant passion, and rages like a lion disappointed of his prey. David was out of his reach, but he falls foul upon Jonathan for his sake; (v. 30, 31.)

gave him base language, not fit for a gentleman, a prince, to give to any man, especially to his own son, heir apparent to his crown, a son that served him, the greatest stay and ornament of his family, before a deal of company, at a feast, when all should be in good humour, at a sacred feast, by which all irregular passions should be mortified and subdued; yet he does in effect call him, 1. A bastard: Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman; that is, according to the foolish and filthy language of men's brutish passion now-a-day, Thou son of a whore. He tells him he was born to the confusion of his mother; that is, he had given the world cause to suspect that he was not the legitimate son of Saul, because he loved him whom Saul hated, and supported him who would be the destruction of their family. 2. A traitor: Thou son of perverse rebellion, so the word is; that is, "Thou perverse rebel." At other times, he reckoned no counsellor or commander that he had, more trusty and well-beloved than Jonathan; yet now, in his passion, he represents him as dangerous to his crown and life. 3. A fool: Thou hast chosen the son of Jesse for thy friend, to thine own confusion, for while he lives, thou shalt never be established. Jonathan indeed did wisely and well for himself and family, to secure an interest in David, whom Heaven had destined to the throne; yet, for this, he is branded as most impolitic. It is good taking God's people for our people, and going with those that have him with them; it will prove to our advantage at last, however for the present it may be thought a disparagement, and a prejudice to our secular interest. It is probable that Saul knew that David was anointed to the kingdom, by the same hand that anointed him, and then, not Jonathan, but himself, was the fool, to think to defeat the counsels of God. Yet nothing will serve him but David must die, and Jonathan must fetch him to execution. See how ill Saul's passion looks, and let it warn us against the indulgence of any thing like it in ourselves. Anger is madness, and he that hates his brother, is a murderer.

V. Jonathan is sorely grieved, and put into disorder, by his father's barbarous passion; and the more, because he had hoped better things, v. 2. He was troubled for his father, that he should be such a brute; troubled for his friend, whom he knew to be a friend of God, that he should be so basely abused: he was grieved for David, v. 34. and troubled for himself too, because his father had done him shame; and though most unjustly, yet he must submit to it. One would pity Jonathan, to see how he was put, 1. Into the peril of sin. Much ado that wise and good man had to keep his temper, upon such a provocation as this. His father's reflections upon himself he made no return to; it becomes inferiors to bear with meekness and silence the contempts put upon them in wrath and passion. When thou art the anvil, lie thou still. But his dooming David to die, he could not bear; to that he replied with some heat, (v. 32.) Wherefore shall he be slain? What has he done? Generous spirits can much more easily bear to be abused themselves, than to hear their friends abused. 2. Into the peril of death. Saul was now so outrageous, that he threw a javelin at Jonathan, v. 33. He seemed to be in great care (v. 31.) that Jonathan should be established in his kingdom, and yet now he himself aims at his life. What fools, what savage beasts, and worse, does anger make men! How necessary is it to put a hook in its jaws! Jonathan was fully satisfied that evil was determined against David, which put him out of frame exceedingly: he rose from table, thinking it high time, when his life was struck at, and would eat no meat; for they were not to eat of the holy things in their mourning. All the guests, we may suppose, were discomposed, and the mirth of the feast spoiled. He that is cruel, troubles his own flesh, Prov. 11. 17.

35. And it came to pass in the morning, that Jonathan went out into the field at the time appointed with David, and a little lad with him. 36. And he said unto his lad, Run, find out now the arrows which I shoot. And as the lad ran, he shot an arrow beyond him. 37. And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, and said, Is not the arrow beyond thee? 38. And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not. And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows, and came to his master. 39. But the lad knew not any thing: only Jonathan and David knew the matter. 40. And Jonathan gave his artillery unto his lad, and said unto him, Go, carry them to the city. 41. And as soon as the lad was gone, David arose out of a place toward the south, and fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times: and they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded. 42. And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the LORD, saying, The LORD be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed for ever. And he arose and departed: and Jonathan went into the city.

Here is,

1. Jonathan's faithful performance of his promise to give David notice of the success of his dangerous experiment. He went at the time and to the place appointed, (v. 35.) within sight of which he knew David lay hid; sent his foot-boy to fetch his arrows, which he would shoot at random; (v. 36.) gave David the fatal signal, by shooting an arrow beyond the lad; (v. 37.) Is not the arrow beyond thee? That word [beyond] David knew the meaning of better than the lad. Jonathan dismissed the lad, who knew nothing of the matter, and finding the coast clear, and no danger of a discovery, he presumed upon one minute's personal conversation with David after he had bid him flee for his life.

2. The most sorrowful parting of these two friends, who, for aught that appears, never came together again but once, and that was by stealth in a wood, ch. 23. 16. (1.) David addressed himself to Jonathan with the reverence of a servant rather than the freedom of a friend; he fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times, as one deeply sensible of his obligations to him for the good services he had done him. (2.) They took leave of each other with the greatest affection imaginable, with kisses and tears; they wept on each other's neck till David exceeded, v. 41. The separation of two such faithful friends was equally grievous to them both, but David's case was the more deplorable: for when Jonathan was returning to his family and friends, David was leaving all his comforts, even those of God's sanctuary, and therefore his grief exceeded Jonathan's; or, perhaps, it was because his temper was more tender, and his passions stronger. (3.) They referred themselves to the covenant of friendship that was between them, both of them comforting themselves with that in this mournful separation. "we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, for ourselves and our heirs, that we and they will be faithful and kind to each other from generation to generation." Thus while we are at home in the body and absent from the Lord, this is our comfort, that he has made with us an everlasting covenant.

CHAP. XXI.

David has now quite taken leave, both of Saul's court, and of his camp; has bid farewell to his alter idem—his other self, the beloved Jonathan; and from henceforward to the end of this book, he is looked upon and treated as an outlaw, and proclaimed a traitor; we still find him shifting from place to place for his own safety, and Saul pursuing him. His troubles are very particularly related in this and the following chapters, not only to be a key to the Psalms, but that he might be, as other prophets, an example to the saints, in all ages, of suffering affliction, and of patience; and, especially, that he might be a type of Christ, who, being anointed to the kingdom, humbled himself, and was therefore highly exalted. But the example of the suffering Jesus was a copy without a blot, that of David was not so; witness the records of this chapter, where we find David in his flight. I. Imposing upon Ahimelech the priest, to get from him both victuals and arms, v. 1.-9. II. Imposing upon Achish, king of Gath, by feigning himself mad, v. 10.-15. Justly are troubles called temptations, for many are by them drawn into sin.

1. THEN came David to Nob to Ahimelech the priest: and Ahimelech was afraid at the meeting of David, and said unto him, Why art thou alone, and no man with thee? 2. And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The king hath commanded me a business, and hath said unto me, Let no man know any thing of the business whereabout I send thee, and what I have commanded thee: and I have appointed my servants to such and such a place. 3. Now therefore what is under thine hand? give me five loaves of bread in mine hand, or what there is present. 4. And the priest answered David, and said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least from women. 5. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out, and the vessels of the young men are holy, and the bread is in a manner common, yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel. 6. So the priest gave him hallowed bread: for there was no bread there but the show-bread, that was taken from before the LORD, to put hot bread in the day when it was taken away. 7. Now a certain man of the servants of Saul was there that day, detained before the LORD; and his name was Doeg, an Edomite, the chiefest of the herdmen that belonged to Saul. 8. And David said unto Ahimelech, And is there not here under thine hand spear or sword? for I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me, be cause the king's business required haste. 9. And the priest said, The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom thou slewest in the valley of Elah, behold, it is here wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod: if thou wilt take that, take it: for there is no other save that here. And David said, There is none like that; give it me.

Here,

I. David, in distress, flies to the tabernacle of God, now pitched at Nob, supposed to be a city in the tribe of Benjamin. Since Shiloh was forsaken, the tabernacle often removed, though the ark still remained at Kirjath-jearim. Hither David came in his flight from Saul's fury, (v. 1.) and applied himself to Ahimelech the priest. Samuel the prophet could not protect him, Jonathan the prince could not; he therefore has recourse next to Ahimelech the priest. He foresees he must now be an exile, and therefore comes to the tabernacle, 1. To take an affecting leave of it, for he knows not when he shall see it again, and nothing will be more afflictive to him in his banishment than his distance from the house of God, and his restraint from public ordinances, as appears by many of his Psalms. He had given an affectionate farewell to his friend Jonathan, and cannot go till he has given the like to the tabernacle. 2. To inquire of the Lord there, and to beg direction from him in the way of duty and safety; his case being difficult and dangerous. That this was his business, appears ch. 22. 10. where it is said that Ahimelech inquired of the Lord for him, as he had done formerly, v. 15. It is a great comfort to us in a day of trouble, that we have a God to go to, to whom we may open our case, and from whom we may ask and expect direction.

II. Ahimelech the priest is surprised to see him in so poor an equipage; having heard that he was fallen into disgrace at court he looked shy upon him, as most are apt to do upon their friends when the world frowns upon them. He was afraid of incurring Saul's displeasure by entertaining him, and took notice how mean a figure he now made to what he used to make. Why art thou alone? He had some with him, (as appears, Mark 2. 26.) but they were only his own servants; he had none of the courtiers, no persons of quality with him, as he used to have at other times, when he came to inquire of the Lord. He says, (Ps. 42. 4.) he was wont to go with a multitude to the house of God; and, having now but two or three with him, Ahimelech might well ask, Why art thou alone? He that was suddenly advanced from the solitude of a shepherd's life to the crowds and hurries of the camp, is now as soon reduced to the desolate condition of an exile, and is alone like a sparrow on the house-top. Such changes are there in this world, and so uncertain are its smiles! Those that are courted to-day, may be deserted to-morrow.

III. David, under pretence of being sent by Saul upon public services, solicits Ahimelech to supply his present wants, v. 2, 3. Here David did not behave like himself; he told Ahimelech a gross untruth, that Saul had ordered him business to despatch; that his attendants were dismissed to such a place, that he was charged to observe secrecy, and therefore durst not communicate it, no not to the priest himself. It was all false. What shall we say to this? The scripture does not conceal it, and we dare not justify it: it was ill done, and proved of bad consequence, for it occasioned the death of the priests of the Lord, as David reflected upon it afterward with regret, ch. 22. 22. It was needless for him thus to dissemble with the priest, for we may suppose, that if he had told him the truth he would have sheltered and relieved him as readily as Samuel did, and would have known the better how to advise him, and inquire of God for him. People should be free with their faithful ministers. David was a man of great faith and courage, and yet now both failed him, and he fell thus foully through fear and cowardice, and both owing to the weakness of his faith. Had he trusted God aright, he would not have used such a sorry sinful shift as this for his own preservation. It is written not for our imitation, no, not in the greatest straits, but for our admonition. Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall; and let us all pray daily, Lord, lead us not into temptation. Let us all take occasion from this to lament, 1. The weakness and infirmity of good men; the best are not perfect on this side of heaven. There may be true grace, where yet there are many failings. 2. The wickedness of bad times, which forces good men into such straits as prove temptations too strong for them. Oppression makes a wise man do foolishly.

(1.) He wanted bread, five loaves, v. 3. Travelling was then troublesome, when men generally carried their provisions with them, having little money, and no public houses, else David had not now been to seek for bread. It seems David had known the seed of the righteous begging bread, occasionally, but not constantly, Ps. 37. 25.

Now, [1.] The priest objected that he had none but hallowed bread, show-bread, which had stood a week on the golden table in the sanctuary, and was taken thence for the use of the priests and their families, v. 4. It seems the priests kept no good house, but wanted either a heart to be hospitable, or rather provisions wherewithal. Ahimelech thinks that the young men that attended David might not eat of this bread, unless they had for some time abstained from women, even from their own wives: this was required at the giving of the law; (Exod. 19. 15.) but otherwise we never find this made the matter of any ceremonial purity on the one side, or pollution on the other. And therefore the priest here seems to be over-nice, not to say, superstitious.

[2.] David pleads that he and they that were with him, in this case of necessity, might lawfully eat of the hallowed bread, for they were not only able to answer his terms of keeping from women for three days, but that the vessels, that is, the bodies, of the young men were holy, being possessed in sanctification and honour at all times; (1 Thess. 4. 4, 5.) and therefore God would take particular care of them, that they wanted not necessary supports, and would have his priest to do so. And being thus holy, holy things were not forbidden to them. Poor and pious Israelites were, in effect, priests to God, and rather than be starved, might feed on the bread which was appropriated to the priests. Believers are spiritual priests, and the offerings of the Lord shall be their inheritance; they eat the bread of their God. He pleads that the bread is in a manner common, now that what was primarily the religious use of it, was over; especially (as our margin reads it) when there is this day other bread (hot, v. 6.) sanctified this day in the vessel, and put in the room of it upon the table. This was David's plea, and the Son of David approves it, and shows from it that mercy is to be preferred to sacrifice. that ritual observances must give way to moral duties; and that that may be done in a case of an urgent providential necessity, which may not otherwise be done. He brings it to justify his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath-day, for which the Pharisees censured them, Matth. 12. 3, 4.

[3.] Ahimelech hereupon supplies him. He gave him hallowed bread; (v. 6.) and some think that it was about this that he inquired of the Lord, ch. 22. 10. As a faithful servant, he would not dispose of his Master's provisions without his Master's leave. This bread, we may suppose, was the more agreeable to David for its being hallowed, so precious were all sacred things to him. The show-bread was but twelve loaves in all, yet out of this he gives David five, (v. 3.) though he had no more in the house; but he trusted in Providence.

(2.) He wanted a sword. Persons of quality, though officers of the army, did not then wear their swords so constantly as now they do, else surely David had not been without one; it was a wonder that Jonathan did not furnish him with his, as he had done, ch. 18. 4. However, it happened that he had now no weapons with him, the reason of which he pretends to be, because he came away in haste, v. 8. Those that are furnished with the sword of the Spirit and the shield of faith, cannot be disarmed of them, nor need they, at any time, to be at a loss. But the priests, it seems, had no swords; the weapons of their warfare were not carnal; there was not a sword to be found about the tabernacle, but the sword of Goliath, which he laid up behind the ephod, as a monument of the glorious victory David obtained over him; probably, David had an eye to that, when he asked the priest to help him with a sword; for that being mentioned, O! says he, there is none like that, give it me, &c. v. 9. He could not use Saul's armour, for he had not proved it; but this sword of Goliath he had made trial of, and done execution with; by this it appears that he was well grown in strength and stature, that he could wear and wield such a sword as that. God had taught his hands to war, so that he could do wonders, Ps. 18. 34. Two things we may observe concerning this sword. [1.] That God had graciously given it him, as a pledge of his singular favour; so that, whenever he drew it, nay, whenever he looked upon it, it would be a great support to his faith, by bringing to mind that great instance of the particular care and countenance of the divine providence. Experiences are great encouragements. [2.] That he had gratefully given it back to God, dedicating it to him and to his honour, as a token of his thankfulness; and now in his distress it stood him greatly in stead. Note, What we devote to God's praise, and serve him with, is most likely to redound, one way or other, to our own comfort and benefit. What we gave, we have from him.

Thus was David well furnished with arms and victuals; but it fell out very unhappily, that there was one of Saul's servants then attending before the Lord, Doeg by name, that proved a base traitor, both to David and to Ahimelech. He was by birth an Edomite; (v. 7.) and though proselyted to the Jewish religion, to get the preferment he now had under Saul, yet he retained the ancient and hereditary enmity of Edom to Israel. He was master of the herds, which, perhaps, was then a place of as much honour as master of the horse is now. Some occasion or other he had at this time to wait on the priest, either to be purified from some pollution, or to pay some vow; but whatever his business was, it is said, he was detained before the Lord. He must attend, and could not help it, but he was sick of the service, snuffed at it, and said, What a weariness is it! Mal. 1. 13. He would rather have been any where else than before the Lord, and therefore, instead of minding the business he came about, was plotting to do David a mischief, and to be avenged on Ahimelech for detaining him. God's sanctuary could never secure itself from such wolves in sheep's clothing. See Gal. 2. 4.

10. And David arose, and fled that day for fear of Saul, and went to Achish the king of Gath. 11. And the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David the king of the land? did they not sing one to another of him in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands? 12. And David laid up these words in his heart, and was sore afraid of Achish the king of Gath. 13. And he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard. 14. Then said Achish unto his servants, Lo, ye see the man is mad: wherefore then have ye brought him to me? 15. Have I need of madmen, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into my house?

David, though king elect, is here an exile; designed to be master of vast treasures, yet had been just now begging his bread; anointed to the crown, and yet here forced to run his country: thus do God's providences sometimes seem to run counter to his promises, for the trial of his people's faith, and the glorifying of his name, in the accomplishment of his counsels, notwithstanding the difficulties that lay in the way. Here is,

1. David's flight into the land of the Philistines, where he hoped to be hid, and to remain, undiscovered, in the court or camp of Achish, king of Gath, v. 10. Israel's darling is necessitated to quit the land of Israel, and he that was the Philistines' great enemy, (upon I know not what inducements,) goes to seek for shelter among them. It should seem that as, though the Israelites loved him, yet the king of Israel had personal enmity to him, which obliged him to leave his own country; so, though the Philistines hated him, yet the king of Gath had a personal kindness for him, valuing his merit, and, perhaps, the more for his killing Goliath of Gath, who, it may be, had been no friend to Achish. To him David now went directly, as to one he could confide in; (as afterward, ch. 27. 2, 3.) and Achish would have now protected him, but that he was afraid of disoblighing his own people by it. God's persecuted people have often found better usage from the Philistines than from Israelites, in the Gentile theatres than in the Jewish synagogues: the king of Judah imprisoned Jeremiah, and the king of Babylon set him at liberty.

2. The disgust which the servants of Achish took at his being there, and the complaint of it to Achish; (v. 11.) "Is not this David?" Is not this he that has triumphed over the Philistines? Witness that burthen of the song which was so much talked of; Saul has slain his thousands, but David, this very man, his ten thousands. Nay, is not this he that (if our intelligence from the land of Israel be true) is, or is to be, the king of the land? As such he must be an enemy to our country; and is it safe or honourable for us to protect or entertain such a man?" Achish perhaps, had intimated to them, that it would be policy to entertain David, because he was now an enemy to Saul, and he might be hereafter a friend to them; it is common for the outlaws of a nation to be sheltered by the enemies of that nation; but the servants of Achish objected to his politics, and thought it not at all fit that he should stay among them.

3. The fright which this put David into. Though he had some reason to put confidence in Achish, yet, when he perceived the servants of Achish jealous of him, he began to be afraid that Achish would be obliged to deliver him up to them, and he was sore afraid; (v. 12.) and perhaps he was the more apprehensive of his own danger, when he was thus discovered, because he wore Goliath's sword, which, we may suppose, was well known at Gath, and which he had reason to expect they would cut off his head, as he had cut off Goliath's with it. David now learned by experience what he has taught us, (Ps. 118. 9.) that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. Men of high degree are a lie, and if we make them our hope, they may prove our fear. It was at this time that David penned the fifty-sixth Psalm, (Michtam, a golden psalm;) when the Philistines took him in Gath, where having showed before God his distresses, he resolves, (v. 3.) what time I am afraid, I will trust in thee: and therefore (v. 11.) will not be afraid what man can do unto me, no not the sons of the giant.

4. The course he took to get out of their hands. He feigned himself mad; (v. 13.) he used the gestures and fashions of a natural fool, or one that was gone out of his wits; supposing they would be ready enough to believe that the disgrace he was fallen into, and the troubles he was now in, had driven him distracted. This dissimulation of his cannot be justified: it was a mean thing thus to disparage himself, and inconsistent with truth thus to misrepresent himself, and therefore not becoming the honour and sincerity of such a man as David: yet it was not a downright lie, and it was like a stratagem in war, by which he imposed upon his enemies for the preservation of his own life. What David did here in pretence, and for his own safety, which made it partly excusable, drunkards do really, and only to gratify a base lust; they make fools of themselves, and change their behaviour; their words and actions commonly are either as silly and ridiculous as an idiot's, or as furious and outrageous as a madman's, which has often made me wonder, that ever men of sense and honour should allow themselves in it.

5. His escape by this means, v. 14, 15. I am apt to think Achish was aware that the delirium was but counterfeit, but, being desirous to protect David, as we find afterward he was very kind to him, even when the lords of the Philistines favoured him not, (ch. 28. 1, 2.—29. 6.) he pretended to his servants, that he really thought he was mad, and therefore had reason to question whether it was David or no; or, if it were, they needed not fear him, what harm could he do them now that his reason was departed from him? They suspected that Achish was inclined to entertain him; "Not I," says he, "he is a madman, I'll have nothing to do with him, you need not fear that I should employ him, or give him any countenance. Have I need of madmen? Shall this fool come into my house? I will show him no kindness, but then you shall do him no hurt, for if he be a madman, he is to be pitied." He therefore drove him away, as it is in the title of Ps. 34. which David penned upon this occasion, and an excellent Psalm it is, and shows, that he did not change his spirit when he changed his behaviour, but even in the greatest difficulties and hurries his heart was fixed, trusting in the Lord; and he concludes that Psalm with this assurance, that none of them that trust in God shall be desolate, though they may be, as he now was, solitary and distressed; persecuted but not forsaken.

CHAP. XXII.

David being driven from Achish, returns into the lap of Israel to be haunted by Saul. I. David sets up his standard in the cave of Adullam; entertains his relations, (v. 1.) lists soldiers, (v. 2.) but removes his aged parents to a more quiet settlement, (v. 3, 4.) and has the prophet Gad for his counsellor, v. 5. II. Saul resolves to pursue him and find him out, complains of his servants and Jonathan, (v. 6.—8.) and finding by Doeg's information that Ahimelech had been kind to David, he ordered him and all the priests that were with him, eighty-five in all, to be put to death, and all that belonged to them destroyed; (v. 9.—19.) from the barbarous execution of which sentence, Abiathar escaped to David, v. 20.—23.

1. DAVID therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave Adullam: and when his brethren and all his father's house heard it, they went down thither to him. 2. And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them: and there were with him about four hundred men. 3. And David went thence to Mizpeh of Moab: and he said unto the king of Moab, Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, come forth, and be with you till I know what God will do for me. 4. And he brought them before the king of Moab: and they dwelt with him all the while that David was in the hold. 5. And the prophet Gad said unto David, Abide not in the hold; depart, and get thee into the land of Judah. Then David departed, and came into the forest of Hareth.

Here,

1. David shelters himself in the cave of Adullam, v. 1. Whether it was a natural or artificial fastness, does not appear; it is probable that the access to it was so difficult, that David thought himself able, with Goliath's sword, to keep it against all the forces of Saul, and therefore buried himself alive in it, while he was waiting to see (as he says here, v. 3.) what God would do with him. The promise of the kingdom implied a promise of preservation to it, and yet David used proper means for his own safety, else he had tempted God. He did not do any thing that aimed to destroy Saul, but only to secure himself. He that might have done good service to his country as a judge or general, is here shut up in a cave, and thrown by as a vessel in which there was no pleasure. We must not think it strange, if sometimes shining lights be thus eclipsed and hid under a bushel. Perhaps the apostle refers to this instance of David, among others, when he speaks of some of the Old Testament worthies that wandered in deserts, in dens and caves of the earth, Heb. 11. 38. It was at this time that David penned the 142d Psalm, which is entitled, A prayer when he was in the cave; and there he complains that no man would know him, and that refuge failed him, but hopes that shortly the righteous should compass him about.

2. Thither his relations flocked to him, his brethren and all his father's house, to be protected by him, to give assistance to him, and to take their lot with him. A brother is born for adversity. Now Joab and Abishai, and the rest of his relations, came to him, to suffer and venture with him, in hopes shortly to be advanced with him; and they were so. The first three of his worthies were those that first owned him when he was in the cave, 1 Chron. 11. 15, &c.

3. Here he began to raise forces in his own defence, v. 2. He found by the late experiments he had made, that he could not save himself by flight, and therefore was necessitated to do it by force; wherein he never acted offensively, never offered any violence to his prince, nor gave any disturbance to the peace of the kingdom, but only used his forces as a guard to his own person. But whatever defence his soldiers were to him, they did him no great credit, for the regiment he had was made up not of great men, or rich men, or stout men, no nor good men, but men in distress, in debt, and discontented, men of broken fortunes and restless spirits, that were put to their shifts, and knew not well what to do with themselves. When David had fixed his head-quarters in the cave of Adullam, they came and enlisted themselves under him to the number of about four hundred. See what weak instruments God sometimes makes use of, by which to bring about his own purposes. The Son of David is ready to receive distressed souls, that will appoint him their Captain, and be commanded by him.

4. He took care to settle his parents in a place of safety; no such place could he find in all the land of Israel, while Saul was so bitterly enraged against him, and all that belonged to him for his sake; he therefore goes with them to the king of Moab, and puts them under his protection, v. 3, 4. Observe here, (1.) With what a tender concern he provided for his aged parents. It was not fit they should be exposed either to the frights or to the fatigues which he must expect during his struggle with Saul, (their age would by no means bear it,) therefore the first thing he does, is, to find them a quiet habitation, whatever became of himself. Let children learn from hence to show piety at home, and to requite their parents, (1 Tim. 5. 4.) in every thing consulting their ease and satisfaction; though ever so highly preferred, and ever so much employed, let them not forget their aged parents. (2.) With what an humble faith he expects the issue of his present distress, Till I know what God will do for me. He expresses his hopes very modestly, as one that had entirely cast himself upon God and committed his way to him, expecting a good issue, not from his own arts, or arms, or merits, but from what the wisdom, power, and goodness of God would do for him. Now David's father and mother forsook him, but God did not, Ps. 27. 10.

5. He had the advice and assistance of the prophet Gad, who, probably, was one of the sons of the prophets that were brought up under Samuel, and was by him recommended to David for his chaplain or spiritual guide; being a prophet, he would pray for him and instruct him in the mind of God; and David, though he was himself a prophet, was glad of his assistance. He advised him to go into the land of Judah, (v. 5.) as one that was confident of his own innocency, and was well assured of the divine protection, and was desirous, even in his present hard circumstances, to do some service to his tribe and country. Let him not be ashamed to own his own cause, nor decline the succours that would be offered him. Animated by this word, there he determined to appear publicly. Thus are the steps of a good man ordered by the Lord.

6. When Saul heard that David was discovered, and the men that were with him, (now Saul abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah, having his spear in his hand, and all his servants were standing about him;) 7. Then Saul said unto his servants that stood about him, Hear now, ye Benjamites, will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds; 8. That all of you have conspired against me, and there is none that sheweth me that my son hath made a league with the son of Jesse, and there is none of you that is sorry for me, or sheweth unto me that my son hath stirred up my servant against me, to lie in wait, as at this day? 9. Then answered Doeg the Edomite, which was set over the servants of Saul, and said, I saw the son of Jesse coming to Nob, to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub. 10. And he inquired of the LORD for him, and gave him victuals, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine. 11. Then the king sent to call Ahimelech the priest, the son of Ahitub, and all his father's house, the priests that were in Nob: and they came all of them to the king. 12. And Saul said, Hear now, thou son of Ahitub. And he answered, Here I am, my lord. 13. And Saul said unto him, Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread, and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him, that he should rise against me, to lie in wait, as at this day? 14. Then Ahimelech answered the king, and said, And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thine house? 15. Did I then begin to inquire of God for him? be it far from me. Let not the king impute any thing unto his servant, nor to all the house of my father: for thy servant knew nothing of all this, less or more. 16. And the king said, Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, thou and all thy father's house. 17. And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him, Turn, and slay the priests of the LORD; because their hand also is with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not show it to me. But the servants of the king would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the LORD. 18. And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests. And Doeg the Edomite turned, and he fell upon the priests, and slew on that day fourscore and five persons that did wear a linen ephod. 19. And Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword, both men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword.

We have seen the progress of David's troubles; now here we have the progress of Saul's wickedness. He seems to have laid aside the thoughts of all other business, and to have devoted himself wholly to the pursuit of David. He heard, at length, by the common fame of the country, that David was discovered, that is, that he appeared publicly, and enlisted men in his service; and hereupon he called all his servants about him, and sat down under a tree, or grove, in the high place at Gibeah, with his spear in his hand for a sceptre; intimating the force by which he designed to rule, and the present temper of his spirit, or its distemper rather, which was to kill all that stood in his way.

In this bloody court of inquisition,

I. Saul seeks for information against David and Jonathan, v. 7, 8. Two things he was willing to suspect, and desirous to see proved, that he might wreak his malice upon two of the best and most excellent men he had about him. 1. That his servant David did lie in wait for him, and seek his life, which was utterly false. He really sought David's life, and therefore pretended that David sought his life, though he could not charge him with any overt act that gave the least umbrage or suspicion. (2.) That his son Jonathan stirred him up to do so, and was confederate with him in compassing and imagining the death of the king. This also was notoriously false. A league of friendship there was between David and Jonathan, but no conspiracy in any evil thing; none of the articles of their covenant carried any mischief to Saul. If Jonathan had agreed, after the death of Saul, to resign to David, in compliance with the revealed will of God, what harm would that do to Saul? Yet thus the best friends to their prince and country have often been odiously represented as enemies to both; even Christ himself was so. He takes it for granted that Jonathan and David were in a plot against him, his crown and dignity, and is displeased with his servants that they do not give him information of it, supposing that they could not but know it; whereas really there was no such thing. See the nature of a jealous malice, and its pitiful arts to extort discoveries of things that are not. He looks upon all about him as his enemies, because they do not just say as he says; and tells them, (1.) That they were very unwise, and acted against the interest both of their tribe, (for they were Benjamites, and David, if he were advanced, would bring the honour into Judah which was now in Benjamin,) and of their families; for David would never be able to give them such rewards as he had for them, of fields and vineyards, and such preferment, to be colonels and captains. (2.) That they were unfaithful; You have conspired against me. What a continual agitation and torment are they in that give way to a spirit of jealousy! If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked; (Prov. 29. 12.) that is, they seem to be so in his eyes. (3.) That they were very unkind. He thought to work upon their good nature with that word. There is none of you that is so much as sorry for me, or solicitous for me, as some read it. By these reasonings he stirred them up to act vigorously, as the instruments of his malice, that they might take away his suspicions of them.

II. Though he could not learn any thing from his servants against David or Jonathan, yet he got information from Doeg, against Ahimelech the priest.

1. An indictment is brought against Ahimelech by Doeg, and he himself is evidence against him, v. 9, 10. Perhaps Doeg, as bad as he was, would not have given this information, if Saul had not extorted it for had he been very forward to it, he would have done it sooner: but now he thinks they must be all deemed traitors, if none of them be accusers, and therefore tells Saul what kindness Ahimelech had showed to David, which he himself happened to be an eye-witness of. He had inquired of God for him, (which the priest used not to do but for public persons and about public affairs,) and he had furnished him with bread and a sword. All this was true: but it was not the whole truth; he ought to have told Saul further, that David had made Ahimelech believe he was then going upon the king's business; so that what service he did to David, however it proved, was designed in honour to Saul, and this would have proved Ahimelech, whom Saul had in his power, and would have thrown all the blame upon David, who was cut off of his reach.

2. Ahimelech is seized, or summoned rather to appear before the king, and upon this indictment he is arraigned. The king sent for him and all the priests who attended the sanctuary, whom he supposed to be aiding and abetting; and they, not being conscious of any guilt, and therefore not apprehensive of any danger, came all of them to the king, (v. 11.) and none of them attempted to make an escape, or to flee to David for shelter, as they would have done, now that he had set up his standard, if they had been as much in his interest as Saul suspected they were. Saul arraigns him himself with the utmost disdain and indignation; (v. 12.) Hear now, thou son of Ahitub; not so much as calling him by his name, much less giving him his title of distinction. By this it appears that he had cast off the fear of God, that he showed no respect at all to his priests, but took a pleasure in affronting them and insulting over them. Ahimelech holds up his hand at the bar in these words, "Here I am, my lord, ready to hear my charge, knowing I have done no wrong." He does not demur to the jurisdiction of Saul's court, nor insist upon an exemption as a priest, no, not though he were a High Priest, to which office, that of the judge, or chief magistrate, had not long since been annexed; but Saul having now the sovereignty vested in him, in things pertaining to the king, even the High Priest lowers himself to a level with common Israelites. Let every soul be subject (even clergymen) to the higher powers.

3. His indictment is read to him, v. 13. That he, a false traitor, had joined himself with the son of Jesse in a plot to depose and murder the king. "His design" (says Saul) "was to rise up against me, and thou didst assist him with victuals and arms." See what bad constructions the most innocent actions are liable to; how unsafe they are, that live under a tyrannical government, and what reason we have to be thankful for the happy constitution and administration of the government we are under.

4. To this indictment he pleads Not guilty; (v. 14, 15.) he owns the fact, but denies that he did it traitorously or maliciously, or with any design against the king. He pleads that he was so far from knowing of any quarrel between Saul and David, that he really took David to have been as much in favour at court as ever he had been. Observe, He does not plead that David had told him an untruth, and with that had imposed upon him, though really it was so, because he would not proclaim the weakness of so good a man, no not for his own vindication, especially to Saul, who sought all occasions against him; but he insists upon the settled reputation David had, as the most faithful of all the servants of Saul; the honour the king had put upon him in marrying his daughter to him, the use the king had often made of him, and the trust he had reposed in him; he goes at thy bidding, and is honourable in thy house, and therefore any one would think it a meritorious piece of service to the crown, to show him respect, so far from apprehending it to be a crime. He pleads that he had been wont to inquire of God for him, when he was sent by Saul upon any expedition, and did it now as innocently as ever he had done it. He protests his abhorrence of the thought of being in a plot against the king; "Be it far from me, I mind my own business, and meddle not with state-matters." He begs the king's favour, Let him not impute any crime to us; and concludes with a declaration of his innocence, Thy servant knew nothing of all this. Could any man plead with more evidences of sincerity? Had he been tried by a jury of honest Israelites, he had certainly been acquitted, for who can find any fault in him? But,

5. Saul himself gives judgment against him; (v. 16.) Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, as a rebel, thou and all thy father's house. What could be more unjust? I saw under the sun, the place of judgment, that wickedness was there, Eccl. 3. 16. (1.) It was unjust that Saul should himself alone, give judgment in his own cause, without any appeal either to judge or prophet, to his privy-council, or to a council of war. (2.) That so fair a plea should be overruled or rejected without any reason given, or any attempt to disprove the allegations of it, but purely with a high hand. (3.) That sentence should be passed so hastily and with so much precipitation; the judge taking no time himself to consider of it, nor allowing the prisoner any time to move in arrest of judgment. (4.) That the sentence should be passed not only on Ahimelech himself, who was the only person accused by Doeg, but on all his father's house, against whom nothing was alleged: must the children be put to death for the fathers? (5.) That the sentence was pronounced in passion, not for the support of justice, but for the gratification of his brutish rage.

6. He issues out a warrant (a verbal warrant only) for the immediate execution of his bloody sentence.

(1.) He ordered his footmen to be the executioners of this sentence, but they refused, v. 17. Hereby he intended to put a further disgrace upon the priests; they may not die by the hands of his men of war, (as 1 Kings 2. 29.) or his usual ministers of justice, but his footmen must triumph over them, and wash their hands in their blood. [1.] Never was the command of a prince more barbarously given; Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord. This is spoken with such an air of impiety, as can scarce be paralleled. Had he seemed to forget their sacred office and relation to God, and take no notice of that, it had intimated some regret that men of that character should fall under his displeasure; but to call them the priests of the Lord then, when he ordered his footmen to cut their throats, looked as if, upon that very account, he hated them. God having rejected him, and ordered another to be anointed in his room, he seems well pleased with this opportunity of being avenged on the priests of the Lord, since God himself was out of his reach. What wickedness will not the evil spirit hurry men to, when he gets the dominion! He alleges, in his order, that which was utterly false, and unproved to him, that they knew when David fled; whereas they knew nothing of the matter. [2.] Never was the command of a prince more honourably disobeyed. The footmen had more sense and grace than their master. Though they might expect to be turned out of their places, if not punished and put to death for their refusal, yet, come on them what would, they would not offer to fall on the priests of the Lord, such a reverence had they for their office, and such a conviction of their innocence.

(2.) He ordered Doeg (the accuser) to be the executioner, and he did it. One would have thought that the footmen's refusal should have awakened Saul's conscience, and he should not have insisted upon the doing of a thing so barbarous as that his footmen started at the thought of it. But his mind was blinded and his heart hardened, and if they will not do it, the hands of the witness shall be upon them, Deut. 17. 7. The most bloody tyrants have found out instruments of their cruelty as barbarous as themselves; Doeg is no sooner commanded to fall upon the priests, than he does it willingly enough, and, meeting with no resistance, slays with his own hand (for aught that appears) on that same day eighty-five priests that were of the age of ministration, between twenty and fifty, for they wore a linen ephod, (v. 18.) and perhaps appeared at this time before Saul in their habits, and were slain in them. This (one would think) was enough to satiate the most blood-thirsty; but the horse-leech of persecution still cries, "Give, give." Doeg, by Saul's order no doubt, having murdered the priests, went to their city Nob, and put all to the sword there, (v. 19.) men, women, and children, and the cattle too. Barbarous cruelty, and such as one cannot think of without horror! Strange, that ever it should enter into the heart of man to be so impious, so inhuman! We may see in this, [1.] The desperate wickedness of Saul, when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him. Nothing so vile, but they may be hurried to it, who have provoked God to give them up to their heart's lusts. He that was so compassionate as to spare Agag and the cattle of the Amalekites, in disobedience to the command of God, could now, with unrelenting bowels, see the priests of the Lord murdered, and nothing spared of all that belonged to them. For that sin, God left him to this. [2.] The accomplishment of the threatenings long since pronounced against the house of Eli; for Ahimelech and his family were descendants from him. Though Saul was unrighteous in doing this, yet God was righteous in permitting it; now God performed against Eli that, at which the ears of them that heard it, must needs tingle, as he had told him that he would judge his house for ever, ch. 3. 11-13. No word of God shall fall to the ground. [3.] This may be considered as a great judgment upon Israel, and the just punishment of their desiring a king before the time God intended them one. How deplorable was the state of religion at this time in Israel! Though the ark had long been in obscurity, yet it was some comfort to them, that they had the altar, and priests to serve at it; but now to see their priests weltering in their own blood and the heirs of the priesthood too, and the city of the priests made a desolation, so that the altar of God must needs be neglected for want of attendants, and this by the unjust and cruel order of their own king, to satisfy his brutish rage—this could not but go to the heart of all pious Israelites, and make them wish a thousand times, they had been satisfied with the government of Samuel and his sons. The worst enemies of their nation could not have done them a greater mischief.

20. And one of the sons of Ahimelech the son of Ahitub, named Abiathar, escaped, and fled after David. 21. And Abiathar showed David that Saul had slain the Lord's priests. 22. And David said unto Abiathar, I knew it that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there, that he would surely tell Saul: I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house. 23. Abide thou with me, fear not; for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life: but with me thou shalt be in safeguard.

Here is,

1. The escape of Abiathar the son of Ahimelech, out of the desolation of the priests' city. Probably, when his father went to appear, upon Saul's summons, he was left at home to attend the altar, by which means he escaped the first execution, and, before Doeg and his bloodhounds came to Nob, he had intelligence of the danger, and had time to shift for his own safety. And whither should he go but to David? v. 20. They that suffer for the son of David, let them commit the keeping of their souls to him, 1 Pet. 4. 19.

2. David's resentment of the melancholy tidings he brought. He gave David an account of the bloody work Saul had made among the priests of the Lord, (v. 21.) as the disciples of John, when their master was beheaded, went and told Jesus, Matth. 14. 12. And David greatly lamented the calamity itself, but especially his being accessory to it; I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house, v. 22. Note, It is a great trouble to a good man, to find himself any way an occasion of the calamities of the church and ministry. David knew Doeg's character so well, that he feared he would do some such mischief as this, when he saw him at the sanctuary. I knew he would tell Saul. He calls him Doeg the Edomite, because he retained the heart of an Edomite, though, by embracing the profession of the Jewish religion, he had put on the mask of an Israelite.

3. The protection he granted to Abiathar. He perceived him to be terrified, as he had reason to be, and therefore bids him not fear, he would be as careful for him as for himself; With me thou shalt be in safeguard, v. 23. David, having now time to recollect himself, speaks with assurance of his own safety, and promises that Abiathar should have the full benefit of his protection. It is promised to the Son of David, that God will hide him in the shadow of his hand, (Isa. 49. 2.) and with him, all that are his, may be sure that they shall be in safeguard, Ps. 91. 1. David had now not only a prophet, but a priest, a High Priest, with him, to whom he was a blessing, and they to him, and both a happy omen of his success. Yet it appears, (by ch. 28. 6.) that Saul had a High Priest too, for he had a Urim to consult; it is supposed, he preferred Ahitub the father of Zadok, of the family of Eleazar; (1 Chron. 6. 8.) for even those that hate the power of godliness, yet will not be without the form. It must not be forgotten here, that David at this time penned the 52d Psalm, as appears by the title of that Psalm, wherein he represents Doeg not only as malicious and spiteful, but as false and deceitful: because, though what he said was, for the substance of it, true, yet he put false colours upon it, with a design to do mischief: yet even then, when the priesthood was become as a withered branch, he looks upon himself as a green olive tree in the house of God, v. 8. In this hurry and distraction that David was continually in, yet he found both time and a heart for communion with God, and found comfort in it.

CHAP. XXIII.

Saul, having made himself drunk with the blood of the priests of the Lord, is here, in this chapter, seeking David's life, who appears here doing good, and suffering ill, at the same time. Here is, I. The good service he did to his king and country, in rescuing the city of Keilah out of the hands of the Philistines, v. 1-6. II. The danger he was thereby brought into from the malice of the prince he served, and the treachery of the city he saved; and his deliverance, by divine direction, from that danger, v. 7-13. III. David in a wood, and his friend Jonathan visiting him there and encouraging him, v. 14-18. IV. The information which the Ziphites brought to Saul of David's haunts, and the expedition

Saul made in pursuit of him, v. 19-25. V. The narrow escape David had of falling into his hands, v. 26-29. Many are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of them all.

1. WHEN they told David, saying, Behold, the Philistines fight against Keilah, and they rob the threshing-floors. 2. Therefore David inquired of the Lord, saying, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? And the LORD said unto David, Go, and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah. 3. And David's men said unto him, Behold, we be afraid here in Judah: how much more then if we come to Keilah against the armies of the Philistines? 4. Then David inquired of the LORD yet again. And the LORD answered him, and said, Arise, go down to Keilah; for I will deliver the Philistines into thine hand. 5. So David and his men went to Keilah, and fought with the Philistines, and brought away their cattle, and smote them with a great slaughter. So David saved the inhabitants of Keilah. 6. And it came to pass, when Abiathar the son of Ahimelech fled to David to Keilah, that he came down with an ephod in his hand.

Now we find why the prophet Gad (by divine direction, no doubt) ordered David to go into the land of Judah; (ch. 22. 5.) it was, that since Saul neglected the public safety, he might take care of it, notwithstanding the ill treatment that was given him; for he must render good for evil, and therein be a type of him who not only ventured his life, but laid down his life, for them that were his enemies.

1. Tidings are brought to David, as to the patron and protector of his country's liberties, that the Philistines had made a descent upon the city of Keilah, and plundered the country thereabouts, v. 1. Probably, it was the departure both of Gad and David from Saul, that encouraged the Philistines to make this incursion. When princes begin to persecute God's people and ministers, let them expect no other than vexation on all sides. The way for any country to be quiet, is, to let God's church be quiet in it: if Saul fight against David, the Philistines shall fight against his country.

2. David is forward enough to come in for their relief, but is willing to inquire of the Lord concerning it. Here is an instance, (1.) Of David's generosity and public-spiritedness. Though his head and hands were full of his own business, and he had enough to do, with the little force he had, to secure himself, yet he was concerned for the safety of his country, and could not sit still to see that ravaged: nay, though Saul, whose business it was to guard the borders of his land, hated him and sought his life, yet he was willing, to the utmost of his power, to serve him and his interests against the common enemy, and bravely abhorred the thought of sacrificing the common welfare to his private revenge. Those are unlike to David, who sullenly declined to do good, because they have not been so well considered as they deserved for the services they have done. (2.) Of David's piety and regard to God. He inquired of the Lord by the prophet Gad; for it should seem by v. 6. that Abiathar came not to him with the ephod till he was in Keilah. His inquiry is, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? He inquires both concerning the duty, whether he might lawfully take Saul's work out of his hand, and act without a commission from him; and concerning the event, whether he might safely venture against such a force as the Philistines had, with such a handful of men at his feet, and such a dangerous enemy as Saul was, at his back. It is our duty, and will be our ease and comfort, whatever happens, to acknowledge God in all our ways, and to seek direction from him.

3. God appointed him, once and again, to go against the Philistines, and promised him success; Go, and smite the Philistines, v. 2. His men opposed it, v. 3. No sooner did he begin to have soldiers of his own, than he found it hard enough to manage them. They objected, that they had enemies enough among their own countrymen, they needed not to make the Philistines their enemies. Their hearts failed them, when they only apprehended themselves in danger from Saul's band of pursuers, much more when they came to engage the Philistine armies. To satisfy them therefore, he inquired of the Lord again, and now received, not only a full commission, which would warrant him to fight, though he had no orders from Saul, (Arise, go down to Keilah;) but also a full assurance of victory; I will deliver the Philistines into thine hand, v. 4. This was enough to animate the greatest coward he had in his regiment.

4. He went, accordingly, against the Philistines, routed them, and rescued Keilah; (v. 5.) and, it should seem, he made a sally into the country of the Philistines, for he carried off their cattle by way of reprisal for the wrong they did to the men of Keilah, in robbing their threshing-floors. Here notice is taken, (v. 6.) that it was while David remained in Keilah, after he had cleared it of the Philistines, that Abiathar came to him with the ephod in his hand, that is, the High Priest's ephod, in which the Urim and Thummim were. It was a great comfort to David, in his banishment, that when he could not go to the house of God, he had some of the choicest treasures of that house brought to him, the High Priest, and the breast-plate of judgment.

7. And it was told Saul that David was come to Keilah. And Saul said, God hath delivered him into mine hand; for he is shut in, by entering into a town that hath gates and bars. 8. And Saul called all the people together to war, to go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men. 9. And David knew that Saul secretly practised mischief against him; and he said to Abiathar the priest, Bring hither the ephod. 10. Then said David, O LORD God of Israel, thy servant hath certainly heard that Saul seeketh to come to Keilah, to destroy the city for my sake. 11. Will the men of Keilah deliver me up into his hand? will Saul come down, as thy servant hath heard? O LORD God of Israel, I beseech thee, tell thy servant. And the LORD said, He will come down. 12. Then said David, Will the men of Keilah deliver me and my men into the hand of Saul? And the LORD said, They will deliver thee up. 13. Then David and his men, which were about six hundred, arose and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go. And it was told Saul that David was escaped from Keilah: and he forbore to go forth.

Here is,

I. Saul contriving within himself the destruction of David, v. 7, 8. He heard that he was come to Keilah; and did he not hear what brought him thither? Was it not told him that he had bravely relieved Keilah, and delivered it out of the hands of the Philistines? This, one would think, should have put Saul upon considering what honour and dignity should be done to David for this. But instead of that he catches at it as an opportunity of doing him a mischief. An ungrateful wretch he was, and for ever unworthy to have any service or kindness done him. Well might David complain of his enemies, that they rewarded him evil for good, and that for his love they were his adversaries, Ps. 35. 12.—109. 4. Christ was used thus basely, John 10. 32. Now observe, 1. How Saul abused the God of Israel, in making his providence to patronise and give countenance to his malicious designs, and from thence promising himself success in them. God hath delivered him into my hand; as if he, who was rejected of God, were, in this instance, owned and favoured by him, and David infatuated. He vainly triumphs before the victory, forgetting how often he had had fairer advantages against David than he had now, and yet missed his aim. He impiously connects God with his cause, because he thought he had gained one point. Therefore David prays, (Ps. 140. 8.) Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked; further not his wicked device, lest they exalt themselves. We must not think that one smiling providence either justifies an unrighteous cause, or secures its success. 2. How Saul abused the Israel of God, in making them the servants of his malice against David. He called all the people together to war, and they must with all speed march to Keilah, pretending to oppose the Philistines, but intending to besiege David and his men; concealing that design, for it is said, (v. 9.) he secretly practised mischief against him. Miserable is that people, whose prince is a tyrant; for while some are sufferers by his tyranny, others (which is worse) are made servants to it, and instruments of it.

II. David consulting with God concerning his own preservation. He knew, by the information brought him, that Saul was plotting his ruin, (v. 9.) and therefore applies himself to his great Protector for direction. No sooner is the ephod brought him, than he makes use of it, Bring hither the ephod. We have the scriptures, those lively oracles, in our hands, let us take advice from them in doubtful cases: "Bring hither the Bible." David's address to God, upon this occasion, is, 1. Very solemn and reverent. Twice he calls God, the LORD God of Israel, and thrice calls himself his servant, v. 10, 11. Those that address God, must know their distance, and who they are speaking to. 2. Very particular and express. His representation of the case is so, v. 10. "Thy servant has certainly heard on good authority" (for he would not call for the ephod upon every idle rumour) "that Saul has a design upon Keilah;" he does not say, "to destroy me," but, "to destroy the city" (as he had lately done the city of Nob) "for my sake." He seems more solicitous for their safety than for his own, and will expose himself any where, rather than they shall be brought into trouble by his being among them. Generous souls are thus minded. His queries upon the case are likewise very particular. God allows us to be so in our addresses to him; "Lord, direct me in this matter, about which I am now at a loss." He does indeed invert the due order of his queries, but God in his answer puts him into method. That question should have been put first, and was first answered, "Will Saul come down, as thy servant has heard?" "Yea," says the oracle, "he will come down; he has resolved it, is preparing for it, and will do it, unless he hear that thou hast quitted the town." "Well, but if he do come down, will the men of Keilah stand by me in holding the city against him, or will they open him the gates, and deliver me into his hand?" If he had asked the men (that is, the magistrates or elders) of Keilah themselves, what they would do in that case, they could not have told him, not knowing their own minds, nor what they should do when it came to the trial, much less which way the superior vote of their council would carry it; or they might have told him they would protect him, and yet afterward have betrayed him; but God could tell them infallibly: "When Saul besieges their city, and demands of them that they surrender thee into his hands, how fond soever they now seem of thee, as their saviour, they will deliver thee up, rather than stand the shock of Saul's fury." Note, (1.) God knows all men better than they know themselves, knows their strength, what is in them, and what they will do, if they come into such and such circumstances. (2.) He therefore knows not only what will be, but what would be if it were not prevented; and therefore knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and how to render to every man according to his works.

David having thus fair notice given him of his danger, quitted Keilah, v. 13. His followers were now increased in number to six hundred; with these he went out, not knowing whither he went, but resolving to follow Providence, and put himself under its protection. This broke Saul's measures; he thought God had delivered him into his hand, but it proved that God delivered him out of his hand, as a bird out of the snare of the fowler. When Saul heard that David was escaped from Keilah, he forbore to go forth with the body of the army, as he intended, (v. 8.) and resolved to take only his own guards, and go in quest of him. Thus does God baffle the design of his people's enemies, and turn their counsels headlong.

14. And David abode in the wilderness in strong holds, and remained in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph: and Saul sought him every day; but God delivered him not into his hand. 15. And David saw that Saul was come out to seek his life: and David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a wood. 16. And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose, and went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God. 17. And he said unto him, Fear not; for the hand of Saul my father shall not find thee: and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee; and that also Saul my father knoweth. 18. And they two made a covenant before the LORD. And David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house.

Here is,

I. David absconding. He abode in a wilderness, in a mountain, (v. 14.) in a wood, v. 15. We must here, 1. Commend his eminent virtues, his humility, modesty, fidelity to his prince, and patient attendance on the providence of his God, that he did not draw up his forces against Saul, fight him in the field, or surprise him by some stratagem or other, and so avenge his own quarrel and that of the Lord's priests upon him, and put an end to his own troubles, and the calamities of the country under his tyrannical government. No, he makes no such attempt; he keeps God's way, waits God's time, and is content to secure himself in woods and wildernesses, though with some it might seem a reproach to that courage for which he had been famous. But, 2. We must also lament his hard fate, that an innocent man should be thus terrified, and put in fear of his life; that a man of honour should be thus disgraced, a man of merit thus recompensed for his services, and a man that delighted in the service both of God and his country, should be debarred from both, and wrapt up in obscurity. What shall we say to this? Let it make us think the worse of this world, which often gives such bad treatment to its best men: let it reconcile even great and active men to privacy and restraint, if Providence make that their lot, for it was David's: and let it make us long for that kingdom, where goodness shall for ever be in glory, and holiness in honour, and the righteous shall shine as the sun.

II. Saul hunting him as his implacable enemy. He sought him every day, so restless was his malice, v. 14. He sought his life no less, so cruel was his malice, v. 15. As it had been from the beginning, it was now, and will be. He that is born after the flesh, persecuteth him that is born after the spirit, Gal. 4. 29.

III. God defending him as his powerful Protector. God delivered him not into his hand, as Saul hoped; (v. 7.) and unless God had delivered him into his hand, he could not prevail against him, John 19. 11.

IV. Jonathan comforting him, as his faithful friend. True friends will find out means to get together; David, it is likely, appointed time and place for this interview, and Jonathan observed it, though he exposed himself by it to his father's displeasure, and, had it been discovered it might have cost him his life. True friendship will not shrink from danger, but can easily venture; will not shrink from condescension, but can easily stoop, and exchange a palace for a wood, to serve a friend. The very sight of Jonathan was reviving to David; but beside that, he said that to him, which was very encouraging.

1. As a pious friend, he directed him to God, the Foundation of his confidence, and the Fountain of his comfort. He strengthened his hand in God. David, though a strong believer, needed the help of his friends, for the perfecting of what was lacking in his faith; and herein Jonathan was helpful to him, by reminding him of the promise of God, the holy oil wherewith he was anointed, the presence of God with him hitherto, and the many experiences he had had of God's goodness to him. Thus he strengthened his hands for action, by encouraging his heart, not in the creature, but in God. Jonathan was not in a capacity of doing any thing to strengthen him, but he assured him God would.

2. As a self-denying friend, he takes a pleasure in the prospect of David's advancement to that honour which was his own birthright; (v. 17.) "Thou shalt live to be king, and I shall think it preferment enough to be next thee, near thee, though under thee, and will never pretend to be a rival with thee." This resignation which Jonathan made to David of his title, would be a great satisfaction to him, and make his way much the more clear. This, he tells him, Saul knew very well; Jonathan having sometimes heard him say as much. Whence it appears, what a wicked man Saul was, to persecute one whom God favoured; and what a foolish man he was, in thinking to prevent that which God had determined, and which would certainly come to pass. How could he disannul what God had purposed?

3. As a constant friend, he renewed his league of friendship with him; they two made a covenant now, this third time, before the Lord, calling him to witness to it, v. 18. True love takes delight in repeating its engagements, giving and receiving fresh assurances of the firmness of their friendship. Our covenant with God should be often renewed, and therein our communion with him kept up. David and Jonathan now parted, and never came together again, that we find, in this world; for Jonathan said what he wished, not what he had ground to expect, when he promised himself that he should be next to David in his kingdom.

19. Then came up the Ziphites to Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself with us in strong holds in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon? 20. Now therefore, O king, come down, according to all the desire of thy soul to come down; and our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand. 21. And Saul said, Blessed be ye of the Lord; for ye have compassion on me. 22. Go, I pray you, prepare yet, and know and see his place where his haunt is, and who hath seen him there: for it is told me that he dealeth very subtilly. 23. See therefore, and take knowledge of all the lurking-places where he hideth himself, and come ye again to me with the certainty, and I will go with you: and it shall come to pass, if he be in the land, that I will search him out throughout all the thousands of Judah. 24. And they arose, and went to Ziph before Saul: but David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon, in the plain on the south of Jeshimon. 25. Saul also and his men went to seek him. And they told David: wherefore he came down into a rock, and abode in the wilderness of Maon. And when Saul heard that, he pursued after David in the wilderness of Maon. 26. And Saul went on this side of the mountain, and David and his men on that side of the mountain: and David made haste to get away for fear of Saul; for Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take them. 27. But there came a messenger unto Saul, saying, Haste thee, and come; for the Philistines have invaded the land. 28. Wherefore Saul returned from pursuing after David, and went against the Philistines: therefore they called that place Sela-hammah-lekoth. 29. And David went up from thence, and dwelt in strong holds at En-gedi.

Here,

1. The Ziphites offer their services to Saul, and betray David to him, v. 19. 20. He was sheltering himself in the wilderness of Ziph, (v. 14, 15.) putting the more confidence in the people of that country, because they were of his own tribe. They had reason to think themselves happy, that they had an opportunity of serving one, who was the ornament of their tribe, and was likely to be much more so: who was so far from plundering the country; or giving it any disturbance with his troops, that he was ready to protect it, and do them all the good offices that there was occasion for. But, to ingratiate themselves with Saul, they went to him, and not only informed him very particularly where David quartered, (v. 19.) but invited him to come with his forces into their country in pursuit of him, and promised to deliver him into his hand, v. 20. Saul had not sent to examine or threaten them, but of their own accord, and even without asking a reward, (as Judas did, What will ye give me?) they proffer to betray David to him, who, they knew, thirsted after his blood.

2. Saul thankfully receives their information, and gladly lays hold on the opportunity of hunting David in their wilderness, in hopes to make a prey of him at length. He intimates to them how kindly he took it; (v. 21.) Blessed be ye of the Lord, (so near is God to his mouth, though far from his heart,) for ye have compassion on me. It seems he looked upon himself as a miserable man and an object of pity; his own envy and ill nature made him so, else he might have been easy, and have needed no man's compassion. He likewise insinuates the little concern that the generality of his people showed for him: "You have compassion on me, which others have not." Saul gives them instructions to search more particularly for his haunts, (v. 22.) "For," says he, "I hear he deals very subtilly;" representing him as a man crafty to do mischief, whereas all his subtilty was to secure himself. It was strange that he did not go down with them immediately, but he hoped, by their means, to set his game with the more certainty, and thus Divine Providence gave David time to shift for himself. But the Ziphites had laid their spies upon all the places where he was likely to be discovered, and therefore Saul might come and seize him, if he was in the land, v. 23. Now he thought himself sure of his prey, and pleased himself with the thoughts of devouring it.

3. The eminent peril that David was now brought into. Upon intelligence that the Ziphites had betrayed him, he retired from the hill of Hachilah to the wilderness of Maon, (v. 24.) and at this time he penned the 54th Psalm, as appears by the title, wherein he calls the Ziphites strangers, though they were Israelites, because they used him barbarously; but he puts himself under the divine protection. "Behold, God is my Helper, and then all shall be well." Saul, having got intelligence of him, pursued him closely, (v. 25.) till he came so near him, that there was but a mountain between them; (v. 26.) David and his men on the one side of the mountain flying, and Saul and his men on the other side pursuing; David in fear, and Saul in hope. But this mountain was an emblem of the Divine Providence coming between David and the destroyer, like the pillar of cloud between the Israelites and the Egyptians; David was concealed by this mountain, and Saul confounded by it. David now flees as a bird to his mountain, (Ps. 11. 1.) and finds God to him as the shadow of a great rock. Saul hoped with his numerous forces, to enclose David, and compass him in and his men; but the ground did not prove convenient for his design, and so it failed. A new name was given to the place in remembrance of this, v. 28, Sela-hammah-lekoth, the rock of division, because it divided between Saul and David.

4. The deliverance of David out of this danger. Providence gave Saul a diversion when he was just ready to lay hold on David; notice was brought him that the Philistines were invading the land,

(v. 27.) probably, that part of the land where his own estate lay, which would be seized, or at least spoiled, by the invaders: for the little notice he took of Keilah's distress, and David's relief of it in the beginning of this chapter, give us cause to suspect that he would not now have left pursuing David, and gone to oppose the Philistines, if some private interests of his own had not been at stake. However it was, he found himself under a necessity of going against the Philistines, (v. 28.) and by this means David was delivered when he was on the brink of destruction; Saul was disappointed of his prey, and God was glorified as his wonderful Protector. When the Philistines invaded the land, they were far from intending any kindness to David by it; yet the overruling providence of God, which orders all events, and the times of them, made it very serviceable to him. The wisdom of God is never at a loss for ways and means to preserve his people. As this Saul was here diverted, so another Saul was converted, just when he was breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the saints of the Lord, Acts 9. 1.

Lastly, David having thus escaped, took shelter in some natural fortresses, which he found in the wilderness of En-gedi, v. 29. And this Dr. Lightfoot thinks was the wilderness of Judah, in which David was, when he penned the 63d Psalm, which breathes as much pious and devout affections as almost any of his Psalms; for in all places, and in all conditions, he still kept up his communion with God.

CHAP. XXIV.

We have hitherto had Saul seeking an opportunity to destroy David, and, to his shame, he could never find it. In this chapter David had a fair opportunity to destroy Saul, and, to his honour, he did not make use of it; his sparing Saul's life, was as great an instance of God's grace in him, as the preserving of his own life was of God's providence over him. Observe, I. How maliciously Saul sought David's life, v. 1, 2. II. How generously David saved Saul's life, (when he had him at an advantage,) and only cut off the skirt of his robe, v. 3. . 8. III. How pathetically he reasoned with Saul, upon this, to bring him to a better temper towards him, v. 9. . 15. IV. The good impressions this made upon Saul, for the present, v. 16. . 22.

1. AND it came to pass, when Saul was returning from following the Philistines, that it was told him, saying, Behold, David is in the wilderness of En-gedi. 2. Then Saul took three thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats. 3. And he came to the sheep-cotes by the way, where was a cave; and Saul went in to cover his feet: and David and his men remained in the sides of the cave. 4. And the men of David said unto him, Behold the day of which the LORD said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, that thou mayest do to him as it shall seem good unto thee. Then David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily. 5. And it came to pass afterward, that David's heart smote him, because he had cut off Saul's skirt. 6. And he said unto his men, The LORD forbid that I should do this thing unto my master, the LORD's anointed, to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the LORD. 7. So David stayed his servants with these words, and suffered them not to rise against Saul. But Saul rose up out of the cave, and went on his way. 8. David also rose afterward, and went out of the cave, and cried after Saul, saying, My lord the king. And when Saul looked behind him, David stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.

Here,

I. Saul renews his pursuit of David, v. 1, 2. No sooner is he come home safe from chasing the Philistines, in which it should seem he had good success, than he inquires after David to do him a mischief, and resolves to have another thrust at him, as if he had been delivered to do all those abominations, Jer. 7. 10. By the frequent incursions of the Philistines, he might have seen how necessary it was to recall David from his banishment, and restore him to his place in the army again; but so far is he from that, that now, more than ever, he is exasperated against him; and, hearing that he is in the wilderness of En-gedi, he draws out three thousand choice men, and goes with them at his feet in pursuit of him, upon the rocks of the wild goats, where, one would think, David should not be envied an habitation, nor Saul be desirous to disturb him; for what harm could he fear from one who was no better accommodated? But it is not enough to Saul, that he is thus cooped up; he cannot be easy while he is alive.

II. Providence brings Saul alone into the same cave wherein David and his men had hid themselves, v. 3. In those countries there were very large caves in the sides of the rocks or mountains, partly natural, but, probably, much enlarged by art, for the sheltering of sheep from the heat of the sun; hence we read of places where the flocks did rest at noon, (Cant. 1. 7.) and this cave seems to be spoken of as one of the sheep-cotes. In the sides of this cave David and his men remained; perhaps not all his men, the whole 600, but only some few of his particular friends, the rest being disposed of in similar retirements. Saul, passing by, turned in himself alone, not in search of David, (for, supposing him to be an aspiring ambitious man, he thought to find him rather climbing with the wild goats upon the rocks, than retiring with the sheep into a cave,) but thither he turned aside to cover his feet, that is, to sleep a while, it being a cool and quiet place, and very refreshing in the heat of the day: probably, he ordered his attendants to march before, reserving only a very few to wait for him at the mouth of the cave.

III. David's servants stir him up to kill Saul, now that he had so fair an opportunity to do it, v. 4. They remind him that this was the day which he had long looked for, and of which God had spoken to him in general when he was anointed to the kingdom, which should put a period to his troubles, and open the passage to his advancement. Saul now lay at his mercy, and it was easy to imagine how little mercy he should find with Saul, and therefore what little reason he had to show mercy to him. "By all means," say his servants, "give him the fatal blow now." See how apt we are to misunderstand, 1. The promises of God. God had assured David he would deliver him from Saul, and his men interpret that as a warrant to destroy Saul. 2. The providences of God; because it was now in his power to kill him, they concluded he might lawfully do it.

IV. David cut off the skirt of his robe, but soon repented that he had done that: his heart smote him for it, v. 5. though he did Saul no real hurt, and served David for a proof that it was in his power to have killed him; (v. 11.) yet, because it was an affront to Saul's royal dignity, he wished he had not done it. Note, It is a good thing to have a heart within us, smiting us for sins that seem little; it is a sign that conscience is awake and tender, and will be the means of preventing greater sins.

V. He reasons strongly both with himself and with his servants, against doing Saul any hurt. 1. He reasons with himself: (v. 6.) The Lord forbid that I should do this thing. Note, Sin is a thing which it becomes us to startle at, and to resist the temptations to, not only with resolution, but with a holy indignation. He considers Saul now, not as his enemy, and the only person that stood in the way of his preferment, for then he would be induced to hearken to the temptation, but as God's anointed, that is, the person whom God had appointed to reign as long as he lived, and who, 'as such, was under the particular protection of the divine law; and as his master, to whom he was obliged to be faithful. Let servants and subjects learn hence to be dutiful and loyal, whatever hardships are put upon them, 1 Pet. 2. 18. 2. He reasons with his servants. He suffered them not to rise against Saul, v. 7. He would not only not do this bad thing himself, but he would not suffer those about him to do it. Thus did he render good for evil to him from whom he had received evil for good; and was herein both a type of Christ, who saved his persecutors, and an example to all Christians, not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good.

VI. He follows Saul out of the cave, and though he would not take the opportunity to slay him, yet he wisely took the opportunity, if possible, to slay his enmity, by convincing him that he was not such a man as he took him for. 1. Even in showing his head, he testified that he had an honourable opinion of Saul. He had too much reason to believe that, let him say what he would, Saul would immediately be the death of him, as soon as he saw him, and yet he bravely lays aside that jealousy, and thinks Saul so much a man of sense as to hear his reasoning, when he had so much to say in his own vindication, and such fresh and sensible proofs to give of his own integrity. 2. His behaviour was very respectful, he stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself, giving honour to whom honour was due, and teaching us to order ourselves lowly and reverently to all our superiors, even to those that have been most injurious to us.

9. And David said to Saul, Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt? 10. Behold, this day thine eyes have seen how that the LORD hath delivered thee to-day into mine hand in the cave: and some bade me kill thee; but mine eye spared thee: and I said, I will not put forth mine hand against my lord; for he is the LORD's anointed. 11. Moreover, my father, see; yea, see the skirt of thy robe in mine hand: for in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe, and killed thee not, know thou and see that there is neither evil nor transgression in mine hand, and I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest my soul to take it. 12. The LORD judge between me and thee, and the LORD avenge me of thee: but mine hand shall not be upon thee. 13. As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked: but mine hand shall not be upon thee. 14. After whom is the king of Israel come out? After whom dost thou pursue? After a dead dog, after a flea? 15. The LORD therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thine hand.

We have here David's warm and pathetic speech to Saul, wherein he endeavours to convince him that he did him a great deal of wrong in persecuting him thus, and to persuade him therefore to be reconciled.

1. He calls him father; (v. 11.) for he was not only, as king, the father of his country, but he was, in particular, his father-in-law. From a father one may expect compassion, and a favourable opinion. For a prince to seek the ruin of any of his good subjects, is as unnatural as for a father to seek the ruin of his own children.

2. He lays the blame of his rage against him upon his evil counsellors; Wherefore hearest thou men's words? v. 9. It is a piece of respect owing to crowned heads, if they do amiss, to charge it upon those about them, who either advised them to it, or should have advised them against it. David had reason enough to think that Saul persecuted him purely from his own envy and malice, yet he decently supposes that others put him on to do it, and made him believe that David was his enemy, and sought his hurt. Satan, the great accuser of the brethren, has his agents in all places, and particularly in the courts of those princes that encourage them and give ear to them, who make it their business to represent the people of God as enemies to Caesar and hurtful to kings and princes, that, being thus dressed up in bear skins, they may "be baited."

3. He solemnly pretexts his own innocence, and that he was far from designing any hurt or mischief to Saul, "There is neither evil nor transgression in my hand, v. 11. I am not chargeable with any crime, nor conscious of any guilt, and, had I a window in my breast, thou mightest through it see the sincerity of my heart in this protestation. I have not sinned against thee; (however I have sinned against God's) yet thou huntest my soul," that is, "my life." Perhaps it was about this time, that David penned the seventh Psalm, concerning the business of Cush the Benjamite, that is, Saul, as some think, wherein he appeals to God, (v. 3-5.) If there be iniquity in my hand, then let the enemy persecute my soul and take it; putting in a parenthesis, with reference to the story of this chapter. Yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy.

4. He produces undeniable evidence to prove the falseness of the suggestion upon which Saul's malice against him was grounded; David was charged with seeking Saul's hurt; "See," says he, "yea, see the skirt of thy robe; (v. 11.) let this be a witness for me, and an unexceptionable witness it is: had that been true which I am accused of, I had now had thy head in my hand, and not the skirt of thy robe, for I could as easily have cut off that as this." To corroborate this evidence, he shows him, (1.) That God's providence had given him an opportunity to do it. The Lord delivered thee, very surprisingly, to-day into mine hand; whence many a one would have gathered an intimation, that it was the will of God he should now give the determining blow to him whose neck lay so fair for it. When Saul had but a very small advantage against David, he cried out, God has delivered him into my hand, (ch. 23. 7.) and resolved to make the best of that advantage; but David did not so. (2.) That his counsellors and those about him had earnestly put him on to do it. Some bade me kill thee. He had blamed Saul for hearkening to men's words, and justly; "for," says he, "if I had done so, thou hadst not been alive now." (3.) That it was upon a good principle, that he refused to do it; not because his attendants were at hand, who, it may be, would have avenged his death; no, it was not by the fear of them, but by the fear of God, that he was restrained from it; "He is my Lord, and the Lord's anointed, whom I ought to protect, and to whom I owe faith and allegiance, and therefore I said, I will not touch a hair of his head. Such a happy command he had of himself, that his nature, in the midst of the greatest provocation, was not suffered to rebel against his principles.

5. He declares it his fixed resolution never to be his own avenger. The Lord avenge me of thee; that is, "deliver me out of thy hand; but, whatever comes of it, my hand shall not be upon thee;" (v. 12. and again, v. 13.) as saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked. The wisdom of the ancients is transmitted to posterity by their proverbial sayings: many such we receive by tradition from our fathers; and the counsels of common persons are very much directed by this, "As the old saying is." Here is one that was in use in David's time, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked; that is, (1.) Men's own iniquity will ruin them at last. So some understand it. Forward furious men will cut their own throats with their own knives. Give them rope enough, and they will hang themselves. In this sense it comes in very fitly as a reason why his hand should not be upon him. (2.) Bad men will do bad things; according as men's principles and dispositions are, accordingly will their actions be: this suits the connexion. If David had been a wicked man, as he was represented, he would have done this wicked thing; but he durst not, because of the fear of God. Or thus: Whatever injuries bad men do us, (which we are not to wonder at; he that lies among thorns, must expect to be scratched,) yet we must not return them; never render railing for railing: though wickedness proceed from the wicked, yet let it not therefore proceed from us by way of retaliation. Though the dog bark at the sheep, the sheep does not bark at the dog. See Isa. 32. 6.-8.

6. He endeavours to convince him, that as it was a bad thing, so it was a mean thing, for him to give chase to such an inconsiderable person as David was; (v. 14.) Whom does the king of Israel pursue with all this care and force? A dead dog; a flea; one flea; so it is in the Hebrew. It is below so great a king to enter the lists with one that is so unequal a match for him, one of his own servants, bred a poor shepherd, now an exile; neither able nor willing to make any resistance. To conquer him would not be to his honour, to attempt it was his disparagement. If Saul would consult his own reputation, he would slight such an enemy, (supposing he were really his enemy,) and would think himself in no danger from him. David was so far from aspiring, that he was, in his own account, as a dead dog; Mephibosheth thus calls himself, 2 Sam. 9. 8. This humble language would have wrought upon Saul, if he had any spark of generosity in him; Satis est prostrasse leonem—Enough for the lion, that he has laid his victim low. What credit would it be to Saul to trample upon a dead dog? What pleasure could it be to him to hunt a flea, a single flea? Which, (as some have observed,) if it be sought, is not easily found, if it be found, not easily caught, and if it be caught, is a poor prize, especially for a prince. Aquila non capit muscas—The eagle does not dart upon flies. David thinks Saul had no more reason to fear him, than to fear a flea-bite.

7. He once and again appeals to God as the righteous Judge; (v. 12. and v. 15.) The Lord judge between me and thee. Note, The justice of God is the refuge and comfort of oppressed innocence. If men wrong us, God will right us, at furthest, in the judgment of the great day. With him David leaves his cause, and so rests satisfied waiting his time to appear for him.

16. And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David? And Saul lifted up his voice and wept. 17. And he said to David, Thou art more righteous than I: for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil. 18. And thou hast showed this day how that thou hast dealt well with me: forasmuch as, when the LORD had delivered me into thine hand, thou killedst me not. 19. For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? Wherefore the LORD reward thee good for that thou hast done unto me this day. 20. And now, behold, I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand. 21. Swear now therefore unto me by the LORD, that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house. 22. And David sware unto Saul. And Saul went home: but David and his men gat them up unto the hold.

Here is,

1. Saul's penitent reply to David's speech. It was strange that he had patience to hear him out, considering how outrageous he was against him, and how cutting David's discourse was: but God restrained him and his men; and we may suppose Saul struck with amazement at the singularity of the event, and much more when he found how much he had lain at David's mercy. His heart must have been harder than a stone, if this had not affected him.

1. He melted into tears; and we will not suppose them to be counterfeit, but real expressions of his present concern at the sight of his own iniquity, so plainly proved upon him. He speaks as one quite overcome with David's kindness; Is this thy voice, my son David? And, as one that relented at the thought of his own folly and ingratitude, he lifted up his voice and wept, v. 16. Many mourn for their sins, that do not truly repent of them; weep bitterly for them, and yet continue in love and league with them.

2. He ingenuously acknowledged David's integrity, and his own iniquity; (v. 17.) Thou art more righteous than I. Now God made good to David that word on which he had caused him to hope, that he would bring forth his righteousness as the light, Ps. 37. 6. They who take care to keep a good conscience, may leave it to God to secure them the credit of it. This fair confession was enough to prove David innocent, (even his enemy himself being judge,) but not enough to prove Saul himself a true penitent. He should have said, Thou art righteous, but I am wicked; but the utmost he will own is this, Thou art more righteous than I. Bad men will commonly go no further than this in their confessions; but they will own they are not so good as some others are; there are that are better than they, and more righteous. He now owns himself under a mistake concerning David; (v. 18.) "Thou hast showed this day, that thou art so far from seeking my hurt, that thou hast dealt well with me." We are too apt to suspect others to be worse affected towards us than really they are, and than perhaps they are proved to be; when, afterward, our mistake is discovered, we should be forward to recall our suspicions, as Saul does here.

3. He prays God to recompense David for this his generous kindness to him. He owns that David's sparing him when he had him in his power, was an uncommon and an unparalleled instance of tenderness to an enemy; no man would have done the like; and therefore, either because he thought himself not able to give him a full recompense for so great a favour, or, because he found himself not inclined to give him any recompense at all, he turns him over to God for his pay; The Lord reward thee good, v. 19. Poor beggars can do no less than pray for their benefactors, and Saul did no more.

4. He prophesies his advancement to the throne; (v. 20.) I know well that thou shalt surely be king. He knew it before, by the promise Samuel had made him of it, compared with the excellent spirit that appeared in David, which highly aggravated his sin and folly, in persecuting him as he did; he had as much reason to say, concerning David, as David concerning him, How can I put forth my hand against the Lord's anointed? But now he knew it by the interest he found he had in the people, the special providence of God in protecting him, and the generous kingly spirit he had now given a proof of in sparing his enemy. Now he knew it; that is, now that he was in a good temper, he was willing to own that he knew it, and to submit to the conviction of it. Note, Sooner or later, God will force even those that are of the synagogue of Satan, to know and own those that he has loved, and to worship before their feet; for so it is promised, Rev. 3. 9. This acknowledgment which Saul made of David's incontestable title to the crown, was a great encouragement to David himself, and a support to his faith and hope.

5. He binds David with an oath, hereafter to show the same tenderness of his seed, and of his name, as he had now showed of his person, v. 21. David had more reason to oblige Saul by an oath that he would not destroy him, yet he insists not on that; (if the laws of justice and honour would not bind him, an oath would not;) but Saul knew David to be a conscientious man, and would think his interests safe, if he could get them secured by his oath. Saul, by his disobedience, had ruined his own soul, and never took care by repentance to prevent that ruin, and yet is very solicitous that his name might not be destroyed, nor his seed cut off. However, David sware unto him, v. 22. Though he might be tempted, not only in revenge, but in prudence, to extirpate Saul's family, yet he binds himself not to do it, knowing that God could and would establish the kingdom to him and his, without the use of such bloody methods. This oath he afterward religiously observed; he supported Mephibosheth, and executed those as traitors, that slew Ish-bosheth. The hanging up of several of Saul's posterity, to atone for the destruction of the Gibeonites, was God's appointment, not David's act, and therefore not the violation of this oath.

II. Their parting in peace. 1. Saul, for the present, let fall the persecution: he went home convinced, but not converted; ashamed of his envy to David, yet retaining in his breast that root of bitterness; vexed that, when at last he had found David, he could not at that time find in his heart to destroy him, as he had designed. God has many ways to tie the hands of persecutors, when he does not turn their hearts. 2. David continued to shift for his own safety; he knew Saul too well to trust him, and therefore got him up into the hold. It is dangerous venturing upon the mercy of a reconciled enemy. We read of those who believed in Christ, and yet he did not commit himself to them, because he knew all men. They that like David are innocent as doves, must thus like him be wise as serpents.

CHAP. XXV.

We have here some intermission of David's troubles by Saul. Providence favoured him with a breathing time, and yet this chapter gives us instances of the troubles of David; if one vexation seem to be over, we must not be secure; a storm may arise from some other point, as here to David. 1. Tidings of the death of Samuel could not but trouble him, v. 1. But, II. The abuse he received from Nabal is more largely recorded in this chapter. 1. The character of Nabal, v. 2. 3. The humble request sent to him, v. 4. .9. 3. His churlish answer, v. 10, 11. 4. David's angry resentment of it, v. 12, 13, 21, 22. 5. Abigail's prudent care to prevent the mischief it was likely to bring upon her family, v. 14. .20. 6. Her address to David to pacify him, v. 23. .31. 7. David's favourable reception of her, v. 32. .35. 8. The death of Nabal, v. 36. .38. 9. Abigail's marriage to David, v. 39. .44.

1. AND Samuel died: and all the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him, and buried him in his house at Ramah. And David arose, and went down to the wilderness of Paran.

We have here a short account of Samuel's death and burial.

1. Though he was a great man, and one that was admirably well qualified for public service, yet he spent the latter end of his days in retirement and obscurity: not because he was superannuated, for he knew how to preside in a college of the prophets, (ch. 19. 20.) but because Israel had rejected him, for which God thus justly chastised them, and because his desire was to be quiet, and to enjoy himself and his God in acts of devotion, now in his advanced years; and in this desire God graciously indulged him. Let old people be willing to rest themselves, though it look like burying themselves alive.

2. Though he was a fast friend to David, for which Saul hated him, as also for dealing plainly with him; yet he died in peace, even in the worst of the days of Saul's tyranny, who, he sometimes feared, would kill him, ch. 16. 2. Though Saul loved him not, yet he feared him, as Herod did John; and feared the people, for all knew him to be a prophet. Thus is Saul restrained from hurting him.

3. All Israel lamented him; and they had reason, for they had all a loss in him. His personal merits commanded this honour to be done him at his death; his former services to the public, when he judged Israel, made this respect to his name and memory, a just debt; it had been very ungrateful to have withheld it. The sons of the prophets had lost the founder and president of their college, and whatever weakened them was a public loss: but that was not all; Samuel was a constant intercessor for Israel, prayed daily for them; (ch. 12. 23.) if he go, they part with the best friend they have. The loss is the more grievous at this juncture, when Saul is grown so outrageous, and David driven from his country; never more need of Samuel than now, yet now he is removed. We will hope that the Israelites lamented Samuel's death the more bitterly, because they remembered against themselves their own sin and folly in rejecting him, and desiring a king. Note, (1.) Those have hard hearts, who can bury their faithful ministers with dry eyes; who are not sensible of the loss of those who have prayed for them, and taught them the way of the Lord. (2.) When God's providence removes our relations and friends from us, we ought to be humbled for our misconduct toward them, while they were with us.

4. They buried him not in the school of the prophets at Naioth, but in his own house, or perhaps in the garden pertaining to it, at Ramah, where he was born.

5. David, hereupon, went down to the wilderness of Paran, retiring, perhaps, to mourn the more solemnly for the death of Samuel. Or, rather, because now that he had lost so good a friend, who was (and he hoped would be) a great support to him, he apprehended his danger to be greater than ever, and therefore withdrew to a wilderness, out of the limits of the land of Israel; and now it was, that he dwelt in the tents of Kedar, Ps. 120. 5. In some parts of this wilderness of Paran, Israel wandered when they came out of Egypt; the place would bring to mind God's care concerning them, and David might improve that for his own encouragement, now in his wilderness state.

2. And there was a man in Maon whose possessions were in Carmel; and the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats: and he was shearing his sheep in Carmel. 3. Now the name of the man was Nabal, and the name of his wife Abigail; and she was a woman of good understanding, and of a beautiful countenance: but the man was churlish, and evil in his doings; and he was of the house of Caleb. 4. And David heard in the wilderness that Nabal did shear his sheep. 5. And David sent out ten young men; and David said unto the young men, Get you up to Carmel, and go to Nabal, and greet him in my name. 6. And thus shall ye say to him that liveth in prosperity, Peace be both to thee, and peace be to thine house, and peace be unto all that thou hast. 7. And now I have heard that thou hast shearers: now, thy shepherds which were with us, we hurt them not, neither was there aught missing unto them, all the while they were in Carmel. 8. Ask thy young men, and they will show thee. Wherefore let the young men find favour in thine eyes; for we come in a good day: give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh to thine hand unto thy servants, and to thy son David. 9. And when David's young men came, they spake to Nabal according to all those words, in the name of David, and ceased. 10. And Nabal answered David's servants, and said, Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse? There be many servants now-a-days that break away every man from his master. 11. Shall I then take my bread and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men whom I know not whence they be?

I. A short account of him, who and what he was, v. 2, 3. A man we should never have heard of, if there had not happened some communication between him and David. Observe, 1. His name: Nabal; a fool, so it signifies. It was a wonder that his parents would give him that name, and an ill omen of what proved to be his character. Yet indeed we all of us deserve to be so called, when we come into the world; for Man is born like the wild ass's colt, and foolishness is bound up in our hearts. 2. His family: he was of the house of Caleb, but was indeed of another spirit. He inherited Caleb's estate; for Maon and Carmel lay near Hebron, which was given to Caleb; (Josh. 15. 54, 55.—14. 14.) but he was far from inheriting his virtues. He was a disgrace to his family, and then it was no honour to him. Degeneranti genus opprobrium—A good extraction is a reproach to him who degenerates from it. The Seventy, and some other ancient versions, read it appellatively; not, He was a Calebite. He was a dogged man, of a currish disposition, surly and snappish, and always snarling. He was ἀνδροπικὸς κυνικὸς—a man that was a cynic. 3. His wealth: he was very great, that is, very rich; for riches make men look great in the eye of the world; otherwise, to one that takes his measures aright, he really looked very mean. Riches are common blessings, which God often gives to Nabals, to whom he gives neither wisdom nor grace. 4. His wife: Abigail; a woman of great understanding. Her name signifies, the joy of her father; yet he could not promise himself much joy of her, when he married her to such a husband, inquiring more after his wealth than after his wisdom. Many a child is thrown away upon a great heap of the mire of worldly wealth; married to that and to nothing else that is desirable. Wisdom is good with an inheritance, but an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. Many an Abigail is tied to a Nabal, and if it be so, be her understanding, like Abigail's, ever so great, it will be little enough for her exercises. 5. His character: he had no sense either of honour or honesty: not of honour, for he was churlish, cross, and ill-humoured; not of honesty, for he was evil in his doings, hard, and oppressive, and a man that cared not what fraud and violence he used in getting and saving, so he could but get and save. This is the character given of Nabal by Him who knows what every man is.

II. David's humble request to him, that he would send him some victuals for himself and his men.

1. David, it seems, was in such distress, that he would be glad to be beholden to him, and did, in effect, come a begging to his door. What little reason have we to value the wealth of this world, when so great a churl as Nabal was, abounds, and so great a saint as David was, suffers want! Once before, we had David begging his bread, but then it was of Ahimelech the High Priest, to whom one would not grudge to stoop. But to send a begging to Nabal, was what such a spirit as David had, could not admit without some reluctance; yet if Providence bring him to these straits, he will not say, that to beg he is ashamed. Yet see Ps. 37. 25.

2. He chose a good time to send to Nabal, when he had many hands employed about him in shearing his sheep, for whom he was to make a plentiful entertainment, so that good cheer was stirring. Had he sent at another time, Nabal would have pretended he had nothing to spare, but now he could not have that excuse. It was usual to make feasts at their sheep-shearings, as appears from Absalom's feast on that occasion; (2 Sam. 13. 24.) for wool was one of the staple commodities of Canaan.

3. David ordered his men to deliver their message to him with a great deal of courtesy and respect; "Go to Nabal, and greet him in my name." Tell him I sent you to present my service to him, and to inquire how he does, and his family, v. 5. He puts words in their mouths; (v. 6.) Thus shall ye say to him that liveth; (our translators add, in prosperity;) as if those live indeed, that live as Nabal did, with abundance of the wealth of this world about them; whereas, in truth, those that live in pleasure, are dead while they live, 1 Tim. 5. 6. This was, methinks, too high a compliment to pass upon Nabal, to call him the man that liveth. David knew better things, that in God's favour is life, not in the world's smiles: and by the rough answer he was well enough served, for this too smooth address to such a muck-worm. Yet his good wishes were very commendable; "Peace be to thee; all good both to soul and body: Peace to thy house and to all that thou hast." Tell him I am a hearty well-wisher to his health and prosperity." He bids them call him his son David; (v. 8.) intimating, that, for his age and estate, David honoured him as a father, and therefore hoped to receive some fatherly kindness from him.

4. He pleaded the kindness which Nabal's shepherds had received from David and his men; and one good turn requires another. He appeals to Nabal's own servants, and shows that when David's soldiers were quartered among Nabal's shepherds, (1.) They did not hurt them themselves; did them no injury, gave them no disturbance, were not a terror to them, nor took any of their lambs out of their flock. Yet, considering the character of David's men, men in distress, and debt, and discontented, and the scarcity of provisions in his camp, it was not without a great deal of care and good management, that they were kept from plundering. (2.) They protected them from being hurt by others. David himself does but intimate this, for he would not boast of his good offices; neither was there aught missing unto them, v. 7. But Nabal's servants, to whom he appealed, went further; (v. 16.) They were a wall unto us both by night and day. David's soldiers were a guard to Nabal's shepherds, when the bands of the Philistines robbed the threshing-floors, (ch. 23. 1.) and would have robbed the sheep-folds. From those plunderers Nabal's flocks were protected by David's care, and therefore let us find favour in thine eyes. Those that have shown kindness, may justly expect to receive kindness.

5. He was very modest in his request. Though David was anointed king, he insists not upon royal dainties, but "Give whatsoever comes to thy hand, and we will be thankful for it." Beggars must not be choosers. They that deserved to have been served first, will now be glad of what is left. They plead, We come in a good day, a festival, when not only the provision is more plentiful, but the heart and hand are usually more open and free, than at other times: when much may be spared, and yet not be missed. He demands it not as a debt, either by way of tribute, as he was king, or by way of contribution, as he was a general, but as a boon to a friend, that was his humble servant. David's servants delivered their message faithfully, and very handsomely, not doubting but to go back well laden with provisions.

III. Nabal's churlish answer to this modest petition, v. 10, 11. One would not have imagined it possible that any man should be so very rude and ill-conditioned as Nabal was. David called himself his son, and asked bread, and a fish, but, instead thereof, he gave him a stone, and a scorpion; not only denied him, but abused him. If he had not thought fit to send him any supplies for fear of Ahimelech's fate, who paid dear for his kindness to David, yet he might have given a civil answer, and made the denial as modest as the request was. But, instead of that, he falls into a passion, as covetous men are apt to do, when they are asked for any thing, thinking thus to cover one sin with another, and by abusing the poor to excuse themselves from relieving them. But God will not thus be mocked.

1. He speaks scornfully of David, as an insignificant man, not worth taking notice of. The Philistines could say of him, This is David the king of the land, that slew his ten thousands; (ch. 21. 11.) yet Nabal his near neighbour, and one of the same tribe, takes on him to say that he does not know him, or not know him to be a man of any merit or distinction; Who is David? And who is the son of Jesse? He could not be ignorant how much the country was obliged to David for his public services, but his narrow soul thinks not of paying any part of that debt, nor so much as acknowledge it; he speaks of David as an inconsiderable man, obscure, and not to be regarded. Think it not strange, if great men and great merits be thus disgraced.

2. He upbraids him with his present distress, and takes occasion from it to represent him as a bad man, that was fitter to be set in the stocks for a vagrant than to have any kindness shown him. How naturally does he speak the churlish clownish language of those that hate to give alms! There be many servants now-a-days, (as if there had been none such in former days,) that break every man from his master; suggesting that David was one of them himself. "He might have kept his place with his master Saul, and then he needed not have sent to me for provisions." Also that he entertained and harboured those that were fugitives like himself. It would make one's blood rise, to hear so great and good a man as David was, thus vilified and reproached by such a base churl as Nabal was; But the vile person will speak villany, Isa. 32. 5-7. If men bring themselves into straits by their own folly, yet they are to be pitied and helped, and not trampled upon and starved. But David is reduced to this distress, not by any fault, nor any indiscretion, of his own, but purely by the good services he had done to his country, and the honours which his God had put upon him; and yet he is represented as a fugitive and a runagate. Let this help us to bear such reproaches and misrepresentations of us with patience and cheerfulness, and make us easy under them, that it has often been the lot of the excellent ones of the earth. Some of the best men that ever the world was blest with, were counted as the off-scouring of all things, 1 Cor. 4. 13.

3. He insists much upon the property he had in the provisions of his table, and will by no means admit any body to share in them. "It is my bread and my flesh, yes, and my water too," (though usus communis aquarum—water is every one's property,) "and it is prepared for my shearers;" priding himself in it, that it was all his own; and who denied it? Who offered to dispute his title? But this, he thinks, will justify him in keeping it all to himself, and giving David none; for may he not do what he will with his own? Whereas we mistake, if we think we are absolute lords of what we have, and may do what we please with it. No, we are but stewards, and must use it as we are directed, remembering it is not our own, but his that entrusted us with it. Riches are the τα αλλότρια, (Luke 16. 12.) they are another's, and we ought not to talk too much of their being our own.

12. So David's young men turned their way, and went again, and came and told him all those sayings. 13. And David said unto his men, Gird ye on every man his sword. And they girded on every man his sword, and David also girded on his sword: and there went up after David about four hundred men; and two hundred abode by the stuff. 14. But one of the young men told Abigail, Nabal's wife, saying, Behold, David sent messengers out of the wilderness to salute our master; and he railed on them. 15. But the men were very good unto us, and we were not hurt, neither missed we any thing, as long as we were conversant with them, when we were in the fields: 16. They were a wall unto us both by night and day, all the while we were with them keeping sheep. 17. Now therefore know and consider what thou wilt do; for evil is determined against our master, and against all his household: for he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him.

Here is,

I. The report to David of the abuse Nabal had given to his messengers; (v. 12.) They turned their way; they showed their displeasure as became them to do, by breaking off abruptly from such a churl, but prudently governed themselves so well, as not to render railing for railing, nor to call him as he deserved, much less to take by force what ought of right to have been given them, but came and told David—let him do as he thought fit. Christ's servants, when they are thus abused, must leave it to him to plead his own cause, and wait till he appear in it. The servant showed his lord what affronts he had received, but did not return them, Luke 14. 21.

II. David's hasty resolution, hereupon. He girded on his sword, and ordered his men to do so too, to the number of four hundred, v. 13. And what he said, we are told, v. 21, 22. 1. He repented of the kindness he had done to Nabal, and looks upon it as thrown away upon him. He said, "Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness; I thought to have obliged him, and made him my friend, but I see it is to no purpose. He has no sense of gratitude, nor is he capable of receiving the impressions of a good turn, else he could not have used me thus. He hath requited me evil for good. But when we are thus requited, we should not repent of the good we have done, nor be backward to do good another time. God is kind to the evil and unthankful, and why may not we?" 2. He determined to destroy Nabal, and all that belonged to him, v. 22. Here David did not act like himself. His resolution was bloody, to cut off all the males of Nabal's house, and spare none, man, nor man child. The ratification of his resolution was passionate; So, and more also, do God (he was going to say to me, but that would better become Saul's mouth (ch. 14. 44.) than David's, and therefore he decently turns it off) to the enemies of David. Is this thy voice, O David? Can the man after God's own heart speak thus unadvisedly with his lips? Has he been so long in the school of affliction, where he should have learned patience, and yet so passionate? Is this he who used to be dumb and deaf when he was reproached, (Ps. 38. 13.) who, but the other day, spared him who sought his life, and yet now will not spare any thing that belongs to him who had only put an affront upon his messengers? He who, at other times, used to be calm and considerate, is now put into such a heat by a few hard words, that nothing will atone for them but the blood of a whole family. Lord, what is man! What are the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves to try them, that they may know what is in their hearts! From Saul, David expected injuries, and against these he was prepared, and stood upon his guard, and so kept his temper; but from Nabal he expected kindness, and therefore the affront he gave him, was a surprise to him, found him off his guard, and, by a sudden and unexpected attack, put him for the present into disorder. What need have we to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

III. The account given of this matter to Abigail, by one of the servants, who was more considerate than the rest, v. 14. Had this servant spoken to Nabal, and showed him the danger he had exposed himself to, by his own rudeness, he would have said, "Servants are now-a-days so saucy, and so apt to prescribe, that there is no enduring them;" and, it may be, would have turned him out of doors. But Abigail, being a woman of good understanding, took cognizance of the matter, even from her servant, who, 1. Did David right, in commending him and his men for their civility to Nabal's shepherds; (v. 15, 16.) "The men were very good to us; and though they were themselves exposed, yet they protected us, and were a wall unto us." They who do that which is good, one way or other, shall have the praise of the same. Nabal's own servant will be a witness for David, that he is a man of honour and conscience, whatever Nabal himself says of him. And, 2. He did Nabal no wrong in condemning him for his rudeness to David's messengers. He railed on them, v. 14. He flew upon them, so the word is, with an intolerable rage: "For," say they, "it is his usual practice; (v. 17.) He is such a son as Belial, so very morose and untractable, that a man cannot speak to him, but he flies into a passion immediately." Abigail knew it too well herself. 3. He did Abigail and the whole family a kindness, in making her sensible what was likely to be the consequence. He knew David so well, that he had reason to think he would highly resent the affront, and, perhaps, had had information of David's orders to his men to march that way; for he is very positive evil is determined against our master and all his household; himself, among the rest, would be involved in it. Therefore he desires his mistress to consider what was to be done for their common safety. They could not resist the force David was to bring down upon them, nor had they time to send to Saul to protect them; something therefore must be done to pacify David.

18. Then Abigail made haste, and took two hundred loaves, and two bottles of wine, and five sheep ready dressed, and five measures of parched corn, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs, and laid them on asses. 19. And she said unto her servants, Go on before me: behold, I come after you. But she told not her husband Nabal. 20. And it was so, as she rode on the ass, that she came down by the covert of the hill, and, behold, David and his men came down against her; and she met them. 21. (Now David had said, Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow bath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missed of all that pertained unto him: and he hath requited me evil for good. 22. So and more also do God unto the enemies of David, if I leave of all that pertain to him, by the morning light, any that pisseth against the wall.) 23. And when Abigail saw David, she hastened and lighted off the ass, and fell before David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, 24. And fell at his feet, and said, Upon me, my lord, upon me let this iniquity be; and let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine audience, and hear the words of thine handmaid. 25. Let not my lord, I pray thee, regard this man of Belial, even Nabal: for as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name, and folly is with him: but I thine handmaid saw not the young men of my lord, whom thou didst send. 26. Now therefore, my lord, as the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, seeing the LORD hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood, and from avenging thyself with thine own hand, now let thine enemies, and they that seek evil to my lord, be as Nabal. 27. And now this blessing, which thine handmaid hath brought unto my lord, let it even be given unto the young men that follow my lord. 28. I pray thee, forgive the trespass of thine handmaid: for the LORD will certainly make my lord a sure house; because my lord fighteth the battles of the LORD, and evil hath not been found in thee all thy days. 29. Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul: but the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the LORD thy God; and the souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling. 30. And it shall come to pass, when the LORD shall have done to my lord according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed thee ruler over Israel, 31. That this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart unto my lord, either that thou hast shed blood causeless, or that my lord hath avenged himself: but when the LORD shall have dealt well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid.

We have here an account of Abigail's prudent management for the preserving of her husband and family from the destruction that was just coming upon them: and we find that she did her part admirably well, and fully answered her character. The passion of fools often makes those breaches in a little time, which the wise, with all their wisdom, have much ado to make up again. It is hard to say, whether Abigail was more miserable in such a husband, or Nabal happy in such a wife. A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband, to protect as well as adorn, and will do him good and not evil.

Wisdom in such a case as this, was better than weapons of war. 1. It was her wisdom, that what she did, she did quickly, and without delay; she made haste, v. 18. It was no time to trifle or linger, when all was in danger. They that desire conditions of peace, must send when the enemy is yet a great way off, Luke 14. 32. 2. It was her wisdom, that what she did, she did herself: because, being a woman of great conduct and very happy address, she knew better how to manage it than any servant she had. The virtuous woman will herself look well to the ways of her household, and not devolve it wholly upon others.

Abigail must endeavour to atone for Nabal's faults, now that he had been two ways rude to David's messengers, and in them to David. (1.) He had denied them the provisions they asked for. (2.) He had given them very provoking language. Now,

I. By a most generous present, Abigail atones for his denial of their request. If Nabal had given them what came next to hand, they had gone away thankful: but Abigail prepares the very best the house afforded, and abundance of it, (v. 18.) according to the usual entertainments of those times. Not only bread and flesh, but raisins and figs, which were their dried sweetmeats. Nabal grudged them water, but she took two bottles (casks or rundlets) of wine, loaded her asses with these provisions, and sent them before; for a gift pacifieth anger, Prov. 21. 14. Jacob thus pacified Esau. When the instruments of the churl are evil, the liberal devise liberal things, and loses nothing by it; for by liberal things shall he stand, Isa. 32. 7, 8. Abigail not only lawfully, but laudably, disposed of all these goods of her husband's, without his knowledge, even when she had reason to think that if he had known, he would not have consented to it; because it was not to gratify her own pride, or vanity, but for the necessary defence of him and his family, which otherwise had been inevitably ruined. Husbands and wives, for their common good and benefit, have a joint-interest in their worldly possessions; but if either waste, or unduly spend any way, it is robbing the other.

II. By a most obliging demeanour, and charming speech, she atones for the abusive language which Nabal had given them. She met David upon the march, big with resentment, and meditating the destruction of Nabal; (v. 20.) but with all possible expressions of complaisance and respect she humbly begs his favour, and solicits him to pass by the offence. Her demeanour was very submissive; she bowed herself to the ground before David, v. 23. and fell at his feet, v. 24. Yielding pacifies great offences. She puts herself into the place and posture of a penitent, and of a petitioner, and was not ashamed to do it, when it was for the good of her house, in the sight both of her own servants, and of David's soldiers. She humbly begs of David that he will give her the hearing; Let thy handmaid speak in thy audience. But she needed not thus to bespeak his attention and patience; what she said was sufficient to command it; for certainly nothing could be more fine or more moving. No topic of argument is left untouched, every thing is well placed, and well expressed, most pertinently and pathetically urged and improved to the best advantage, with such a force of natural rhetoric as cannot easily be paralleled.

1. She speaks to him all along with the deference and respect due to so great and good a man; calls him My lord over and over, to expiate her husband's crime in saying, "Who is David?" She does not upbraid him with the heat of his passion, though he deserved to be reproved for it; nor does she tell him how ill it became his character: but endeavours to soften him, and bring him to a better temper; not doubting but that then his own conscience would upbraid him with it.

2. She takes the blame of the ill treatment of his messengers upon herself; "Upon me, my lord, upon me, let this iniquity be, v. 24. If thou wilt be angry, be angry with me, rather than with my poor husband, and look upon it as the trespass of thy handmaid," v. 28. Sordid spirits care not how much others suffer for their faults, while generous spirits can be content to suffer for the faults of others. Abigail here discovered the sincerity and strength of her conjugal affection, and concern for her family: whatever Nabal was, he was her husband.

3. She excuses her husband's fault by imputing it to his natural weakness and want of understanding; (v. 23.) "Let not my lord take notice of his rudeness and ill manners, for it is like him; it is not the first time that he has behaved so churlishly: he must be borne with, for it was for want of wit; Nabal is his name," (which signifies a fool, "and folly is with him." It was owing to his folly, not his malice. He is simple, but not spiteful. Forgive him, for he knows not what he does." What she said, was too true, and she said it to excuse his fault and prevent his ruin, else she had not done well to give such a bad character as this of her own husband, whom she ought to make the best of, and not to speak ill of.

4. She pleads her own ignorance of the matter; "I saw not the young men, else they should have had a better answer, and should not have gone without their errand:" intimating hereby, that though her husband was foolish, and unfit to manage his affairs himself, yet he had so much wisdom as to be ruled by her, and take her advice.

5. She takes it for granted that she had gained the point already, perhaps, perceiving by David's countenance, that he began to change his mind; (v. 26.) "Seeing the Lord hath witholden thee." She depends not upon her own reasonings, but God's grace, to mollify him, and doubts not but that grace would work powerfully upon him; and then, "Let all thine enemies be as Nabal; that is, if thou forbear to avenge thyself, no doubt, God will avenge thee on him, as he will on all other thine enemies." Or it intimates that it was below him to take vengeance on so weak and impotent an enemy as Nabal was, who, as he would do him no kindness, so he could do him no hurt, for he needed to wish no more concerning his enemies, than that they might be as unable to resist him as Nabal was. Perhaps she refers to his sparing of Saul, when, but the other day, he had him at his mercy. "Didst thou forbear to avenge thyself on that lion that would devour thee, and wilt thou shed the blood of this dog that can but bark at thee?" The very mentioning of what he was about to do, to shed blood, and to avenge himself, was enough to work upon such a tender gracious spirit as David had; and it should seem, by his reply, (v. 33.) that it affected him.

6. She makes a tender of the present she had brought, but speaks of it as unworthy of David's acceptance; and therefore desires it might be given to the young men that followed him, (v. 27.) and particularly to those ten that were his messengers to Nabal, whom he had treated so rudely.

7. She applauds David for the good services he had done against the common enemies of his country, the glory of which great achievements, she hoped, he would not stain by any personal revenge. My lord fighteth the battles of the Lord against the Philistines, and therefore he will leave it to God to fight his battles against those that affront him. "Evil hath not been found in thee all thy days, (v. 28.) thou never yet didst wrong to any of thy countrymen, (though persecuted as a traitor,) and therefore thou wilt not begin now, nor do a thing which Saul will improve for the justifying of his malice against thee."

8. She foretells the glorious issue of his present troubles. "It is true, a man pursues thee, and seeks thy life;" (she names not Saul, out of respect to his present character as a king;) "but thou needest not look with so sharp and jealous an eye upon every one that affronts thee; for all these storms that now ruffle thee, will be blown over shortly." She speaks it with assurance, (1.) That God would keep him safe; The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God; that is, God shall hold thy soul in life, (as the expression is, Ps. 66. 9.) as we hold those things tight which are bundled up, or which are precious to us, (Ps. 116. 15.) Thy soul shall be treasured up in the treasure of lives, so the Chaldee, under lock and key, as our treasure is, "Thou shalt abide under the special protection of the Divine Providence." The bundle of life is with the Lord our God, for in his hand our breath is, and our times. Those are safe, and may be easy, that have him for their Protector. The Jews understand this, not only of the life that now is, but of that which is to come, even the happiness of separate souls, and therefore use it commonly as an inscription on their grave-stones. "Here we have laid the body, but trusting that the soul is bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord our God." There it is safe, while the dust of the body is scattered. (2.) That God would make him victorious over his enemies. Their souls he shall sling out, v. 29. The stone is bound up in the sling, but it is in order to be thrown out again: so the souls of the godly shall be bundled as corn for the barn, but the souls of the wicked as tares for the fire. (3.) That God would settle him in wealth and power; "The Lord will certainly make my lord a sure house, and no enemy thou hast can hinder it; therefore forgive this trespass," that is, "show mercy as thou hast to find mercy. God will make thee great, and it is the glory of great men to pass by offences."

9. She desires him to consider how much more comfortable it would be to him in the reflection to have forgiven this affront than to have revenged it, v. 30, 31. She reserves this argument for the last, and a very powerful one with so good a man: That the less he indulged his passion, the more he consulted his peace and the repose of his own conscience, which every wise man will be tender of. (1.) She cannot but think, that if he should avenge himself, it would afterward be a grief, and an offence of heart to him. Many have done that in a heat, which they have a thousand times wished undone again. The sweetness of revenge is soon turned into bitterness. (2.) She is confident that if he pass by the offence, it will afterward be no grief to him; but, on the contrary, it would yield him unspeakable satisfaction that his wisdom and grace had got the better of his passion. Note, When we are tempted to sin, we should consider how it will appear in the reflection. Let us never do any thing for which our own conscience will afterward have occasion to upbraid us, and which we shall look back upon with regret. My heart shall not reproach me.

Lastly, She recommends herself to his favour; "When the Lord shall have dealt well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid, as one that kept thee from doing that which would have disgraced thine honour, disquieted thy conscience, and made a blot in thine history." We have reason to remember those with respect and gratitude, who have been instrumental to keep us from sin.

32. And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me: 33. And blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand. 34. For in very deed, as the LORD God of Israel liveth, which hath kept me back from hurting thee, except thou hadst hastened, and come to meet me, surely there had not been left unto Nabal, by the morning light, any that pisseth against the wall. 35. So David received of her hand that which she had brought him, and said unto her, Go up in peace to thine house: see, I have hearkened to thy voice, and have accepted thy person.

As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprovcr upon an obedient ear, Prov. 25. 12. Abigail was a wise reprovcr of David's passion, and he gave an obedient ear to the reproof, according to his own principle, (Ps. 141, 5.) Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness. Never was such an admonition either better given, or better taken.

1. David gives God thanks for sending him this happy check in a sinful way; (v. 32.) Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me. Note, (1.) God is to be acknowledged in all the kindnesses that our friends do us either for soul or body. Whoever meets us with counsel, direction, comfort, caution, or seasonable reproof, we must see God sending them. (2.) We ought to be very thankful for those happy providences which are means of preventing sin.

2. He gives Abigail thanks for interposing so opportunely between him and the mischief he was about to do; Blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, v. 33. Most people think it enough, if they take a reproof patiently; but we meet with few that will take it thankfully, and will commend those that give it them, and accept it as a favour. Abigail did not rejoice more that she had been instrumental to save her husband and family from death, than David rejoiced that she had been instrumental to save him and his men from sin.

3. He seems very apprehensive of the great danger he was in, which magnified the mercy of his deliverance. (1.) He speaks of the sin as very great. He was coming to shed blood, a sin which he had, prevailingly, a great horror of; witness his prayer, Deliver me from blood-guiltiness: he was coming to avenge himself with his own hand, and that is stepping into the throne of God, who has said, Vengeance is mine I will repay. The more heinous any sin is, the greater mercy it is to be kept from it. He seems to aggravate the evil of his design with this, that it would have been an injury to so wise and good a woman, as Abigail; God has kept me back from hurting thee, v. 34. Or, perhaps, at the first sight of Abigail, he was conscious of a thought to do her a mischief for offering to oppose him; and therefore reckons it a great mercy that God gave him patience to hear her speak. (2.) He speaks of the danger of his falling into it, as very imminent; "Except thou hadst hastened, the bloody execution had been done." The nearer we were to the commission of sin, the greater was the mercy of a seasonable restraint: Almost gone, (Ps. 73. 2.) and yet upheld.

4. He dismissed her with an answer of peace, v.

35. He does, in effect, own himself overcome by her eloquence; "I have hearkened to thy voice, and will not prosecute the intended revenge, for I have accepted thy person; am well pleased with thee, and what thou hast said." Note, (1.) Wise and good men will hear reason, and let that rule them, though it come from those that are every way their inferiors, and though their passions are up, and their spirits provoked. (2.) Oaths cannot bind us to that which is sinful. David had solemnly vowed the death of Nabal; he did ill to make such a vow, but he had done worse if he had performed it. (3.) A wise and faithful reproof is often better taken, and speeds better than we expected: such is the hold God has of men's consciences. See Prov. 28. 25.

36. And Abigail came to Nabal: and, behold, he held a feast in his house, like the feast of a king; and Nabal's heart was merry within him, for he was very drunken: wherefore she told him nothing, less or more, until the morning light. 37. But it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal, and his wife had told him these things, that his heart died within him, and he became as a stone. 38. And it came to pass, about ten days after, that the LORD smote Nabal, that he died. 39. And when David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, Blessed be the LORD, that hath pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath kept his servant from evil: for the LORD hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head. And David sent and communed with Abigail, to take her to him to wife. 40. And when the servants of David were come to Abigail to Carmel, they spake unto her, saying, David sent us unto thee to take thee to him to wife. 41. And she arose, and bowed herself on her face to the earth, and said, Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord. 42. And Abigail hastened, and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five damsels of hers that went after her; and she went after the messengers of David, and became his wife. 43. David also took Ahinoam of Jezreel; and they were also both of them his wives. 44. But Saul had given Michal his daughter, David's wife, to Phalti the son of Laish, which was of Gallim.

We are now to attend Nabal's funeral, and Abigail's wedding.

I. Nabal's funeral. The apostle speaks of some that were twice dead, Jude 12. We have here Nabal thrice dead, though but just now wonderfully rescued from the sword of David, and delivered from so great a death; for the preservations of wicked men, are but reservations for some further sorer strokes of divine wrath. Here is,

1. Nabal dead drunk, v. 36. Abigail came home, and, it should seem, he had so many people, and so much plenty about him, that he neither missed her, nor the provisions she took to David; but she found him in the midst of his jollity, little thinking how near he was to ruin, by one whom he had foolishly made his enemy. Sinners are often most secure, when they are most in danger, and destruction is at the door. Observe, (1.) How extravagant he was in the entertainment of his company; He held a feast like the feast of a king, so magnificent and abundant, though his guests were but his sheep-shearers. This abundance might have been allowed, if he had considered what God gave him his estate for, not to look great with, but to do good with. It is very common for those that are most niggardly in any act of piety or charity, to be most profuse in gratifying a vain humour or a base lust. A mite is grudged to God and his poor; but, to make a fair show in the flesh, gold is lavished out of the bag. If Nabal had not answered to his name, he would never have been thus secure and jovial, till he had inquired whether he was safe from David's resentments; but (as Bishop Hall observes) thus foolish are carnal men, that give themselves over to their pleasures, before they have taken any care to make their peace with God. (2.) How sottish he was in the indulgence of his own brutish appetite; He was very drunk. A sign he was Nabal, a fool, that could not use his plenty without abusing it; could not be present with his friends without making a beast of himself. There is not a surer sign that man has but little wisdom, nor a surer way to ruin the little he has, than drinking to excess. Nabal, that never thought he could bestow too little in charity, never thought he could betow too much in luxury. Abigail finding him in this condition, (and probably, those about him little better, when the master of the feast set them so bad an example,) she had enough to do to set the disordered house to rights a little, but told Nabal nothing of what she had done with reference to David, nothing of his folly in provoking David, of his danger or of his deliverance; for, being drunk, he was as incapable to hear reason, as he was to speak it. To give good advice to those that are in drink, is to cast pearls before swine; it is better to stay till they are sober.

2. Nabal dead with melancholy, v. 37. Next morning, when he was come to himself a little, his wife told him how near to destruction he had brought himself and his family, by his own rudeness: and with what difficulty she had interposed to prevent it; and, upon this, his heart died within him, and he became as a stone. Some suggest, that the expense of the satisfaction made to David, by the present Abigail brought him, broke his heart: it seems rather, that the apprehension he now had of the danger he had narrowly escaped, put him into a consternation, and seized his spirits, so that he could not recover it. He grew sullen, and said little, ashamed of his own folly, and put out of countenance by his wife's wisdom. How is he changed! His heart over-night merry with wine, next morning heavy as a stone; so deceitful are carnal pleasures; so transient the laughter of the fool; the end of that mirth is heaviness. Drunkards are sometimes sad, when they reflect upon their own folly. Joy in God makes the heart always light. Abigail could never, by her wise reasonings, bring Nabal to repentance; but now, by her faithful reproof, she brings him to despair.

3. Nabal, at last, dead indeed. About ten days after, when he had been kept so long under this pressure and pain, the Lord smote him that he died; (v. 38.), and, it should seem, he never held up his head. It is just with God, (says Bishop Hall,) that they who live without grace, should die without comfort; nor can we expect better, while we go on in our sins. Here is no lamentation made for Nabal; he departed without being lamented; every one signified that the country would be well off, if it never sustained a greater loss. David when he heard the news of his death, gave God thanks for it, v. 39. He blessed God, (1.) That he had kept him from killing him; Blessed be the Lord, who hath kept his servant from evil. He rejoices that Nabal died a natural death, and not by his hand. We should take all occasions to mention and magnify God's goodness to us, in keeping us from sin. (2.) That he had taken the work into his own hands, and had vindicated David's honour, and not suffered him to go unpunished, who had been abusive to him: hereby his interest would be confirmed, and all would stand in awe of him, as one for whom God fought. (3.) That he had thereby encouraged him, and all others, to commit their cause to God, when they are any way injured, with an assurance that, in his own time, he will right them, if they sit still, and leave it to him.

II. Abigail's wedding. David was so charmed with the beauty of her person, and the uncommon prudence of her conduct and address, that, as soon as was proper, after he heard she was a widow, he informed her of his attachment to her, (v. 39.) not doubting, but that she who approved herself so good a wife to so bad a husband as Nabal was, would much more make him a good wife; and, having taken notice of her respect to him, and her confidence of his coming to the throne, 1. He solicited by proxy, his affairs, perhaps, not permitting him to come himself. 2. She received the address with great modesty and humility, (v. 41.) reckoning herself unworthy of the honour, yet having such a respect for him, that she would gladly be one of the poorest servants in his family, to wash the feet of the other servants. None so fit to be preferred as those that can thus humble themselves. 3. She agreed to the proposal, went with his messengers, took a retinue with her agreeable to her quality, and she became his wife, v. 42. She did not upbraid him with his present distresses, and ask him how he could maintain her, but valued him, (1.) Because she knew he was a very good man. (2.) Because she believed he would, in due time, be a very great man; she married him in faith, not questioning but that, though now he had not a house of his own that he durst bring her to, yet God's promise to him would at length be fulfilled. Thus they who join themselves to Christ, must be willing now to suffer with him, believing that hereafter they shall reign with him.

Lastly, On this occasion, we have some account of David's wives. 1. One that he had lost before he married Abigail; Michal, Saul's daughter, his first, and the wife of his youth, to whom he would have been constant, if she would have been so to him; but Saul had given her to another, (v. 44.) in token of his displeasure against him, and disclaiming the relation of a father-in-law to him. 2. Another that he married beside Abigail, (v. 43.) and, as should seem, before her, for she is named first, ch. 27. 3. David was carried away by the corrupt custom of those times; but from the beginning it was not so, nor is it so now that Messias is come, and the times of reformation, Matth. 19. 4, 5. Perhaps Saul's defrauding David of his only rightful wife, was the occasion of his running into this irregularity; for when the knot of conjugal affection is once loosed, it is scarcely ever tied fast again. When David could not keep his first wife, he thought that would excuse him, if he did not keep to his second. But we deceive ourselves, if we think to make another's faults a cloak for our own.

CHAP. XXVI.

David's troubles from Saul here begin again, and the clouds return after the rain, when one would have hoped the storm had blown over, and the sky had cleared up on that side: but, after Saul had owned his fault in persecuting David, and David's title to the crown, yet here he revives the persecution; so perfectly lost was he to all sense of honour and virtue. I. The Ziphites informed him where David was, (v. 1.) and, thereupon, he marches out with a considerable force in quest of him, v. 2, 3. II. David gained intelligence of his motions, (v. 4.) and took a view of the camp, v. 5. III. He and one of his men ventured into his camp in the night, and found him and all his guards fast asleep, v. 6, 7. IV. David, though much urged to it by his companions, would not take away Saul's life; but only carried off his spear and his cruse of water, v. 8, 12. V. He produced those as a further witness for him, that he did not design any ill to Saul, and reasoned with him upon it, v. 13, 20. VI. Saul was hereby convinced of his error, and once more let fall the persecution, v. 21, 25. The story is much like that which we had, ch. 24. In both, David is delivered out of Saul's hand, and Saul out of David's.

1. AND the Ziphites came unto Saul to a Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon? 2. Then Saul arose, and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, having three thousand chosen men of Israel with him, to seek David in the wilderness of Ziph. 3. And Saul pitched in the hill of Hachilah which is before Jeshimon, by the way: but David abode in the wilderness; and he saw that Saul came after him into the wilderness. 4. David therefore sent out spies, and understood that Saul was come in very deed. 5. And David arose, and came to the place where Saul had pitched: and David beheld the place where Saul lay, and Abner the son of Ner, the captain of his host: and Saul lay in the trench, and the people pitched round about him.

Here, I. Saul gets information of David's motions, and acts offensively. The Ziphites came to him, and told him where David now was; in the same place where he was when they formerly betrayed him, ch. 23. 19. Perhaps, (though it is not mentioned,) Saul had given them intimation, underhand, that he continued his design against David, and would be glad of their assistance: if not, they were very officious to Saul, aware of what would please him, and very malicious against David, to whom they despaired of ever reconciling themselves, and therefore they stirred up Saul (who needed no such spur) against him, v. 1. For aught we know, Saul would have continued in the same good mind that he was in, (ch. 24. 17.) and would not have given David this fresh trouble, if the Ziphites had not put him on. See what need we have to pray to God, that, since we have so much of the tinder of corruption in our own hearts, the sparks of temptation may be kept far from us, lest, if they come together, we be set on fire of hell. Saul readily caught at the information, and went down with an army of 3000 men, to the place where David hid himself, v. 2. How soon do unsanctified hearts lose the good impressions which their convictions have made upon them, and return with the dog to their vomit!

2. David gets information of Saul's motions, and acts defensively. He did not march out to meet and fight him; he sought only his own safety, not Saul's ruin; therefore he abode in the wilderness, (v. 3.) putting thereby a great force upon himself, and curbing the bravery of his own spirit by a silent retirement, showing more true valour than he could have done by an irregular resistance. (1.) He had spies who ascertained him of Saul's descent; that he was come in very deed; (v. 4.) for he would not believe that Saul would have dealt so basely with him till he had the utmost evidence of it. (2.) He observed with his own eyes how Saul was encamped, v. 5. He came toward the place where Saul and his men had pitched their tents, so near as to be able, undiscovered, to take a view of their intrenchments, probably, in the dusk of the evening.

6. Then answered David, and said to Ahimelech the Hittite, and to Abishai the son of Zeruiah, brother to Joab, saying, Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp? And Abishai said, I will go down with thee. 7. So David and Abishai came to the people by night: and, behold, Saul lay sleeping within the trench, and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster; but Abner and the people lay round about him. 8. Then said Abishai to David, God hath delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day: now, therefore, let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time. 9. And David said to Abishai, Destroy him not: for who can stretch forth his hand against the LORD's anointed, and be guiltless? 10. David said furthermore, As the LORD liveth, the LORD shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle and perish. 11. The LORD forbid that I should stretch forth mine hand against the LORD's anointed: but, I pray thee, take thou now the spear that is at his bolster, and the cruse of water, and let us go. 12. So David took the spear and the cruse of water from Saul's bolster; and they gat them away, and no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked; for they were all asleep; because a deep sleep from the LORD was fallen upon them.

Here is,

I. David's bold adventure into Saul's camp in the night, accompanied only by his kinsman Abishai, the son of Zeruiah. He proposed it to him and to another of his confidants, (v. 6.) but the other declined it, either as too dangerous an enterprise, or, at least, was content that Abishai, who was forward to it, should run the risk of it rather than himself. Whether David was prompted to do this by his own courage, or by an extraordinary impression upon his spirits, or by the oracle, does not appear; but, like Gideon, he ventured through the guards, with a special assurance of divine protection.

II. The posture he found the camp in. Saul lay sleeping in the trench, or as some read it, in his chariot, and in the midst of his carriages, with his spear stuck in the ground by him, to be ready if his quarters should be beaten up, (v. 7.) and all the soldiers, even those that were appointed to stand sentinel, were fast asleep, v. 12. Thus were their eyes closed and their hands bound, for a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them; something extraordinary there was in it, that they should all be asleep together, and so fast asleep, that David and Abishai walked and talked among them, and yet none of them stirred. Sleep, when God gives it his beloved, is their rest and refreshment; but he can, when he pleases, make it to his enemies their imprisonment. Thus are the stout hearted spoiled; they have slept their sleep, and none of the men of might have found their hands, at thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, Ps. 76. 5, 6. It was a deep sleep from the Lord, who has the command of the powers of nature, and makes them to serve his purposes as he pleases. When God will disable or destroy, he binds up with a spirit of slumber, Rm. 11. 8. How helpless do Saul and all his forces lie! All, in effect, disarmed and chained, and yet nothing is done to them; they are only rocked asleep. How easily can God weaken the strongest, befoul the wisest, and baffle the most watchful! Let all his friends therefore trust him, and all his enemies fear him.

III. Abishai's request to David for a commission to despatch Saul with the spear that stuck at his bolster, which (now that he lay so fair,) he undertook to do at one blow, v. 8. He would not urge David to kill him himself, because he had declined before, when he had a like opportunity; but he begged earnestly that he would give him leave to do it, pleading that he was his enemy, not only cruel and implacable, but false and perfidious, whom no reason would rule, nor kindness work upon, and that God had now delivered him into his hand, and did, in effect, bid him strike. The last adventure he had of this kind, was indeed but accidental, when Saul happened to enter the cave with him at the same time; but in this there was something extraordinary: the deep sleep that was fallen on Saul, and all his guards, was manifestly from the Lord, so that it was a special providence which gave him this opportunity; he ought not therefore to let it slip.

IV. David's generous refusal to suffer any harm to be done to Saul, and in it, a resolute adherence to his principles of loyalty, v. 9. David charged Abishai not to destroy him; would not only not do it himself, but not permit another to do it. And he gave two reasons for it. 1. It would be a sinful affront to God's ordinance. Saul was the Lord's anointed king of Israel, by the special appointment and nomination of the God of Israel; the power that was; and to resist him was to resist the ordinance of God, Rom. 13. 2. No man could do it and be guiltless; the thing he feared, was guilt, and his concern respected his innocence more than his safety. 2. It would be a sinful anticipation of God's providence; God had sufficiently showed him, in Nabal's case, that, if he left it to him to do him right, he would do it in due time. Encouraged therefore by his experience, in that instance, he resolves to wait till God shall think fit to avenge him on Saul, and he will by no means avenge himself; (v. 10.) The Lord shall smite him, as he did Nabal, with some sudden stroke, or he shall die in battle, (as it proved he did soon after,) or, however, his day shall come to die a natural death, and David will contentedly wait till then, rather than force his way to the promised crown by any indirect methods. The temptation indeed was very strong; but if he yield, he sins against God, and therefore he resists the temptation with the utmost resolution; (v. 11.) "The Lord forbid that I should stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's anointed"; no, I will never do it, nor suffer it to be done." Thus bravely does he prefer his conscience to his interest, and trust God with the issue.

V. The improvement he made of this opportunity, for the further evidence of his own integrity. He and Abishai carried away the spear and cruse of water which Saul had by his bed-side, (v. 12.)

and, which was very strange, none of all the guards were aware of them: if a physician had given them the strongest opiate or stupefying dose, they could not have been faster locked up with sleep. Saul's spear which he had by him for defence, and his cup of water which he had for his refreshment, were both stolen from him while he slept. Thus do we lose our strength and our comfort, when we are careless and secure, and off our watch.

13. Then David went over to the other side, and stood on the top of a hill afar off, (a great space being between them;) 14. And David cried to the people, and to Abner the son of Ner, saying, Answerest thou not, Abner? Then Abner answered and said, Who art thou that criest to the king? 15. And David said to Abner, Art not thou a valiant man? and who is like to thee in Israel? wherefore then hast thou not kept thy lord the king? for there came one of the people in to destroy the king thy lord. 16. This thing is not good that thou hast done. As the LORD liveth, ye are worthy to die, because ye have not kept your master, the LORD's anointed. And now see where the king's spear is, and the cruse of water that was at his bolster. 17. And Saul knew David's voice, and said, Is this thy voice, my son David? And David said, It is my voice, my lord, O king. 18. And he said, Wherefore doth my lord thus pursue after his servant? for what have I done? or what evil is in mine hand? 19. Now therefore, I pray thee, let my lord the king hear the words of his servant. If the LORD have stirred thee up against me, let him accept an offering: but if they be the children of men, cursed be they before the LORD; for they have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the LORD, saying, Go, serve other gods. 20. Now, therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth before the face of the LORD: for the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains.

David being got safe from Saul's camp himself, and having brought with him proofs sufficient that he had been there, posts himself conveniently, so that they might hear him, and yet not reach him, (v. 13.) and then begins to reason with them upon what had passed.

1. He reasons ironically with Abner, and keenly banters him. David knew well that it was from the mighty power of God, that Abner and the rest of the guards were cast into so deep a sleep, and that God's immediate hand was in it. But he reproaches Abner, as unworthy to be captain of the life-guards, who could sleep, when the king his master lay so much exposed. By this it appears that the hand of God locked them up in this deep sleep, that, as soon as ever David was got out of danger, a very little thing awakened them, even David's voice at a great distance roused them, v. 14. Abner got up, (we may suppose it early in a summer's morning,) and asked who called and disturbed the king's repose. "It is I," says David; and then he upbraids him with his sleeping, when he should have been upon his guard. Perhaps Abner, looking upon David as a despicable enemy, and one that there was no danger from, had neglected to set a watch; however, he himself ought to have been more wakeful. David, to put him in confusion, tells him, 1. That he had lost his honour; (v. 15.) "Art not thou a man?" so the word is; "a man in office, that art bound by the duty of thy place, to inspect the soldiery? Art not thou in reputation for a valiant man? So thou wouldest be esteemed; a man of such courage and conduct, that there is none like thee; but now thou art shamed for ever. A sluggard call himself a general!" 2. That he had deserved to lose his head; (v. 16.) "Ye are all worthy to die, by martial law, for being off your guard, when you had the king himself asleep in the midst of you. Ecce signum—Behold this token. See where the king's spear is, in the hand of him whom the king himself is pleased to count his enemy. They that took away this, might as easily and safely have taken away his life. Now see who are the king's best friends; you that neglected him and left him exposed, or I that protected him, when he was exposed. You pursue me as worthy to die, and irritate Saul against me; but who is worthy to die now?" Note, Sometimes those that unjustly condemn others, are justly left to fall into condemnation themselves.

II. He reasons seriously and affectionately with Saul. By this time he was so well awakened as to hear what was said, and discern who said it; v. 17. Is this thy voice, my son David? In the same manner he had expressed his relents, ch. 24. 16. He had given his wife to another, and yet calls him son; thirsted after his blood, and yet is glad to hear his voice. Those are bad indeed that have never any convictions of good, nor any good impressions. And now David has as fair an opportunity of reaching Saul's conscience, as he had just now of taking away his life; this he lays hold on, though he had refused the other, and enters into a close argument with him, concerning the trouble he still continued to give him, endeavouring to persuade him to let fall the persecution, and be reconciled.

1. He complains of the very melancholy condition he was brought into by the enmity of Saul against him. Two things he laments; (1.) That he was driven from his master, and from his business; "My Lord pursues after his servant, v. 18. How gladly would I serve thee as formerly, if my service might be accepted; but, instead of being owned as a servant, I am pursued as a rebel, and my lord is my enemy, and he compels me to flee from him, whom I would follow with respect." (2.) That he was driven from his God and from his religion; and this was a much greater grievance than the former; (v. 19.) "They have driven me out from the inheritance of the Lord; have made Canaan, at least the inhabited parts of it, a dangerous abode, and have forced me into the deserts and mountains, and will, ere long, oblige me to quit the country." And that which troubled him, was, not so much that he was driven out from his own inheritance, as that he was driven out from the inheritance of the Lord, the holy land. It should be more comfortable to us to think of God's title to our estates, and his interest in them, than of our own; and that with them we may honour him, than that with them we may maintain ourselves. Nor was it so much his trouble, that he was constrained to live among strangers, as that he was constrained to live among the worshippers of strange gods, and was thereby thrust into temptation to join with them in their idolatrous worship. His enemies did, in effect send him to go serve other gods; and perhaps he had heard that some of them had spoken to that purpose of him.

They that forbid our attendance on God's ordinances, do what in them lies to estrange us from God, and to make us heathens. If David had not been a man of extraordinary grace, and firmness to his religion, the ill usage he met with from his own prince and people, who were Israelites, and worshippers of the true God, would have prejudiced him against the religion they professed, and have driven him to communicate with idolaters. "If these be Israelites," he might have said, "let me live and die with Philistines;" and no thanks to them that it had not that effect. We are to reckon that the greatest injury that can be done us, which exposes us to sin. Of those who thus led David into temptation, he here says, Cursed be they before the Lord. Those fall under a curse, that thrust out those whom God receives, and endeavour to send those to the Devil, who are dear to God.

2. He insists upon his own innocence; What have I done, or what evil is in mine hand? v. 18. He had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had never done, nor ever designed, any mischief to the person, honour, or government, of his prince, nor to any of the interests of his country: he had lately had Saul's own testimony concerning him, ch. 24. 17, Thou art more righteous than I. It was very unreasonable and wicked for Saul to pursue him as a criminal, when he could not charge him with any crime.

3. He endeavours to convince Saul that his pursuit of him was not only wrong, but mean, and much below him; "The king of Israel, whose dignity is great, and who has so much other work to do, is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains," v. 20. A poor game for the king of Israel to pursue. He compares himself to a partridge, a very innocent harmless bird, which, when attempts are made upon its life, flies if it can, but makes no resistance. And would Saul bring the flower of his army into the field, only to hunt one poor partridge? What a disparagement was this to his honour! What a stain would it be on his memory! To trample upon so weak and patient, as well as so innocent, an enemy; (James 5. 6.) Ye have killed the just, and he doth not resist you.

4. He desires that the core of the controversy might be searched into, and some proper method taken to bring it to an end, v. 19. Saul himself could not say that justice put him on thus to persecute David, or that he was obliged to do it for the public safety. David was not willing to say (though it was very true) that Saul's own envy and malice put him on to do it; and therefore he concludes it must be attributed either to the righteous judgment of God, or to the unrighteous designs of evil men. Now, (1.) "If the Lord have stirred thee up against me, either in displeasure to me, (taking this way to punish me for my sins against him, though, as to thee, I am guiltless,) or in displeasure to thee, if it be the effect of that evil spirit from the Lord which troubles thee, let him accept an offering from us both; let us join in making our peace with God, and reconciling ourselves to him, which may be done, by sacrifice; and then I hope the sin will be pardoned, whatever it is, and the trouble, which is so great a vexation both to thee and me, will come to an end." See the right method of peace-making: let us first make God our Friend by Christ the great Sacrifice, and then all other enmities shall be slain, Eph. 2. 16. Prov. 16. 7. But, (2.) "If thou art put upon it by wicked men, that incense thee against me, cursed be they before the Lord;" that is, they are wicked people, and it is fit that they should be abandoned as such, and excluded from the king's court and councils. He decently lays the blame upon the evil counsellors who advised the king to that which was dishonourable and dishonest, and insists upon it, that they be removed from about him, and forbid-den his presence, as men cursed before the Lord, and then he hoped he should gain his petition, which is, (v. 20.) "Let not my blood fall to the earth, as thou threatenest, for it is before the face of the Lord, who will take cognizance of the wrong, and avenge it." Thus pathetically does David plead with Saul for his life, and, in order to that, for his favourable opinion of him.

21. Then said Saul, I have sinned: return, my son David; for I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thine eyes this day: behold, I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly. 22. And David answered and said, Behold the king's spear! and let one of the young men come over and fetch it. 23. The LORD render to every man his righteousness, and his faithfulness: for the LORD delivered thee into my hand to-day; but I would not stretch forth mine hand against the LORD's anointed. 24. And, behold, as thy life was much set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be much set by in the eyes of the LORD, and let him deliver me out of all tribulation. 25. Then Saul said to David, Blessed be thou, my son David: thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt still prevail. So David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.

Here is,

I. Saul's penitent confession of his fault and folly in persecuting David, and his promise to do so no more. This second instance of David's respect to him wrought more upon him than the former, and extorted from him better acknowledgments, v. 21. 1. He owns himself melted and quite overcome by David's kindness to him; "My soul was precious in thine eyes this day, which, I thought, had been odious." 2. He acknowledges he had done very ill to persecute him: that he had therein acted against God's law, I have sinned; and against his own interest, "I have played the fool, in pursuing him as an enemy who would have been one of my best friends, if I could but have thought so; herein (says he) I have erred exceedingly, and wronged both thee and myself." Note, Those that sin, play the fool, and err exceedingly; those especially that hate, and persecute God's people, Job 19. 28. 3. He invites him to court again; Return, my son David. Those that understand themselves, will see it their interest to have those about them, that behave themselves wisely, as David did, and have God with them. 4. He promises him that he would not persecute him as he had done, but protect him; I will no more do thee harm. We have reason to think, according to the mind he was now in, that he meant as he said, and yet neither his confession nor his promise of amendment came from a principle of true repentance.

II. David's improvement of Saul's convictions and confessions, and the evidence he had to produce of his own sincerity. He desired that one of the footmen might fetch the spear, (v. 22.) and then, v. 23. 1. He appeals to God as Judge of the controversy; The Lord render to every man his righteousness. David, by faith, is sure that he will do it, for he infallibly knows the true characters of all persons and actions, and is inflexibly just to render to every man according to his work; and, by prayer, he desires he would do it, wherein he does, in effect, pray against Saul, who had dealt unrighteously and unfaithfully with him; Give them according to their deeds; (Ps. 28. 4.) but he principally intends it as a prayer for himself, that God would protect him in his righteousness and faithfulness, and reward him for it, since Saul so ill requited him. 2. He reminds Saul again of the proof which he had now given of his respect to him, from a principle of loyalty; I would not stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's anointed; intimating to Saul, that the anointing oil was his protection, for which he was indebted to the Lord, and ought to express his gratitude to him: had he been a common person, he would not have been so tender of him; and, perhaps, with this further suggestion, Saul knew, or had reason to think, that David was the Lord's anointed too, and therefore, by the same rule, Saul ought to be as tender of David's life as he had been of his. 3. Not relying much upon Saul's promises, he puts himself under God's protection, and begs his favour; (v. 24.) "Let my life be much set by in the eyes of the Lord, how light soever thou makest of it." Thus he takes God to be his Paymaster for his kindness to Saul, which they may with a holy confidence do, that do well and suffer for it.

III. Saul's prediction of David's advancement. He commends him; (v. 25.) Blessed be thou, my son David. So strong was the conviction Saul was now under of David's honesty, and he was not ashamed to condemn himself and applaud David, even in the hearing of his own soldiers, who could not but blush to think that they were come out so furiously against a man, whom their master, when he meets, caresses thus. He foretells his victories, and his elevation at last; Thou shalt do great things. Note, Those who make conscience of doing that which is truly good, may come, by the divine assistance, to do that which is truly great. He adds, "Thou shalt also still prevail, more and more;" he means, against himself, but was loath to speak that out. The princely qualities which appeared in David, his generosity in sparing Saul, his military authority in reprimanding Abner for sleeping, his care of the public good, and the signal token of God's presence with him, convinced Saul that he would certainly be advanced to the throne at last, according to the prophecies concerning him.

Lastly, A palliative cure being thus made of the wound, they parted friends. Saul returned to Gibeath re infecta—without accomplishing his design, and ashamed of the expedition he had made; but David could not take his word so far as to return with him. Those that have once been false, are not easily trusted another time. Therefore David went on his way. And, after this parting, it does not appear that ever Saul and David saw one another again.

CHAP. XXVII.

David was a man after God's own heart, and yet he had his faults, which are recorded, not for our imitation, but for our admonition; witness the story of this chapter, in which, though, I. We find, to his praise, that he prudently took care of his own safety and his family's, (v. 2. . 4.) and valiantly fought Israel's battles against the Canaanites; (v. 8, 9.) yet, II. We find, to his dishonour, 1. That he began to despair of his deliverance, v. 1. 2. That he deserted his own country, and went to dwell in the land of the Philistines, v. 1, 5. . 7. 3. That he imposed upon Achish with an equivocation, if not a lie, concerning his expedition, v. 10. . 12.

1. AND David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul: there is nothing better for me than that

I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair of me, to seek me any more in any coast of Israel: so shall I escape out of his hand. 2. And David arose, and he passed over with the six hundred men that were with him unto Achish, the son of Maach, king of Gath. 3. And David dwelt with Achish at Gath, he and his men, every man with his household, even David with his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the Carmelitess, Nabal's wife. 4. And it was told Saul that David was fled to Gath; and he sought no more again for him. 5. And David said unto Achish, If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city-with thee? 6. Then Achish gave him Ziklag that day: wherefore Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day. 7. And the time that David dwelt in the country of the Philistines was a full year and four months.

Here is,

I. The prevalency of David's fear, which was the effect of the weakness of his faith; v. 1. He said to his heart, (so it may be read,) in his communings with it concerning his present condition, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul. He represented to himself the restless rage and malice of Saul, who could not be wrought into a reconciliation; the treachery of his own countrymen, witness that of the Ziphites, once and again; he looked upon his own forces, and observed how few they were, and that no recruits had come in to him of a great while, nor could he perceive that he got any ground; and from hence, in a melancholy mood, he draws this dark conclusion, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul. But, O thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt? Was he not anointed to be king? Did not that simply give an assurance that he should be preserved to the kingdom? Though he had no reason to trust Saul's promises, had he not all the reason in the world to trust the promises of God? His experience of the particular care Providence took of him, ought to have encouraged him. He that has delivered, does and will. But unbelief is a sin that easily besets even good men. When without are fightings, within are fears, and it is a hard matter to get over them. Lord, increase our faith!

II. The resolution he came to hereupon. Now that Saul was, for this time, returned to his place, he determined to take this opportunity of retiring into the Philistines' country. Consulting his own heart only, and not the ephod or the prophet, he concludes, There is nothing better for me, than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines. Long trials are in danger of tiring the faith and patience even of very good men. Now, 1. Saul was an enemy to himself and his kingdom, in driving him to this extremity. He weakened his own interest when he expelled from his service, and forced into the service of his enemies, so great a general as David was, and so brave a regiment as he had the command of. 2. David was no friend to himself in taking this course. God had appointed him to set up his standard in the land of Judah;

(ch. 22. 5.) there God had wonderfully preserved him, and employed him sometimes for the good of his country; why then should he think of deserting his post? How could he expect the protection of the God of Israel, if he went out of the borders of the land of Israel? Can he expect to be safe among the Philistines, out of whose hands he had lately escaped so narrowly by feigning himself mad? Will he receive obligations from those now, whom he knows, when he comes to be king, he must not return kindness to, but be under an obligation to make war upon? He will hereby gratify his enemies, who bid him go serve other gods, that they might have wherewith to reproach him; and will very much weaken the hands of his friends, who would not have wherewith to answer that reproach. See what need we have to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

III. The kind reception he had at Gath; Achish bade him welcome, partly out of generosity, being proud of entertaining so brave a man; partly out of policy, hoping to engage him for ever to his service, and that his example would invite many more to desert, and come over to him. No doubt he gave David a solemn promise of protection, which he could rely upon, when he could not trust Saul's promises. We may blush to think that the word of a Philistine should go further than the word of an Israelite, who, if an Israelite indeed, would be without guile; and that the city of Gath should be a place of refuge for a good man when the cities of Israel refuse him a safe abode. David, 1. Brought his men with him, (v. 2.) that they might guard him, and might themselves be safe where he was; and to recommend himself the more to Achish, who hoped to have service out of him. 2. He brought his family with him, his wives and his household; so did all his men, v. 2, 3. Masters of families ought to take care of those that are committed to them, to protect and provide for those of their own house, and to dwell with them as men of knowledge.

IV. Saul's desisting from the further persecution of him; (v. 4.) He sought no more again for him; this intimates that, notwithstanding the professions of repentance he had lately made, if he had had David in his reach, he would have aimed another blow. But, because he dares not come where he is, he resolves to let him alone. Thus many seem to leave their sins, but really their sins leave them; they would persist in them, if they could. Saul sought no more for him, contenting himself with his banishment, since he could not have his blood; and hoping, it may be, (as he had done, ch. 8. 25.) that he would, some time or other, fall by the hand of the Philistines; and though he would rather have the pleasure of destroying him himself, yet if they do it, he will be satisfied, so that it be done effectually.

V. David's removal from Gath to Ziklag.

1. David's request for leave to remove, was prudent, and very modest, v. 5. (1.) It was really prudent. David knew what it was to be envied in the court of Saul, and had much more reason to fear in the court of Achish, and therefore declines preferment there, and wishes for a settlement in the country, where he might be private, more within himself, and less in other people's way. In a town of his own, he might have the more free exercise of his religion, and keep his men better to it, and not have his righteous soul vexed as it was at Gath, with the idolatries of the Philistines. (2.) As it was presented to Achish, it was very modest. He does not prescribe to him what place he should assign him, only begs it might be in some town in the country, where he pleased; beggars must not be choosers: but he gives this for a reason, "If thy should thy servant dwell in the royal city, to crowd thee, and disoblige those about thee?" Note, Those that would stand fast, must not covet to stand high; and humble souls aim not to dwell in royal cities.

2. The grant which Achish made him, upon that request, was very generous and kind; (v. 6, 7.) Achish gave him Ziklag. Hereby, (1.) Israel reco-ed their ancient right; for Ziklag was in the lot of the tribe of Judah, Josh. 15. 31. and afterward, out of that lot, was assigned, with some other cities, to Simeon, Josh. 19. 5. But either it was never subdued, or the Philistines had, in some struggle with Israel, made themselves masters of it. Perhaps they had got it unjustly, and Achish being a man of sense and honour, took this occasion to restore it. The righteous God judgeth righteously. (2.) David gained a commodious settlement, not only at a distance from Gath, but bordering upon Israel, where he might keep up a correspondence with his own countrymen, and whither they might resort to him, at the revolution that was now approaching. Though we do not find that he augmented his forces at all, while Saul lived, (for ch. 30. 10. he had but his six hundred men,) yet, immediately after Saul's death, that was the rendezvous of his friends. Nay, it should seem, while he kept himself close, because of Saul, multitudes resorted to him, at least, to assure him of their sincere intentions, 1 Chron. 12. 1-22. And this further advantage David gained, that Ziklag was annexed to the crown, at least the royalty of it pertained to the kings of Judah, ever after, v. 6. Note, There is nothing lost by humility and modesty, and a willingness to retire. Real advantages follow those that flee from imaginary honours. Here David continued for a full year and some days, even four months, as it may very well be read, (v. 7.) or some days above four months. The Seventy read it, some months; so long he waited for the set time of his accession to the throne; for he that believeth, shall not make haste.

8. And David and his men went up and invaded the Geshurites, and the Gezrites, and the Amalekites: for those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt. 9. And David smote the land, and left neither man nor woman alive; and took away the sheep, and the oxen, and the asses, and the camels, and the apparel, and returned, and came to Achish. 10. And Achish said, Whither have ye made a road to-day? And David said, Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the Kenites. 11. And David saved neither man nor woman alive to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David, and so will be his manner all the while he dwelleth in the country of the Philistines. 12. And Achish believed David, saying, He hath made his people Israel utterly to abhor him; therefore he shall be my servant for ever.

Here is an account of David's actions, while he was in the land of the Philistines; a fierce attack he made upon some remains of the devoted nations, his success in it, and the representation he gave of it to Achish.

1. We may acquit him of cruelty and injustice in this action, because these people whom he cut off, were such as Heaven had long since doomed to destruction, and he that did it, was one whom Heaven had ordained to dominion; so that the thing was very fit to be done, and he was very fit to do it. It was not for him that was anointed to fight the Lord's battles, to sit still in sloth, however he thought fit, in modesty, to retire. He desired to be safe from Saul, only that he might expose himself for Israel; he avenged an old quarrel that God had with these nations, and at the same time fetched in provisions for himself and his army, for by their swords they must live. The Amalekites were to be all cut off; probably the Geshurites and Gezrites were branches of Amalek: Saul was rejected for sparing them; David makes up the deficiency of his obedience before he succeeds him. He smote them, and left none alive, v. 8, 9. The service paid itself, for they carried off abundance of spoil, which served for the subsistence of David's forces.

2. Yet we cannot acquit him of dissimulation with Achish, in the account he gave him of this expedition.

(1.) David, it seems, was not willing that he should know the truth, and therefore spared none to carry tidings to Gath; (v. 11.) not because he was ashamed of what he had done as a bad thing, but because he was afraid, if the Philistines knew it, they would be apprehensive of danger to themselves or their allies, by harbouring him among them, and would expel him their coasts. It would be easy to conclude, If so he did, so will be his manner; and therefore he industriously conceals it from them, which, it seems, he could do, by putting them all to the sword; for none of their neighbours would inform against him, nor, perhaps, would soon come to the knowledge of what was done; intelligence not being so readily communicated then as now.

(2.) He hid it from Achish, with an equivocation not at all becoming his character. Being asked which way he had made his sally, he answered, Against the south of Judah, v. 10. It was true, he had invaded those countries that lay south of Judah, but he made Achish believe he had invaded those that lay south in Judah, the Ziphites, for example, that had once and again betrayed him; so Achish understood him, and from thence inferred that he had made his people Israel to abhor him, and so riveted himself in the interest of Achish. The fidelity of Achish to him, his good opinion of him, and the confidence he put in him, aggravate his sin in deceiving him thus; which with some other such instances, David seems penitently to reflect upon, when he prays, Remove from me the way of lying.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Preparations are herein making for that war which will put an end to the life and reign of Saul, and so make way for David to the throne. In this war, 1. The Philistines are the aggressors, and Achish their king makes David his confidant, v. 1, 2. 2. The Israelites prepare to receive them, and Saul their king makes the Devil his privy-counsellor, and thereby fills the measure of his iniquity. Observe, 1. The despairing condition which Saul was in, v. 3. 6. 2. The application he made to a witch, to bring him up Samuel, v. 7. 14. 3. His discourse with the apparition, v. 15. 19. 4. The damp it struck upon him, v. 21. 25.

1. AND it came to pass in those days, that the Philistines gathered their armies together for warfare, to fight with Israel. And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly, that thou shalt go out with me to battle, thou and thy men. 2. And David said to Achish, Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do. And Achish said to David, Therefore will I make thee keeper of mine head for ever. 3. Now Samuel was dead, and all Israel had lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city. And Saul had put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land. 4. And the Philistines gathered themselves together, and came and pitched in Shunem: and Saul gathered all Israel together, and they pitched in Gilboa. 5. And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled. 6. And when Saul inquired of the LORD, the LORD answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets.

Here is,

I. The design of the Philistines against Israel; they resolve to fight them, v. 1. If the Israelites had not forsaken God, there had been no Philistines remaining to molest them; if Saul had not forsaken him, they had by this time been put out of all danger by them. The Philistines took an opportunity to make this attempt, when they had David among them, whom they feared more than Saul and all his forces.

II. The expectation Achish had of assistance from David in this war, and the encouragement David gave him to expect it; "Thou shalt go with me to battle," says Achish, "if I protect thee, I may demand service from thee:" and he will think himself happy, if he may have such a man as David on his side, who prospered whithersoever he went. David gave him an ambiguous answer, "We will see what will be done, it will be time enough to talk of that hereafter; but surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do;" (v. 2.) that is, "I will consider in what post I may be best able to serve thee, if thou wilt but give me leave to choose it." Thus he keeps himself free from a promise to serve him, and yet keeps up his expectation of it. For Achish took it in no other sense than as an engagement to assist him, and promised him, thereupon, that he would make him captain of the guards, protector, or prime minister of state.

III. The drawing of the armies, on both sides, into the field, v. 4, The Philistines pitched in Shunem, which was in the tribe of Issachar, a great way north from their country. The land of Israel, it seems, was ill guarded, when the Philistines could march their army into the very heart of the country. Saul, while he pursued David, left his people naked and exposed. On some of the adjacent mountains of Gilboa, Saul musters his forces and prepares to engage the Philistines, which he had little heart to do, now that the Spirit of the Lord departed from him.

IV. The terror Saul was in, and the loss he was at, upon this occasion. He saw the host of the Philistines, and by his own view of them, and the intelligence his spies brought him, he perceived they were more numerous, better armed, and in better heart, than his own were, which made him afraid, so that his heart greatly trembled, v. 5. Had he kept close to God, he needed not have been afraid at the sight of an army of Philistines; but now that he had provoked God to forsake him, his interest failed, his armies dwindled, and looked mean, and, which was worse, his spirits failed him, his heart sunk within him. A guilty conscience made him tremble at the shaking of a leaf: now he remembered the guilty blood of the Amalekites, which he had spared, and the innocent blood of the priests, which he had spilt; his sins are set in order before his eyes, they put him into confusion, embarrass all his counsels, and rob him of his courage; so that there remained only a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation. Note, Troubles are terrors to the children of disobedience. In this distress, Saul inquired of the Lord, v. 6. Need drives those to God, who, in the day of their prosperity, slighted his oracles and altars. Lord, in trouble have they visited thee, Isa. 26. 16. Did ever any seek the Lord, and not find him? Yes, Saul did; the Lord answered him not, took no notice either of his petitions or of his inquiries; gave him no directions what to do, or any encouragement to hope that he would be with him. Should he be inquired of at all, by such a one as Saul? Ezek. 14. 3. No, he could not expect an answer of peace, for, 1. He inquired in such a manner, that it was as if he had not inquired at all. Therefore it is said, (1 Chron. 10. 14.) He inquired not of the Lord, for he did it faintly, and coldly, and with a secret design, if God did not answer him, to consult the Devil. He did not inquire in faith, but with a double unstable mind. 2. He inquired of the Lord when it was too late, when the days of his probation were over, and he was finally rejected. Seek the Lord while he may be found, for there is a time when he will not be found. 3. He had forfeited the benefit of all the methods of inquiry. Could he that hated and persecuted Samuel and David, who were both prophets, expect to be answered by prophets? Or he that hath slain the High Priest, to be answered by Urim? Or he that had sinned away the Spirit of grace, to be answered by dreams? No, Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

V. The mention of some things, that had happened a good while ago, to introduce the following story, v. 3. 1. The death of Samuel. Samuel was dead, which made the Philistines the more bold, and Saul the more afraid; for had Samuel been alive, Saul would, probably, have thought that his presence and countenance, his good advice and good prayers, would have availed him in his distress. 2. Saul's edict against witchcraft. He had put the laws in execution against those that had familiar spirits, who must not be suffered to live, Exod. 22. 18. Some think that he did this in the beginning of his reign, while he was under Samuel's influence; others think that it was lately done, for it was spoken of here, v. 9, as a late edict. Perhaps, when Saul was himself troubled with an evil spirit, he suspected that he was bewitched, and, for that reason, cut off all that had familiar spirits. Many seem zealous against sin, when they themselves are any way hurt by it, (they will inform against swearers if they swear at them, or against drunkards, if, in their drink, they abuse them,) who otherwise have no concern for the glory of God, nor any dislike of sin as sin. However, it was commendable in Saul, thus to use his power for the terror and restraint of these evil doers. Note, Many seem enemies to sin in others, while they indulge it in themselves. Saul will drive the Devil out of his kingdom, and yet harbour him in his heart, by envy and malice.

7. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her and inquire of her. And his servants said unto him, Behold, there is a woman that hath a familiar spirit at En-dor. 8. And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and he went, and two men with him, and they came to the woman by night: and he said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me him up whom I shall name unto thee. 9. And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those that have familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land: wherefore then layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die? 10. And Saul sware to her by the LORD, saying, As the LORD liveth, there shall no punishment happen to thee for this thing. 11. Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel. 12. And when the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice; and the woman spake to Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul. 13. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid: for what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth. 14. And he said unto her, What form is he of? And she said, An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a mantle. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself.

Here,

I. Saul seeks for a witch, v. 7. When God answereth him not, if he had humbled himself by repentance, and persevered in seeking God, who knows but at length he might have been entreated for him? But since he can discern no comfort, either from heaven or earth, (Isa. 8. 21, 22.) he resolves to knock at the gates of hell, and to see if any there will befriend him, and give him advice; Seek me a woman that has a familiar spirit, v. 7. And his servants were too officious to serve him in this bad affair; they presently recommended one to him at En-dor, (a city not far off,) who had escaped the execution of Saul's edict: to her he resolves to apply himself. Herein he is chargeable, 1. With contempt of the God of Israel; as if any creature could do him a kindness, when God had left him, and frowned upon him. 2. With contradiction to himself. He knew the heinousness of the sin of witchcraft, else he would not have cut off those that had familiar spirits; yet now he has recourse to that as an oracle, which he had before condemned as an abomination. It is common for men to inveigh severely against those sins which they are in no temptation to, but suffer themselves afterward to be overcome by them. Had one told Saul, when he was destroying the witches, that he himself would, ere long, consult with one, he would have said, as Hazeel did, What! is thy servant a dog? But who knows what mischiefs they will run into, that forsake God, and are forsaken of him?

II. Hearing of one, he hastens to her, but goes by night, and in disguise, only with two servants, and probably on foot, v. 8. See how those that are led captive by Satan, are forced, 1. To disparage themselves. Never did Saul look so mean as when he went sneaking to a sorry witch to know his fortune. 2. To dissemble. Evil works are works of darkness, and they hate the light, neither care for coming to

it. Saul went to the witch, not in his robes, but in the habit of a common soldier; not only lest the witch herself, if she had known him, should have declined to serve him, either fearing he came to trepan her, or resolving to be avenged on him for his edict against those of her profession, but lest his own people should know it, and abhor him for it. Such is the power of natural conscience, that even those who do evil, blush, and are ashamed to do it.

III. He tells her his errand, and promises her impunity. 1. All he desires of her is, to bring him up one from the dead, whom he had a mind to discourse with. It was necromancy, or divination by the dead, that he hoped to serve his purpose by; this was expressly forbidden by the law, (Deut. 18. 11.) seeking for the living to the dead, Isa. 8. 19. Bring me up him whom I shall name, v. 8. This supposes that it was generally taken for granted, that souls exist after death, and that, when men die, there is not an end of them: it supposes too that great knowledge was attributed to separate souls. But to think that any good souls should come up at the beck of an evil spirit, or that God, who had denied a man the benefit of his own institutions should suffer him to reap any real advantage by a cursed diabolical invention, was very absurd. 2. She signifies her fear of the law, and her suspicion that this stranger came to draw her into a snare: (v. 9.) Thou knowest what Saul has done. Providence ordered it so, that Saul should be told to his face, of his edict against witches, at this very time when he was consulting one, for the greater aggravation of his sin. She insists upon the peril of the law, perhaps to raise her price; for, though no mention is made of her fee, no doubt she demanded, and had, a large one. Observe how sensible she is of danger from the edict of Saul, and what care she is in to guard against it; but not at all apprehensive of the obligations of God's law, and the terrors of his wrath. She considers what Saul had done, not what God had done, against such practices, and fears a snare laid for her life, more than a snare laid for her soul. It is common for sinners to be more afraid of punishment from men, than of God's righteous judgment. But, 3. Saul promises with an oath not to betray her, v. 10: It was his duty, as a king, to punish her, and he knew it, yet he swears not to do it; as if he could by his own oath bind himself from doing that, which, by the divine command, he was bound to do. But he promised more than he could perform, when he said, There shall no punishment happen to thee; for he could not secure himself, much less secure her, from divine vengeance.

IV. Samuel, who was lately dead, is the person whom Saul desired to have some talk with; and the witch, with her enchantments, gratifies his desire, and brings them together.

1. As soon as Saul had given the witch the assurance she desired, (that he would not discover her,) she applied herself to her witchcrafts, and asked very confidently, Whom shall I bring up to thee? v. 11. Note, Hopes of impunity embolden sinners in their evil ways, and harden their hearts.

2. Saul desires to speak with Samuel, Bring me up Samuel. Samuel had anointed him to the kingdom, and had formerly been his faithful friend and counsellor, and therefore with him he wished to advise. While Samuel was living at Ramah, not far from Gibeah of Saul, and presided there in the school of the prophets, we never read of Saul's going to him to advise with him in any of the difficulties he was in; (it had been well for him if he had;) then he slighted him, and perhaps hated him, looking upon him to be in David's interest: but now that he is dead, "O for Samuel again! By all means, bring me up Samuel." Note, Many that despise and persecute God's saints and ministers when they are living, would be glad to have them again, when they are gone. Send Lazarus to me, and send Lazarus to my father's house, Luke 16. 24-27. The sepulchres of the righteous are garnished.

3. Here is a seeming defect or chasm in the story: Saul said, Bring me up Samuel, and the very next words are, When the woman saw Samuel, v. 12. Whereas one would have expected to be told how she performed the operation, what spells and charms she used, or that some little intimation should be given of what she said or did: but the profound silence of the scripture concerning it, forbids our coveting to know the depths of Satan, (Rev. 2. 24.) or to have our curiosity gratified with an account of the mysteries of iniquity. It has been said of the books of some of the popish confessors, that, by their descriptions of sin, they have taught men to commit it; but the scripture conceals sinful art, that we may be simple concerning evil, Rom. 16. 19.

4. The witch, upon sight of the apparition, was aware that her client was Saul: her familiar spirit, it is likely, informing her of it, v. 12, "Why hast thou deceived me with a disguise? for thou art Saul, the very man that I am afraid of above any man!" Thus she gave Saul to understand the power of her art, in that she could discover him through his disguise; and yet she feared lest, hereafter, at least, he should take advantage against her for what she was now doing. Had she believed that it was really Samuel whom she saw, she would have had no reason to be afraid of him, who was a good prophet, than of Saul, who was a wicked king. But the wrath of earthly princes is feared by most, more than the wrath of the King of kings.

5. Saul (who, we may suppose, was kept at a distance in the next room) bade her not be afraid of him, but go on with the operation, and inquired what she saw? v. 13. O, says the woman, I saw gods ascending out of the earth: that is, a spirit: they called angels gods, because spiritual beings. Poor gods that ascend out of the earth! But she speaks the language of the heathen, who had their infernal deities, and had them in veneration. If Saul had thought it necessary to his conversation with Samuel, that the body of Samuel should be called out of the grave, he would have taken the witch with him to Ramah, where his sepulchre was; but the design was wholly upon his soul, which yet, if it became visible, was expected to appear in the usual resemblance of the body; and God permitted the Devil, to answer the design, to put on Samuel's shape, that they who would not receive the love of the truth, might be given up to strong delusion, and believe a lie. That it could not be the soul of Samuel himself, they might easily apprehend, when it ascended out of the earth; for the spirit of a man, much more of a good man, goes upward, Eccl. 3. 21. But if people will be deceived, it is just with God to say, "Let them be deceived." That the Devil, by the divine permission, should be able to personate Samuel, is not strange, since he can transform himself into an angel of light: nor is it strange that he should be permitted to do it upon this occasion; that Saul might be driven to despair, by inquiring of the Devil, since he would not, in a right manner, inquire of the Lord, by which he might have had comfort. Saul, being told of gods ascending, was eager to know what was the form of this deity, and in what shape he appeared; so far was he from conceiving any horror at it, his heart being wretchedly hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. Saul, it seems, was not permitted to see any manner of similitude himself, but he must take the woman's word for it, that she saw an old man covered with a mantle, or robe, the habit of a judge, which Samuel had sometimes worn; and, some think, it was for the sake of that, and the majesty of its aspect, that she called this apparition Elohim, a god, or gods; for so magistrates are styled, Ps. 82. 1.

6. Saul perceiving, by the woman's description, that it was Samuel, stooped with his face to the ground, either, as it is generally taken, in reverence to Samuel, though he saw him not, or perhaps to listen to that soft and muttering voice which he now expected to hear; for they that had familiar spirits, peeped and muttered; (Isa. 8. 19.) and, it should seem, Saul bowed himself, (probably by the witch's direction,) that he might hear what was whispered, and listen carefully to it; for the voice of one that has a familiar spirit, is said to come out of the ground, and to whisper out of the dust, Isa. 29. 4. He would stoop to that who would not stoop to the word of God.

15. And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up? And Saul answered, I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams: therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do. 16. Then said Samuel, Wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the LORD is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy? 17. And the LORD hath done to him, as he spake by me: for the LORD hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand, and given it to thy neighbour, even to David: 18. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the LORD, nor executedst his fierce wrath upon Amalek, therefore hath the LORD done this thing unto thee this day. 19. Moreover the LORD will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines; and to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me: the LORD also shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines.

We have here the conference between Saul and Satan. Saul came in disguise, (v. 6.) but Satan soon discovered him, v. 12. Satan comes in disguise, in the disguise of Samuel's mantle, and Saul cannot discover him. Such is the disadvantage we labour under, in wrestling with the rulers of the darkness of this world, that they know us, while we are ignorant of their wiles and devices.

I. The spectre, or apparition, personating Samuel, asks why he is sent for, (v. 15.) Why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up? To us this discovers that it was an evil spirit that personated Samuel; for (as Bishop Patrick observes) it is not in the power of witches to disturb the rest of good men, and to bring them back into the world when they please: nor would the true Samuel have acknowledged such a power in magical arts: but to Saul this was a proper device of Satan's to draw veneration from him, to possess him with an opinion of the power of divination, and so to rivet him in the Devil's interests.

II. Saul makes his complaint to this counterfeit Samuel, mistaking him for the true; and a most doleful complaint it is: "I am sore distressed, and know not what to do, for the Philistines make war against me; yet I should do well enough with them, if I had but the tokens of God's presence with me; but, alas! God is departed from me." He complained not of God's withdrawals till he fell into trouble, till the Philistines made war against him, and then he begins to lament God's departure. He that in his prosperity inquired not after God, in his adversity thought it hard that God answered him not, nor took any notice of his inquiries, either by dreams or prophets; he neither gave answers immediately himself, nor sent them by any of his messengers. He does not, like a penitent, own the righteousness of God in this; but, like a man enraged, flies out against God as unkind, and flies off from him; therefore I have called thee: as if Samuel, a servant of God, would favour those whom God frowned upon; or as if a dead prophet could do him more service than the living ones. One would think, from this, that he really desired to meet with the Devil, and expected no other, (though under the covert of Samuel's name,) for he desires advice otherwise than from God, therefore from the Devil, that is, a rival with God. "God denies me, therefore I come to thee." Flectere si nequeo Superos, Acheronta movebo—If I fail with Heaven, I will succeed with Hell.

III. It is cold comfort which this evil spirit in Samuel's mantle gives to Saul, and is manifestly intended to drive him to despair and self-murder. Had it been the true Samuel, when Saul desired to be told what he should do, he would have bid him repent, and make his peace with God, and recall David from his banishment; and would then have told him, that he might hope in this way to find mercy with God: but, instead of that, he represents his case as helpless and hopeless, serving him as he did Judas, to whom he was first a tempter, and then a tormentor, persuading him first to sell his Master, and then to hang himself.

1. He upbraids him with his present distress; (v. 16.) he tells him, not only that God was departed from him, but that he was become his Enemy, and therefore he must expect no comfortable answer from him; "Wherefore dost thou ask me?" How can I be thy friend, when God is thine enemy; or thy counsellor, when he has left thee?"

2. He upbraids him with the anointing of David to the kingdom, v. 17. He could not have touched upon a string that sounded more unpleasant in the ear of Saul than this. Nothing is said to reconcile him to David, but all tends rather to exasperate him against David, and widen the breach. Yet, to make him believe that he was Samuel, he says, it was what God spake by him. The Devil knows how to speak with an air of religion, and can teach false apostles to transform themselves into the apostles of Christ, and imitate their language. Those who use spells and charms, and plead, in defence of them, that they find nothing in them but what is good, may remember what good words the Devil here spoke, and yet with what a malicious design.

3. He upbraids him with his disobedience to the command of God, in not destroying the Amalekites, v. 18. Satan had helped him to palliate and excuse that sin, when Samuel was dealing with him to bring him to repentance; but now he aggravates it, to make him despair of God's mercy. See what they get, that hearken to Satan's temptations! He himself will be their accuser, and insult over them. And see whom they resemble, that allure others to that which is evil, and reproach them for it when they have done.

4. He foretells his approaching ruin, v. 19. (1.) That his army should be routed by the Philistines. This is twice mentioned; The Lord shall deliver Israel into the hand of the Philistines. This he might foresee, by considering the superior strength and number of the Philistines, the weakness of the armies of Israel, Saul's terror, and especially God's departure from them. Yet, to personate a prophet, he very gravely ascribes it once and again to God; The Lord shall do it. (2.) That he and his sons should be slain in the battle. To-morrow, that is, in a little time, (and supposing that it was now after midnight, I see not but it may be taken strictly for the very next day after that which was now begun,) thou and thy sons shall be with me; that is, in the state of the dead, separate from the body. Had this been the true Samuel, he could not have foretold it, unless God had revealed it to him; and though it were an evil spirit, God might by him foretell it; as we read of an evil spirit that foresaw Ahab's fall at Ramoth-Gilead, and was instrumental in it, (1 Kings 22. 20, &c.) as perhaps this evil spirit was, by the divine permission, in Saul's destruction. That evil spirit flattered Ahab, this frightened Saul, and both, that they might fall; so miserable are they that are under the power of Satan; for whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest, Prov. 29. 9.

20. Then Saul fell straightway all along on the earth, and was sore afraid, because of the words of Samuel: and there was no strength in him; for he had eaten no bread all the day, nor all the night. 21. And the woman came unto Saul, and saw that he was sore troubled, and said unto him, Behold, thine handmaid hath obeyed thy voice, and I have put my life in my hand, and have hearkened unto thy words which thou spakest unto me. 22. Now therefore, I pray thee, hearken thou also unto the voice of thine handmaid, and let me set a morsel of bread before thee; and eat, that thou mayest have strength when thou goest on thy way. 23. But he refused, and said, I will not eat. But his servants, together with the woman, compelled him; and he hearkened unto their voice. So he arose from the earth, and sat upon the bed. 24. And the woman had a fat calf in the house, and she hasted, and killed it, and took flour, and kneaded it, and did bake unleavened bread thereof: 25. And she brought it before Saul, and before his servants; and they did eat. Then they rose up, and went away that night.

We are here told how Saul received this terrible message from the ghost he consulted. He desired to be told what he should do, (v. 15.) but it only told what he had not done, and what should be done to him. Those that expect any good counsel or comfort otherwise than from God, and in the way of his institutions, will be as wretchedly disappointed as Saul here was. Observe,

1. How he sunk under the load, v. 20. He was indeed unfit to bear it, having eaten nothing all the day before, nor that night: he came fasting from the camp, and continued fasting; not for want of food, but for want of an appetite. The fear he was in of the power of the Philistines, (v. 5.) took away his appetite; or perhaps the struggle he had with his own conscience, after he had entertained the thought of consulting the witch, made him to nauseate even his necessary food, though ever so dainty. This made him an easy prey to this fresh terror, that now came upon him like an armed man. He fell along on the earth, as if the archers of the Philistines had already hit him, and there was no strength in him to bear up against these heavy tidings. Now he had enough of consulting witches, and found them miserable comforters. When God in his word speaks terror to sinners, he opens to them, at the same time, a door of hope, if they repent: but they that apply themselves to the gates of hell for succour, must there expect darkness without any glimpse of light.

II. With what difficulty he was persuaded to take so much relief as was necessary to carry him back to his post in the camp. The witch, it should seem, had left Saul alone with the spectre, to have his talk with him by himself: but, perhaps, hearing him fall and groan, and perceiving him to be in an agony, she came to him, (v. 21.) and was importunate with him to take some refreshment, that he might be able to get clear from her house, fearing that if he should be ill, especially if he should die there, she should be punished for it as a traitor, though she had escaped punishment as a witch. This, it is probable, rather than any sentiment of kindness, made her solicitous to help him. But what a deplorable condition had he brought himself to, when he needed so wretched a comforter!

1. She shows herself very importunate with him to take some refreshment; she pleads, (v. 21.) that she had obeyed his voice to the endangering of her life; and why therefore should not he hearken to her voice for the relieving of his life, v. 22. She had a fat calf at hand, (and the word signifies one that was made use of in treading out the corn, and therefore could the worse be spared,) this she prepares for his entertainment, v. 24. Josephus is large in applauding the extraordinary courtesy and liberality of this woman, and recommending it for an example of compassion to the distressed, and readiness to communicate for their relief, though we have no prospect of being recompensed for it.

2. He showed himself very averse to it; He refused, and said, I will not eat, (v. 23.) choosing rather to die obscurely by famine than honourably by the sword. Had he laboured only under a defect of animal spirits, food might help him; but, alas! his case was out of the reach of such succours. What are dainty meats to a wounded conscience? As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to a heavy heart; so disagreeable and unwelcome.

3. The woman at length, with the help of his servants, over-persuaded him, against his inclination and resolution, to take some refreshment. Not by force, but by friendly advice, they compelled him; (v. 23.) and of no other than such a rational and courteous compulsion, are we to understand that in the parable, Compel them to come in, Luke 14. 23. How forcibly are right words, when men are pressed by them to that which is for their own interest! Job. 6. 25. Saul was somewhat revived with this entertainment; so that he and his servants, when they had eaten, rose up and went away before it was light, (v. 25.) that they might hasten to their business, and that they might not be seen to come out of such a scandalous house. Josephus here much admires the bravery and magnanimity of Saul, that though he was assured he should lose both his life and honour, yet he would not desert his army, but resolutely returned to the camp, and stood ready for an engagement. I wonder more at the hardness of his heart, that he did not again apply himself to God by repentance and prayer, in hopes yet to obtain, at least, a reprieve; but he desperately ran headlong upon his own ruin. Perhaps, indeed, now that rage and envy possessed him to the uttermost, he was the better reconciled to his hard fate, being told that his sons, and Jonathan among the rest, whom he hated for his affection to David, should die with him. If he must fall, he cared not what desolations of his family and kingdom accompanied his fall, hoping it would be the worse for his successor, ἐὰν θανόντος γὰρ μὴ μέτα πυρὶ—I care not if, when I am dead, the world be set on fire. He begged not, as David, "Let thy hand be against me, but not against thy people."

CHAP. XXIX.

How Saul, who was forsaken of God, when he was in a strait, was more and more perplexed and embarrassed with his own counsels, we read in the foregoing chapter; in this chapter, we find how David, who kept close to God, when he was in a strait, was extricated and brought off by the providence of God, without any contrivance of his own. We have him, I. Marching with the Philistines, v. 1, 2. II. Excepted against by the lords of the Philistines, v. 3. . . 5. III. Happily dismissed by Achish, from the service which did so ill become him, and which yet he knew not how to decline, v. 6. . . 11.

1. NOW the Philistines gathered together all their armies to Aphek: and the Israelites pitched by a fountain which is in Jezreel. 2. And the lords of the Philistines passed on by hundreds, and by thousands: but David and his men passed on in the rearward with Achish. 3. Then said the princes of the Philistines, What do these Hebrews here? And Achish said unto the princes of the Philistines, Is not this David, the servant of Saul the king of Israel, which hath been with me these days, or these years, and I have found no fault in him since he fell unto me unto this day? 4. And the princes of the Philistines were wroth with him; and the princes of the Philistines said unto him, Make this fellow return, that he may go again to his place which thou hast appointed him, and let him not go down with us to battle, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us: for wherewith should he reconcile himself unto his master? Should it not be with the heads of these men? 5. Is not this David, of whom they sang one to another in dances, saying, Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands?

Here is,

I. The great strait that David was in, which we may suppose he himself was aware of, though we read not of his asking advice from God, nor any project of his own to get clear of it. The two armies of the Philistines and the Israelites were encamped and ready to engage, v. 1. Achish, who had been kind to David, had obliged him to come himself, and bring the forces he had, into his service. David came accordingly, and, upon a review of the army, was found with Achish, in the post assigned him in the rear, v. 2. Now, 1. If, when the armies engaged, he should retire and quit his post, he would fall under the indelible reproach, not only of cowardice and treachery, but of base ingratitude to Achish, who had been his protector and benefactor, and had reposed a confidence in him, and from whom he had received a very honourable commission. Such an unprincipled thing as this, he could by no means persuade himself to do. 2. If he should, as was expected from him, fight for the Philistines against Israel, he would incur the imputation of being an enemy to the Israel of God, and a traitor to his country; would make his own people hate him, and unanimately oppose his coming to the crown, as unworthy the name of an Israelite, much more the honour and trust of a king of Israel, who had fought against them, under the banner of the uncircumcised. If Saul should be killed (as it proved he was) in this engagement, the fault would be laid at David's door, as if he had killed him; so that on each side there seemed to be both sin and scandal. This was the strait he was in; and a great strait it was to a good man, greater to see sin before him than to see trouble. Into this strait he brought himself by his own unadvisedness, in quitting the land of Judah, and going among the uncircumcised. It is strange, if those that associate themselves with wicked people, and grow intimate with them, come off without guilt, or grief, or both. What he himself proposed to do, does not appear. Perhaps he designed to act only as a keeper to the king's head, the post assigned him, (ch. 28. 2.) and not to do any thing offensively against Israel. But it would have been very hard to come so near the brink of sin, and not to fall in. Therefore, though God might justly have left him in this difficulty, to chastise him for his folly, yet, because his heart was upright with him, he would not suffer him to be tempted above what he was able, but with the temptation made a way for him to escape, 1 Cor. 10. 13.

II. A door opened for his deliverance out of this strait. God inclined the hearts of the princes of the Philistines to oppose his being employed in the battle, and to insist upon his being dismissed. Thus their enmity befriended him, when no friend he had was capable of doing him such a kindness. 1. It was a proper question which they asked, upon the mustering of the forces; "What do these Hebrews here?" v. 3. What confidence can we put in them? Or what service can we expect from them? A Hebrew is out of his place, and, if he have the spirit of a Hebrew, is out of his element, when he is in the camp of the Philistines, and deserves to be made uneasy there. David used to hate the congregation of evil doers, (Ps. 26. 5.) however he came now to be among them. 2. It was an honourable testimony which Achish, on this occasion, gave to David. He looked upon him as a refugee, that fled from a wrongful persecution in his own country, and had put himself under his protection, whom therefore he was obliged, in justice, to take care of, and thought he might in prudence employ; for (says he) he has been with me these days, or these years, that is, a considerable time, many days at his court, and a year or two in his country, and he never found any fault in him, nor saw any cause to distrust his fidelity, or to think any other than that he was heartily come over to him. By this it appears, that David had conducted himself with a great deal of caution, and had prudently concealed the affection he still retained for his own people. We have need to walk in wisdom toward them that are without, to keep our mouth when the wicked is before us, and to be upon the reserve. 3. Yet the princes are peremptory in it, that he must be sent home; and they give good reasons for their insisting on it. (1.) Because he had been an old enemy to the Philistines; witness what was sung in honour of his triumphs over them, Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands, v. 5. "It will be a reproach to us to harbour and trust so noted a destroyer of our people; nor can it be thought that he should now act heartily against Saul, who then acted so vigorously with him and for him." Who would be fond of popular praise and applause, when even that may, another time, be turned against a man to his reproach? (2.) Because he might be a most dangerous enemy to them, and do them more mischief than all Saul's army could, v. 4. "He may in the battle be an adversary to us, and surprise us with an attack in the rear, while their army charges us in the front; and we have reason to think he will do so, that, by betraying us, he may reconcile himself to his master. Who can trust a man, who, besides his affection to his country, will think it his interest to be false to us?" It is dangerous to put confidence in a reconciled enemy.

6. Then Achish called David, and said unto him, Surely, as the Lord liveth, thou hast been upright, and thy going out and thy coming in with me in the host is good in my sight; for I have not found evil in thee since the day of thy coming unto me unto this day: nevertheless, the lords favour thee not. 7. Wherefore, now return, and go in peace, that thou displease not the lords of the Philistines. 8. And David said unto Achish, But what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant, so long as I have been with thee unto this day, that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord the king? 9. And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God: notwithstanding, the princes of the Philistines have said, He shall not go up with us to the battle. 10. Wherefore now rise up early in the morning, with thy master's servants that are come with thee: and as soon as ye be up early in the morning, and have light, depart. 11. So David and his men rose up early to depart in the morning, to return into the land of the Philistines: and the Philistines went up to Jezreel.

If the reasons Achish had to trust David, were stronger than the reasons which the princes offered why they should distrust him, (as I do not see that, in policy, they were, for the princes were certainly in the right,) yet Achish was but one of five, though the chief, and the only one that had the title of king; accordingly, in a council of war, held on this occasion, he was over-voted, and obliged to dismiss David, though he was extremely fond of him. Kings cannot always do as they would, nor have such as they would about them.

1. The discharge Achish gives him, is very honourable, and not a final discharge, but only from the present service. (1.) He signifies the great pleasure and satisfaction he had taken in him, and in his conversation. Thou art good in my sight as an angel of God, v. 9. Wise and good men will gain respect, wherever they go, from all that know how to make a right estimate of persons and things, though of different professions in religion. What Achish says of David, God, by the prophet, says of the house of David, (Zech. 12. 8.) that it shall be as the angel of the Lord. But the former is a court compliment; the latter is a divine promise. (2.) He gives him a testimonial of his good behaviour, v. 6. It is very full, and in obliging terms; "Thou hast been upright, and thy whole conduct has been good in my sight, and I have not found evil in thee." Saul would not have given him such a testimonial, though he had done far more service to him than to Achish.. God's people should behave themselves always so unoffensively, as, if possible, to get the good word of all they have dealings with: and it is a debt we owe to those who have acquitted themselves well, to give them the praise of it. (3.) He lays all the blame of his dismissal upon the princes, who would by no means suffer him to continue in the camp. "The king loves thee entirely, and would venture his life in thy hand; but the lords favour thee not, and we must not disoblige them, nor can we oppose them, therefore return, and go in peace." He had better part with his favourite, than occasion a disgust among his generals, and a mutiny in his army. He intimates a reason why they were uneasy; it was not so much for his own sake, as for the sake of his soldiers that attended him, whom he calls his master's servants, namely, Saul's; (v. 10.) they could trust him, but not them. (4.) He orders him to be gone early, as soon as it was light, (v. 10.) to prevent their further resentments, and the jealousies they would have been apt to conceive if he had lingered.

2. His reception of this discourse is very complimentary; but, I fear, not without some degree of dissimulation. "What!" says David, "must I leave my lord the king, whom I am bound by office to protect, just now when he is going to expose himself in the field? Why may not I go fight against the enemies of my lord the king?" v. 8. He seemed anxious to serve him, when he was at this juncture really anxious to leave him; but he was not willing that Achish should know that he was. No one knows how strong the temptation is to compliment and dissemble, which they are in, that attend great men, and how hard it is to avoid it.

3. God's providence ordered it wisely and graciously for him. For, besides that the snare was broken, and he was delivered out of the dilemma to which he was reduced, it proved a happy hastening of him to the relief of his own city, which sorely wanted him, though he did not know it. Thus the disgrace which the lords of the Philistines put upon him, proved more ways than one, an advantage to him. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and he delighteth in his way. What he does with us, we know not now, but we shall know hereafter and shall see it was all for good.

CHAP. XXX.

When David was dismissed from the army of the Philistines, he did not go over to the camp of Israel, but, being expelled by Saul, observed an exact neutrality, and silently retired to his own city Ziklag, leaving the armies ready to engage. Now here we are told, I. What a melancholy posture he found the city in, all laid waste by the Amalekites, and what distress it occasioned him and his men, v. 1. . 6. II. What course he took to recover what he had lost. He inquired of God, and took out a commission from him, v. 7, 8. pursued the enemy, v. 9, 10. gained intelligence from a straggler, v. 11. . 15. attacked and routed the plunderers, v. 16, 17. and recovered all they had carried off, v. 18. . 20. III. What method he observed in the distribution of the spoil, v. 21. . 31.

1. AND it came to pass, when David and his men were come to Ziklag on the third day, that the Amalekites had invaded the south, and Ziklag, and smitten Ziklag, and burnt it with fire; 2. And had taken the women captives that were therein: they slew not any, either great or small, but carried them away, and went on their way. 3. So David and his men came to the city, and, behold, it was burnt with fire; and their wives, and their sons, and their daughters, were taken captives. 4. Then David and the people that were with him lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no more power to weep. 5. And David's two wives were taken captives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite. 6. And David was greatly distressed: for the people spake of stoning him; because the soul of all the people was grieved, every man for his sons and for his daughters: but David encouraged himself in the Lord his God.

Here is,

I. The descent which the Amalekites made upon Ziklag, in David's absence, and the desolations they made there. They surprised the city when it was left unguarded, plundered it, burnt it, and carried all the women and children captives, v. 1, 2. They intended, by this, to avenge the like havoc that David had lately made of them and their country, ch. 27. 8. He that had made so many enemies, ought not to have left his own concerns so naked and defenceless. They that make bold with others, must expect that others will make as bold with them, and provide accordingly. Now observe in this, 1. The cruelty of Saul's piety (as it proved) in sparing the Amalekites; if he had utterly destroyed them, as he ought to have done, these had not been in being to do this mischief. 2. How David was corrected for being so forward to go with the Philistines against Israel. God showed him that he had better have staid at home, and looked after his own business. When we go abroad in the way of our duty, we may comfortably hope that God will take care of our families in our absence, but not otherwise. 3. How wonderfully God inclined the hearts of these Amalekites to carry the women and children away captives, and not to kill them. When David invaded them, he put all to the sword; (ch. 27. 9.) and no reason can be given why they did not retaliate upon this city, but that God restrained them; for he has all hearts in his hands, and says to the fury of the most cruel men, Hitherto thou shalt come, and no further. Whether they spared them, to lead them in triumph, or to sell them, or to use them for slaves, God's hand must be acknowledged, who designed to make use of the Amalekites for the correction, not for the destruction, of the house of David.

II. The confusion and consternation that David and his men were in, when they found their houses in ashes, and their wives and children gone into captivity. Three days' march they had from the camp of the Philistines to Ziklag; and now that they came thither weary, but hoping to find rest in their houses, and joy in their families, behold, a black and dismal scene is presented to them, (v. 3.) which made them all weep, David himself not excepted, though they were men of war, till they had no more power to weep, v. 4. The mention of David's wives, Ahinoam and Abigail, and their being carried captive, intimate that that went nearer his heart than any thing else. Note, It is no disparagement to the boldest and bravest spirits, to lament the calamities of relations and friends. Observe, 1. This trouble came upon them when they were absent. It was the ancient policy of Amalek to take Israel at an advantage. 2. It met them at their return, and for aught that appears, their own eyes gave them the first intelligence of it. Note, When we go abroad, we cannot foresee what evil tidings may meet us when we come home again. The going out may be very cheerful, and yet the coming in be very doleful.

Boast not thyself therefore of to-morrow, nor of to-night neither, for thou knowest not what a day, or a piece of a day, may bring forth, Prov. 27. 1. If, when we come off a journey, we find our tabernacles in peace, and not laid waste, as David here found his, let the Lord be praised for it.

III. The mutiny and murmuring of David's men against him, v. 6. David was greatly distressed, for, in the midst of all his losses, his own people spake of stoning him, 1. Because they looked upon him as the occasion of their calamities, by the provocation he had given the Amalekites, and his indiscretion in leaving Ziklag without a garrison in it. Thus apt are we, when we are in trouble, to fly into a rage against those who are, in any way, the occasion of our trouble, while we overlook the Divine Providence, and have not that regard to the operations of God's hand in it, which would silence our passions, and make us patient. 2. Because now they began to despair of that preferment which they promised themselves in following David. They hoped, ere this, to have been all princes; and now, to find themselves all beggars, was such a disappointment to them, as made them grow outrageous, and threaten the life of him, on whom, under God, they had the greatest dependence. What absurdities will not ungoverned passions plunge men into! This was a sore trial to the man after God's own heart, and could not but go very near him. Saul had driven him from his country, the Philistines had driven him from their camp, the Amalekites had plundered his city, his wives were taken prisoners, and now, to complete his woe, his own familiar friends, in whom he trusted, whom he had sheltered, and who did eat of his bread, instead of sympathizing with him, and offering him any relief, lifted up the heel against him, and threatened to stone him. Great faith must expect such severe exercises. But it is observable that David was reduced to this extremity just before his accession to the throne; at this present time, perhaps, the stroke was struck, which opened the door to his advancement. Things are sometimes at the worst with the church and people of God, just before they begin to mend.

IV. David's pious dependence upon the Divine Providence and grace, in this distress. But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God. 1. His men fretted at their loss; the soul of the people was bitter, so the word is; their own discontent and impatience added wormwood and gall to the affliction and misery, and made it doubly grievous. But David bore it better, though he had more reason than any of them to lament it; they gave liberty to their passions, but he set his graces on work, and, by encouraging himself in God, while they dispirited each other, he kept his spirit calm and sedate. Or, 2. David's language opposed itself to the threatening words his men gave out against him, they spake of stoning him; but he, not offering to avenge the affront, not terrified by their menaces, encouraged himself in the Lord his God; believed and considered, with application to his present case, the power and providence of God, his justice and goodness, the method he commonly takes of bringing low, and then raising up; his care of his people that serve him, and trust in him, and the particular promises he had made to him of bringing him safe to the throne; with these considerations he supported himself, not doubting but the present trouble would end well. Note, Those that have taken the Lord for their God, may take encouragement from their relation to him in the worst of times. It is the duty and interest of all good people, whatever happens, to encourage themselves in God as their Lord and their God, assuring themselves that he can and will bring light out of darkness, peace out of trouble, and good out of evil, to all that love him, and are the called according to his purpose, Rom. 8. 28. It was David's practice, and he had the comfort of it; What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee. When he was at his wit's end, he was not at his faith's end.

7. And David said unto Abiathar the priest, Ahimelech's son, I pray thee, bring me hither the ephod. And Abiathar brought thither the ephod to David. 8. And David inquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop? shall I overtake them? And he answered him, Pursue: for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all. 9. So David went, he and the six hundred men that were with him, and came to the brook Besor, where those that were left behind stayed. 10. But David pursued, he and four hundred men: (for two hundred abode behind, which were so faint that they could not go over the brook Besor.) 11. And they found an Egyptian in the field, and brought him to David, and gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water: 12. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins: and when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him; for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, three days and three nights. 13. And David said unto him, To whom belongest thou? and whence art thou? And he said, I am a young man of Egypt, servant to an Amalekite; and my master left me, because three days ago I fell sick. 14. We made an invasion upon the south of the Cherethites, and upon the coast which belongeth to Judah, and upon the south of Caleb; and we burnt Ziklag with fire. 15. And David said to him, Canst thou bring me down to this company? And he said, Swear unto me by God, that thou wilt neither kill me, nor deliver me into the hands of my master, and I will bring thee down to this company. 16. And when he had brought him down, behold, they were spread abroad upon all the earth, eating, and drinking, and dancing, because of all the great spoil that they had taken out of the land of the Philistines, and out of the land of Judah. 17. And David smote them from the twilight even unto the evening of the next day; and there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men which rode upon camels, and fled. 18. And David recovered all that the Amalekites had carried away; and David rescued his two wives. 19. And there was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither sons nor daughters, neither spoil, nor any thing that they had taken to them: David recovered all. 20. And David took all the flocks and the herds, which they drove before those other cattle, and said, This is David's spoil.

Solomon observes, that the righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead; that the just falleth seven times a day, and riseth again; so it was with David. Many were his troubles, but the Lord delivered him out of them all; and particularly out of this which here we have an account of.

I. He inquired of the Lord both concerning his duty, Shall I pursue after this troop? and concerning the event, Shall I overtake them? v. 8. It was a great advantage to David, that he had the High Priest with him, and the breast-plate of judgment, which, as a public person, he might consult in all his affairs, Numb. 27. 21. We cannot think that he left Abiathar and the ephod at Ziklag, for then he and it would have been carried away by the Amalekites, unless we may suppose them hidden by a special providence, that they might be ready for David to consult at his return. If we conclude that David had his priest and ephod with him in the camp of the Philistines, it was certainly a great neglect in him, that he did not inquire of the Lord by them, concerning his engagement to Achish. Perhaps he was ashamed to own his religion so far from among the uncircumcised; but now he begins to apprehend that this trouble is brought upon him to correct him for that oversight; and therefore the first thing he does, is, to call for the ephod. It is well if we get this good by our afflictions, to be reminded by them of neglecting duties, and particularly to be quickened by them to inquire of the Lord. See 1 Chron. 15. 13. David had no room to doubt but that his war against these Amalekites was just, and he had an inclination strong enough to set upon them, when it was for the recovery of that which was dearest to him in this world; and yet he would not go about it without asking counsel of God, thereby owning his dependence upon God, and submission to him. If we thus, in all our ways, acknowledge God, we may expect that he will direct our steps, as he did David's here, answering him above what he asked, with an assurance that he should recover all.

II. He went himself in person, and took with him all the force he had, in pursuit of the Amalekites, v. 9, 10. See how quickly, how easily, how effectually, the mutiny among the soldiers was crushed by his patience and faith. When they spoke of slaying him, (v. 6.) if he had spoken of hanging them, or had ordered that the ringleaders of the faction should immediately have had their heads struck off, though it had been just, yet it might have been of pernicious consequence to his interest in this critical juncture; and while he and his men were contending, the Amalekites would have clearly carried off their spoil: but when he, as a deaf man, heard not, smothered his resentments, and encouraged himself in the Lord his God, the tumult of the people was stilled by his gentleness, and the power of God on their hearts; and, being thus mildly treated, they are now as ready to follow his foot, as they were but a little before to fly in his face. Meekness is the security of any government.

All his men were willing to go along with him in pursuit of the Amalekites, and he needed them all; but he was forced to drop a third part of them by the way; two hundred, out of six, were so fatigued with their long march, and so sunk under the load of their grief, that they could not pass the brook Besor, but staid behind there. This was, 1. A great trial of David's faith, whether he could go on, in a dependence upon the word of God, when so many of his men failed him. When we are disappointed and discouraged in our expectations from second causes, then go on with cheerfulness, confiding in the divine power, this is giving glory to God, by believing against hope, in hope. 2. A great instance of David's tenderness to his men, that he would by no means urge them beyond their strength, though the cause itself was so very urgent. The Son of David thus considers the frame of his followers, who are not all alike strong and vigorous in their spiritual pursuits and conflicts; but, where we are weak, there he is kind; nay more, there he is strong, 2 Cor. 12. 9, 10.

III. Providence threw one in their way, that gave them intelligence of the enemy's motions, and guided their's; a poor Egyptian lad, scarcely alive, is made instrumental of a great deal of good to David. God chooses the foolish things of the world, with them to confound the wise. Observe, 1. His master's cruelty to him. He had got out of him all the service he could, and when he fell sick, probably being over-toiled with his work, he barbarously left him to perish, in the field, when he was in no such haste but he might have put him into some of the carriages, and brought him home, or, at least, have left him wherewith to support himself. That master has the spirit of an Amalekite, not of an Israelite, that can thus use a servant worse than one would use a beast. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. This Amalekite thought he should now have servants enough of the Israelite captives, and therefore cared not what became of his Egyptian slave; but could willingly let him die in a ditch for want of necessaries, while he was eating and drinking, v. 16. Justly did Providence make this poor servant, that was thus basely abused, instrumental toward the destruction of a whole army of Amalekites, and his master among the rest; for God hears the cry of oppressed servants. 2. David's compassion to him; though he had reason to think he was one of those that had helped to destroy Ziklag, yet, finding him in distress, he generously relieved him, not only with bread and water, (v. 11.) but with figs and raisins, v. 12. Though the Israelites were in haste, and had no great plenty for themselves, yet they would not forbear to deliver one that was drawn unto death, nor say, Behold, we know it not, Prov. 24. 11, 12. They are unworthy the name of Israelites, who shut up the bowels of their compassion from persons in distress. It was also prudently done to relieve this Egyptian; for, though despicable, he was capable of doing them service; so it proved, though they were not certain of it when they relieved him. It is a good reason why we should neither do an injury, nor deny a kindness, to any man, that we know not but, some time or other, it may be in his power to return either a kindness or an injury. 3. The intelligence David received from this poor Egyptian, when he was come to himself. He gave him an account concerning his party; (1.) What they had done, (v. 14.) We made an invasion. The countries which David had pretended to Achish to have made an incursion upon, (ch. 27. 10.) they really had invaded and laid waste. What was then false, now proved too true. (2.) Whither they were gone, v. 15. This he promised David to inform him of, upon condition he would spare his life and protect him from his master, who, if he could hear of him again, (he thought,) would add cruelty to cruelty. Such an opinion this poor Egyptian had of the obligation of an oath, that he desired no greater security for his life than that, Swear unto me by God; not by the gods of Egypt or Amalek, but by the one supreme God.

IV. David, being directed to the place where they lay, securely celebrating their triumphs, fell upon them, and, as he used to pray, saw his desire upon his enemies.

1. The spoilers were cut off. The Amalekites, finding the booty was rich, and being got with it (as they thought) out of the reach of danger, were making themselves very merry with it, v. 16. All thoughts of war were laid aside, nor were they in any haste to house their prey, but spread themselves abroad on the earth in the most careless manner that could be, and there they were found eating and drinking, and dancing, probably in honour of their idol-gods, to whom they gave the praise of their success. In this posture, David surprised them, which made the conquest of them, and the blow he gave them, the more easy to him, and the more dismal to them. Then are sinners nearest to ruin, when they cry, Peace and safety, and put the evil day far from them. Nor does any thing give our spiritual enemies more advantage against us than sensuality, and the indulgence of the flesh. Eating and drinking, and dancing, have been the soft and pleasant way in which many have gone down to the congregation of the dead. Finding them thus off their guard, and from their arms, (many of them, it may be, drunk, and unable to make any resistance,) he put them all to the sword, and only four hundred escaped, v. 17. Thus is the triumphing of the wicked short, and wrath comes on them, as on Belshazzar, when they are in the midst of their jollity.

2. The spoil was recovered and brought off, and nothing was lost, but a great deal gotten. (1.) They retrieved all their own; (v. 18, 19.) David rescued his two wives; that is mentioned particularly, because that pleased David more than all the rest of his achievements. Providence had so ordered it, that the Amalekites carefully preserved all that they had taken, concluding that they kept it for themselves, though really they preserved it for the right owners; so that there was nothing lacking to them; so it proved, when they concluded all was gone; so much better is God oftentimes to us, than our own fears. Our Lord Jesus was indeed the son of David, and the son of Abraham, in this resembling them both, that he took the prey from the mighty, and led captivity captive: Abraham, Gen. 14. 16. and David here. But this was not all. (2.) They took all that belonged to the Amalekites besides, v. 20, flocks and herds; either such as were taken from the Philistines, and others which David had the disposal of by the law of war; or perhaps he made a sally into the enemy's country and fetched off these flocks and herds from thence, as interest for his own. This drove was put in the van of the triumph, with this proclamation, "This is David's spoil." This we may thank him for. Those who lately spake of stoning him, now carressed him, and cried him up, because they got by him more than they had then lost. Thus are the world, and its sentiments, governed by interest.

21. And David came to the two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom they had made also to abide at the brook Besor: and they went forth to meet David, and to meet the people that were with him: and when David came near to the people, he saluted them. 22. Then answered all the wicked men, and men of Belial, of those that went with David, and said, Because they went not with us, we will not give them ought of the spoil that we have recovered, save to every man his wife and his children, that they may lead them away, and depart. 23. Then said David, Ye shall not do so, my brethren, with that which the Lord hath given us, who hath preserved us, and delivered the company that came against us into our hand. 24. For who will hearken unto you in this matter? but as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike. 25. And it was so, from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day. 26. And when David came to Ziklag, he sent of the spoil unto the elders of Judah, even to his friends, saying, Behold a present for you of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord. 27. To them which were in Beth-el, and to them which were in south Ramoth, and to them which were in Jattir. 28. And to them which were in Aroer, and to them which were in Siphmoth, and to them which were in Eshtemoa. 29. And to them which were in Rachal, and to them which were in the cities of the Jerahmeelites, and to them which were in the cities of the Kenites. 30. And to them which were in Hormah, and to them which were in Cor-ashan, and to them which were in Athach. 31. And to them which were in Hebron, and to all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt.

We have here an account of the distribution of the spoil which was taken from the Amalekites. When the Amalekites had carried away a rich booty from the land of Judah and the Philistines, they spent it in sensuality, in eating and drinking, and making merry with it; but David disposed of the spoil taken, after another manner, as one that knew that justice and charity must govern us, in the use we make of whatever we have in this world. What God gives us, he designs we should do good with, not serve our lust with. In the distribution of the spoil,

1. David was just and kind to those who abode by the stuff. They came forth to meet the conquerors, and to congratulate them on their success, though they could not contribute to it; (v. 21.) for we should rejoice in a good work done, though Providence had laid us aside, and rendered us incapable of lending a hand to it. David received their address very kindly, and was so far from upbraiding them with their weakness, that he showed himself solicitous concerning them; he saluted them, he asked them of peace, so the word is; inquired how they did, because he had left them faint, and not well; or wished them peace, bid them be of good cheer, they should lose nothing by staying behind; for of this they seemed afraid; David perhaps saw it in their countenances.

2. There were those that opposed their coming in to share in the spoil; some of David's soldiers, probably the same that spake of stoning him, spake now of defrauding their brethren; they are called wicked men, and men of Belial, v. 22. Let not the best of men think it strange, if they have those attending them that are very bad, and they cannot prevail to make them better. We may suppose that David had instructed his soldiers, and prayewith them, and yet there were many among them that were wicked men, and men of Belial; often terrified with the apprehensions of death, and yet wicked men still, and men of Belial. These made a motion, that the two hundred men who abode by the stuff, should only have their wives and children given them, but none of their goods. Well might they be called wicked men; for this bespeaks them, (1.) Very covetous themselves, and greedy of gain; for hereby the more would fall to their share. A while ago, they would gladly have given half their own to recover the other half; yet now that they have all their own, they are not content unless they can have their brethren's too; so soon do men forget their low estate. All seek their own, and too often more than their own. (2.) Very barbarous to their brethren; for, to give them their wives and children, and not their estates, was to give them the mouths without the meat. What joy could they have of their families, if they had nothing to maintain them with? Was this to do as they would be done by? These are men of Belial indeed, who delight in putting hardships upon their brethren, and care not who is starved, so they may be fed to the full.

2. David would by no means admit this, but ordered that they who tarried behind, should come in for an equal share in the spoils with those that went to the battle, v. 23, 24. This he did, (1.) In gratitude to God. The spoil we have, is that which God has given us; we have it from him, and therefore must use it under his direction, as good stewards. Let this check us when we are tempted to misapply that which God has intrusted us with of this world's good; "Nay, I must not do so with that which God has given me, not serve Satan and a base lust, with those things which are not only the creatures of his power, but the gifts of his bounty. God has righted us by delivering the company that came against us into our hand, let not us then wrong our brethren; God has been kind to us in preserving us, and giving us victory, let not us be unkind to them. God's mercy to us should make us merciful to one another. (2.) Injustice to them. It is true, they tarried behind; but, [1.] It was not for want of good will to the cause, or to their brethren, but because they had not strength to keep up with them. It was not their fault, but their infelicity; and therefore they ought not to suffer for it. [2.] Though they tarried behind now, they had formerly engaged many times in battle, and done their part as well as the best of their brethren, and their former services must be considered, now that there was something to enjoy. [3.] Even now they did good service, for they abode by the stuff, to guard that which somebody must take care of, else that might have fallen into the hands of some other enemy. Every post of service is not alike a post of honour, yet those that are any way serviceable to the common interest, though in a meaner station, ought to share in the common advantages; as in the natural body, every member has its use, and therefore has its share of the nourishment. First, Thus David overruled the wicked men, and men of Belial, with reason, but with a great deal of mildness; (for the force of reason is sufficient, without the force of passion;) he calls them his brethren, v. 23. Superiors often lose their authority by haughtiness, but seldom by courtesy and condescension; Secondly, Thus he settled the matter for time to come, made it a statute of his kingdom, (a statute of distributions, primo Davidis—in the first year of David's reign,) an ordinance of war, (v. 25.) that as his part is that goes down to the battle, and jeopard his life in the high places of the field, so shall his be that guards the carriages. Abraham returned the spoils of Sodom to the right owners, and quitted his title to them, jure belli—derived from the laws of war. If we help others to recover their right, we must not think that this alienates the property and makes it ours. God appointed that the spoil of Midian should be divided between the soldiers and the whole congregation, Numb. 31. 27. The case here was somewhat different, but governed by the same general rule—that we are members one of another. The disciples, at first, had all things common, and we should still be ready to distribute, willing to communicate, 1 Tim. 6. 18. When kings of armies did flee apace, she that tarried at home did divide the spoil, Ps. 68. 12.

II. David was generous and kind to all his friends. When he had given every one his own with interest, there was a considerable overplus, which David, as general, had the disposal of: probably the spoil of the tents of the Amalekites consisted much in plate and jewels; (Judg. 8. 24, 26.) and those, because he thought they would but make his own soldiers proud and effeminate, he thought fit to make presents of to his friends, even the elders of Judah, v. 26. Several places are here named to which he sent of these presents, all of them in or near the tribe of Judah. The first place named is Beth-el, which signifies the house of God; that place shall be first served for its name's sake; or, perhaps, it means not the city so called, but the place where the ark was, which was therefore the house of God. Thither David sent the first and best, to them that attended there, for his sake who is the First and Best. Hibron is named last, (v. 31.) probably because thither he sent the residuum, which was the largest share, having an eye upon that place as fittest for his head-quarters, 2 Sam. 2. 1.

In David's sending these presents, observe, 1. His generosity. He aimed not to enrich himself, but to serve his country; and therefore God afterwards enriched him, and set him to rule the country he had served. It becomes gracious souls to be generous; there is that scatters and yet increases. 2. His gratitude. He sent presents to all the places where he and his men were wont to haunt; (v. 31.) that is, to all he had received kindness from, that had sheltered him, and sent him intelligence or provisions. Note, Honesty, as well as honour, obliges us to requite the favours that have been done us, or, at least, make a real acknowledgment of them as far as is in the power of our hand. 3. His piety; that he calls it a blessing; for no present we give to our friends will be a comfort to them, but as it is made so by the blessing of God: it intimates that his prayers for them accompanied his present; also, that he sent them out of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord, (so he calls them, not his enemies,) that they might rejoice in the victory, for the Lord's sake, and might join with him in thanksgivings for it. 4. His policy, that he sent these presents among his countrymen, to oblige them to be ready to appear for him, upon his accession to the throne, which he now saw at hand. A man's gift maketh room for him. He was fit to be a king, who thus showed the bounty and liberality of a king. Munificence recommends a man more than magnificence. The Ziphites had none of his presents, nor the men of Keilah; and thus he showed, that, though he was such a saint as not to revenge affronts, yet he was not such a fool as not to take notice of them.

CHAP. XXXI.

In the foregoing chapter, we had David conquering, yea, more than a conqueror. In this chapter, we have Saul conquered, and worse than a captive. Providence ordered it, that both these things should be doing just at the same time. The very same day, perhaps, that David was triumphing over the Amalekites, were the Philis-times triumphing over Saul. One is set against the other, that men may see what comes of trusting in God, and what comes of forsaking him. We left Saul ready to engage the Philistines, with a shaking hand and an aching heart, having had his doom read from hell, which he would not regard when it was read him from heaven. Let us now see what comes of him. Here is, I. His army routed, v. 1. II. His three sons slain, v. 2. III. Himself wounded, v. 3. Slain by his own hand, v. 4. His armour-bearer, (v. 5.) and all his men, v. 6. IV. His country possessed by the Philistines, v. 7. His camp plundered, and his dead body deserted, v. 8. His fall triumphed in, v. 9. His body publicly exposed, (v. 10.) and with difficulty rescued by the men of Jabesh-gilead, v. 11..13. Thus fell the man that was rejected of God.

1. NOW the Philistines fought against Israel: and the men of Israel fled from before the Philistines, and fell down slain in mount Gilboa. 2. And the Philistines followed hard upon Saul, and upon his sons; and the Philistines slew Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchi-shua, Saul's sons. 3. And the battle went sore against Saul, and the archers hit him; and he was sore wounded of the archers. 4. Then said Saul unto his armour-bearer, Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith, lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and abuse me. But his armour-bearer would not; for he was sore afraid: therefore Saul took a sword, and fell upon it. 5. And when his armour-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise upon his sword, and died with him. 6. So Saul died, and his three sons, and his armour-bearer, and all his men, that same day together. 7. And when the men of Israel that were on the other side of the valley, and they that were on the other side Jordan, saw that the men of Israel fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, they forsook the cities and fled; and the Philistines came and dwelt in them.

The day of recompense is now come, in which Saul must account for the blood of the Amalekites, which he had sinfully spared, and that of the priests, which he had more sinfully spilt; that of David too, which he would have spilt, must come into the account. Now his day is come to fall, as David foresaw, when he should descend into battle, and perish, ch. 26. 10. Come, and see the righteous judgments of God.

I. He sees his soldiers fall about him, v. 1. Whether the Philistines were more numerous, better posted, and better led on, or what other advantages they had, we are not told; but it seems they were more vigorous, for they made the onset, they fought against Israel, and the Israelites fled and fell. The best of the troops were put into disorder, and multitudes slain; probably, those whom Saul had employed in pursuing David. Thus they who had followed him, and served him in his sin, go before him in his fall, and share with him in his plagues.

II. He sees his sons fall before him. The victorious Philistines pressed most forcibly upon the king of Israel, and those about him; his three sons were next him, it is probable, and they were all three slain before his face, to his great grief, for they were the hopes of his family; and to his great terror, for they were now the guard of his person; and he can conclude no other, than that his own turn comes next. His sons are named, (v. 2.) and it grieves us to find Jonathan among them: that wise, valiant, good man, who was as much David's friend as Saul was his enemy; he falls with the rest. Duty to his father would not permit him to stay at home, or to retire when the armies engaged; and Providence so orders it, that he falls in the common fate of his family, though he never involved himself in the guilt of it; so that the observation of Eliphaz does not hold, (Job 4. 7.) Who ever perished, being innocent? For here was one. What shall we say to it? 1. God would hereby complete the vexation of Saul in his dying moments, and the judgment that was to be executed upon his house. If the family must fall, Jonathan, that is one of it, must fall with it. 2. He would hereby make David's way to the crown the more clear and open. For though Jonathan himself would have cheerfully resigned all his title and interest to him, (we have no reason to suspect any other,) yet it is very probable, that many of the people would have made use of his name for the support of the house of Saul, or, at least, would have come in but slowly to David. If Ish-bosheth (who was now left at home as one unfit for action, and so escaped) had so many friends, what would Jonathan have had, who had been the darling of the people, and had never forfeited their favour? They that were so anxious to have a king like the nations, would be zealous for the right line, especially if that threw the crown upon such a head as Jonathan's. This would have embarrassed David; and if Jonathan could have prevailed to bring in all his interest to David, then it would have been said that Jonathan had made him king, whereas God was to have all the glory. This is the Lord's doing. So that though the death of Jonathan would be a great affliction to David, yet, by making him mindful of his own frailty, as well as by facilitating his accession to the throne, it would be an advantage to him. 3. God would hereby show us, that the difference between good and bad is to be made in the other world, not in this. All things come alike to all. We cannot judge of the spiritual or eternal state of any, by the manner of their death; for in that there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked.

III. He himself is sorely wounded by the Philistines, and then slain by his own hand. The archers hit him, (v. 3.) so that he could neither fight nor fly, and therefore must inevitably fall into their hands. Thus, to make him the more miserable, destruction comes gradually upon him, and he dies so as to feel himself die. To that extremity was he now reduced, that, 1. He was desirous to die by the hand of his own servant, rather than by the hand of the Philistines, lest they should abuse him as they did Samson. Miserable man! He finds himself dying, and all his care is, to keep his body out of the hands of the Philistines, but no care to resign his soul into the hands of God who gave it, Ecc. 12. 7. As he lived, so he died, proud and jealous, and a terror to himself and all about him. They who rightly understand themselves, think it of small account, in comparison, how it is with them in death, so it may be well with them after death. Those are in a deplorable condition indeed, who, being bitter in soul, long for death, but it cometh not, (Job 3. 20, 21.) especially those, who, despairing of the mercy of God, like Judas, leap into hell before them, to escape a hell within them. 2. When he could not obtain that favour, he became his own executioner, thinking thereby to avoid shame, but running upon a heinous sin, and with it entailing upon his own name a mark of perpetual infamy, as felo de se—a self-murderer. Jonathan, who received his death-wound from the hand of the Philistines, and bravely yielded to the fate of war, died in the bed of honour; but Saul died as a fool dieth, as a coward dieth, a proud fool, a sneaking coward; he died as a man that had neither the fear of God, nor hope in God; neither the reason of a man, nor the religion of an Israelite, nor the resolution of a soldier. Let us all pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation, this temptation. His armour-bearer would not run him through, and he did well to refuse it; for no man's servant ought to be a slave to his master's lusts or passions of any kind: the reason given is, that he was sore afraid, not of death, for he himself ran witfully upon that immediately; but, having a profound reverence for the king his master, he could not conquer that so far as to do him any hurt; or perhaps he feared lest his trembling hand should have given him but half a blow, and so have put him to the greater misery.

IV. His armour-bearer, who refused to kill him, refused not to die with him, but fell likewise upon his sword, v. 5. This was an aggravating circumstance of the death of Saul, that, by the example of his wickedness, in murdering himself, he drew in his servant to be guilty of the same wickedness, and perished not alone in his iniquity. The Jews say that Saul's armour-bearer was Doeg, whom he preferred to that dignity for killing the priests, and if so, justly does his violent dealing return on his own head. David had foretold concerning him, that God would destroy him for ever, Ps. 52. 5.

V. The country was put into such confusion by the rout of Saul's army, that the inhabitants of the neighbouring cities (on that side Jordan, as it might be read) quitted them, and the Philistines, for a time, had possession of them, till things were settled in Israel, v. 7. Such a sad pass had Saul by his wickedness brought this country to, which might have remained in the hands of the uncircumcised, if David had not been raised up to repair the breaches of it. See what a king he proved, for whom they rejected God and Samuel. They still had done wickedly (it is to be feared) as well as he, and therefore were consumed, both they and their king, as the prophet had foretold concerning them, ch. 12. 25. And to this reference is had long after; (Hos. 13. 10, 11.) Where are thy saviours in all thy cities, of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes? I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath; that is, he was a plague to thee living and dying; thou couldest expect no other.

8. And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in mount Gilboa. 9. And they cut off his head, and stripped off his armour, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about, to publish it in the house of their idols, and among the people. 10. And they put his armour in the house of Ashtaroth; and they fastened his body to the wall of Beth-shan. 11. And when the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead heard of that which the Philistines had done to Saul, 12. All the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, from the wall of Beth-shan, and came to Jabesh, and burnt them there. 13. And they took their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days.

The scripture makes no mention of the souls of Saul and his sons, what became of them after they were dead; (secret things belong not to us;) but of their bodies only.

I. How they were basely abused by the Philistines. The day after the battle, when they had recovered their fatigue, they came to strip the slain, and, among the rest, found the bodies of Saul and his three sons, v. 8. Saul's armour-bearer perhaps intended to honour his master, by following the example of his self-murder, and to show thereby how well he loved him; but if he had consulted his reason more than his passions, he would have spared that foolish compliment, not only in justice to his own life, but in kindness to his master, to whom, by the opportunity of survivorship, he might have done all the service that could be done him by any man after he was dead: for he might, in the night, have conveyed away his body, and those of his sons, and buried them decently. But such false and foolish notions as these, vain men have, (though they would be wise,) of giving and receiving honour. Nay, it should seem, Saul might have saved himself the fatal thrust, and have made his escape; for the pursuers (in fear of whom he slew himself) came not to the place where he was, till the next day. But whom God will destroy, he infatuates, and utterly consumes with his terrors. See Job 18. 5, &c.

Finding Saul's body, (which, now that it lay extended on the bloody turf, was distinguishable from the rest by its length, as it was, while erect, by its height, when he proudly overlooked the surrounding crowd,) they will, in that, triumph over Israel's crown, and poorly gratify a barbarous and brutish revenge, by insulting the deserted corpse, which, when alive, they had stood in awe of.

1. They cut off his head. Had they designed in this to revenge the cutting off of Goliath's head, they should rather have cut off the head of David, who did that execution, when he was in their country; they intended it, in general, for a reproach to Israel, who promised themselves that a crowned, and an anointed head, would have saved them from the Philistines, and a particular reproach to Saul, who was taller by the head than other men, (which perhaps he was wont to boast of,) but was now shorter by the head.

2. They stripped him of his armour, (v. 9.) and sent that to be set up as a trophy of their victory in the house of Ashtaroth their goddess; (v. 10.) and we are told, 1 Chron. 10. 10. (though it is omitted here,) that they fastened his head in the temple of Dagon. Thus did they ascribe the honour of their victory, not, as they ought to have done, to the real justice of the true God, but to the imaginary power of their false gods; and by this respect paid to pretended deities, shame those who give not the praise of their achievements to the living God. Ashtaroth, the idol, that Israel had many a time gone a whoring after, now triumphs over them.

3. They sent expresses throughout their country, and ordered public notice to be given in the houses of their gods, of the victory they had obtained, (v. 9.) that public rejoicings might be made, and thanks given to their gods. This David regretted sorely; (2 Sam. 1. 20.) Tell it not in Gath.

4. They fastened his body, and the bodies of his sons, (as appears, v. 12.) to the wall of Beth-shan; a city that lay not far from Gilboa, and very near to the river Jordan. Hither the dead bodies were dragged, and here hung up in chains, to be devoured by the birds of prey. Saul slew himself, to avoid being abused by the Philistines, and never was royal corpse so abused as his was; perhaps the more, if they understood that he slew himself, and for what reason. He that thinks to save his honour by sin, will certainly lose it. See to what a height of insolence the Philistines were arrived, just before David was raised up, who perfectly subdued them. Now that they had slain Saul and his sons, they thought the land of Israel was their own for ever, but they soon found themselves deceived. When God has accomplished his whole work by them, he will accomplish it upon them. See Isa. 10. 6, 7.

II. How they were bravely rescued by the men of Jabesh-gilead. Little more than the river of Jordan lay between Beth-shan and Jabesh-gilead, and Jordan was in that place passable by its fords; a bold adventure was therefore made by the valiant men of that city, who, in the night, passed the river, took down the dead bodies, and gave them decent burial, v. 11-13. This they did, 1. Out of a common concern for the honour of Israel, or the land of Israel, which ought not to be defiled by the exposing of any dead bodies, and especially of the crown of Israel, which was thus profaned by the uncircumcised. 2. Out of a particular sense of gratitude to Saul, for his zeal and forwardness to rescue them from the Ammonites, when he first came to the throne, ch. 11. It is an argument of a gracious spirit, and an encouragement to beneficence, when the remembrance of kindness is thus retained, and they are thus returned, in an extremity. The men of Jabesh-gilead would have done Saul better service, if they had sent their valiant men to him sooner, to strengthen him against the Philistines. But his day was come to fall, and now this is all the service they can do him, in honour to his memory.

We find not that any general mourning was made for the death of Saul, as was for the death of Samuel, (ch. 25. 1.) only those Gileadites of Jabesh did him honour at his death; for, (1.) They made a burning for the bodies, to perfume them. So some understand the burning of them. They burnt spices over them, v. 12. And that it was usual thus to do honour to their deceased friends, at least, their princes, appears by the account of Asa's funeral, (2 Chron. 16. 14.) that they made a very great burning for him. Or, (as some think,) they burnt the flesh because it began to putrefy. (2.) They buried the bodies, when, by burning over them, they had sweetened them, (or, if they burnt them, they buried the bones and ashes,) under a tree, which served for a grave-stone and monument. And, lastly, they fasted seven days; that is, each day of the seven, they fasted till the evening; thus they lamented the death of Saul, and the present distracted state of Israel, and perhaps joined prayers with their fasting, for the re-establishment of their shattered state. Though when the wicked perish, there is shouting, that is, it is to be hoped a better state of things will ensue, which will be matter of joy, yet humanity obliges us to show a decent respect to dead bodies, especially those of princes. This book began with the birth of Samuel, but now it ends with the burial of Saul, the comparing of which two together will teach us to prefer the honour that comes from God, before any of the honours which this world pretends to have the disposal of.

E X P O S I T I O N,

WITH
UPON THE SECOND BOOK OF

---

This book is the history of the reign of king David. We had, in the foregoing Book, an account of his designation to the government, and his struggles with Saul, which ended at length in the death of his persecutor. This Book begins with his accession to the throne, and is entirely taken up with the affairs of the government during the forty years he reigned, and therefore is entitled, by the Seventy, The Third Book of the Kings. It gives us an account of David's triumphs and his troubles.

I. His triumphs over the house of Saul; (ch. 1-4.) over the Jebusites and Philistines; (ch. 5.) at the bringing up of the ark; (ch. 6 and 7.) over the neighbouring nations that opposed him, ch. 8-10. And so far the history is agreeable to what we might expect from David's character, and the choice made of him. But his cloud has a dark side.

II. We have his troubles, the cause of them, his sin in the matter of Uriah, (ch. 11 and 12.) The troubles themselves from the sin of Amnon, (ch. 13.) the rebellion of Absalom, (ch. 14-19.) and of Sheba, (ch. 20.) and the plague in Israel for his numbering the people, (ch. 24.) beside the famine for the Gibeonites, (ch. 21.) His song we have, (ch. 22.) and his words and worthies, ch. 23. Many things in this history are very instructive; but for the hero, that is the subject of it, though, in many instances, he appears here very great, and very good, and very much the favourite of Heaven, yet it must be confessed that his honour shines brighter in his Psalms than in his Annals.

II. SAMUEL, I.

CHAP. I.

In the close of the foregoing Book, (which with this is connected as a continuation of the same history,) we had Saul's exit; he went down slain to the pit, though he was the terror of the mighty in the land of the living. We are now to look toward the rising sun, and to inquire where David is, and what he is doing. In this chapter, we have, I. Tidings brought him to Ziklag of the death of Saul and Jonathan, by an Amalekite, who undertook to give him a particular narrative of it, v. 1-10. II. David's sorrowful reception of these tidings, v. 11, 12. III. Justice done upon the messenger, who boasted that he had helped Saul to despatch himself, v. 13-16. IV. An elegy which David penned upon this occasion, 17-27. And in all this, David's breast appears very happily free from the sparks, either of revenge or ambition, and he observes a very suitable demeanour.

I. NOW it came to pass, after the death of Saul, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites, and David had abode two days in Ziklag; 2. It came even to pass on the third day, that, behold, a man came out of the camp from

Saul, with his clothes rent, and earth upon his head: and so it was, when he came to David, that he fell to the earth, and did obeisance. 3. And David said unto him, From whence comest thou? And he said unto him, Out of the camp of Israel am I escaped. 4. And David said unto him, How went the matter? I pray thee, tell me. And he answered, That the people are fled from the battle, and many of the people also are fallen and dead; and Saul and Jonathan his son are dead also. 5. And David said unto the young man that told him, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan his son be dead? 6. And the young man that told him said, As I happened by chance upon mount Gilboa, behold, Saul leaned upon his spear; and, lo, the chariots and horsemen followed hard after him. 7

And when he looked behind him, he saw me, and called unto me: and I answered, Here am I. 8. And he said unto me, Who art thou? And I answered him, I am an Amalekite. 9. He said unto me again, Stand, I pray thee, upon me, and slay me; for anguish is come upon me, because my life is yet whole in me. 10. So I stood upon him, and slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen: and I took the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm, and have brought them hither unto my lord.

Here is,

I. David settling again in Ziklag his own city: after he had rescued his family and friends out of the hands of the Amalekites, (v. 1.) he abode in Ziklag. Thence he was now sending presents, to his friends, 1 Sam. 30. 26. and there he was ready to receive those that came into his interests; not men in distress and debt, as his first followers were, but persons of quality in their country, mighty men, men of war, and captains of thousands; (as we find, 1 Chron. 12. 1, 8, 20.) such came day by day to him, God stirred up their hearts to do so, till he had a great host, like the host of God, as it is said there, v. 22. The secret springs of revolutions are unaccountable, and must be resolved into that Providence, which turns all hearts as the rivers of water.

II. Intelligence brought him thither of the death of Saul. It was strange that he did not leave some spies about the camps, to bring him early notice of the issues of the engagement, a sign that he desired not Saul's woful day, nor was impatient to come to the throne, but willing to wait till those tidings were brought to him, which many a one would have sent more than half way to meet. He that believes, does not make haste, takes good news when it comes, and is not uneasy while it is in the coming.

1. The messenger presents himself to David as an express, in the posture of a mourner for the deceased prince, and a subject to the succeeding one. He came with his clothes rent, and made obeisance to David, (v. 2.) pleasing himself with the fancy that he had the honour to be the first that did him homage as his sovereign; but it proved he was the first that received from him sentence of death, as his judge. He told David he came from the camp of Israel, and intimated the confusion it was in, when he said he was escaped out of it, having much ado to get away with his life, v. 3.

2. He gives him a general account of the issue of the battle. David was very desirous to know how the matter went, as one that had more reasons than any to be concerned for the public; and he told him very distinctly that the army of Israel was routed, many slain, and, among the rest, Saul and Jonathan, v. 4. He names only Saul and Jonathan, because he knew David would be most solicitous to know their fate; for Saul was the man whom he most feared, and Jonathan the man whom he most loved.

3. He gives him a more particular account of the death of Saul. It is probable that David had heard, by the report of others, what the issue of the war was, for multitudes resorted to him, it should seem, in consequence; but he was desirous to know the certainty of the report concerning Saul and Jonathan, either because he was not forward to believe it, or because he would not proceed upon it, to make his own claims, till he was fully assured of He therefore asks, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan are dead? In answer to which, the young man tells him a very ready story, putting it past doubt that Saul was dead, for he himself had been not only an eye-witness of his death, but an instrument of it, and therefore David might rely upon his testimony. He says nothing, in his narrative, of the death of Jonathan, knowing how ungrateful that would be to David, but accounts only for Saul thinking (as David understood it well enough, ch. 4. 10.) that he should be welcome for that, and rewarded, as one that brought good tidings.

The account he gives of this matter is,

(1.) Very particular: that he happened to go to the place where Saul was, (v. 6.) as a passenger, not as a soldier, and therefore an indifferent person; that he found Saul endeavouring to run himself through with his own spear, none of his attendants being willing to do it for him; and, it seems, he could not do it dexterously for himself, his hand and heart failed him, the miserable man had not courage enough either to live or die; he therefore called this stranger to him, (v. 7.) inquired what countryman he was, for, provided he were not a Philistine he would gladly receive from his hand the coup de grace (as the French call it, concerning those that are broken on the wheel)—the merciful stroke, that might despatch him out of his pain. Understanding that he was an Amalekite, (neither one of his subjects, nor one of his enemies,) he begs this favour from him, (v. 9.) Stand upon me, and slay me. He is now sick of his dignity, and willing to be trampled upon; sick of his life, and willing to be slain. Who then would be inordinately fond of life or honour? The case may be such, even with those that have no hope in their death, that yet they may desire to die, and death flee from them, Rev. 9. 6. Anguish is come upon me; so we read it; as a complaint of the pain and terror his spirit was seized with. If his conscience now brought to mind the javelin he had cast at David, his pride, malice, and perfidiousness, and especially the murder of the priests, no marvel that anguish came upon him: moles (they say,) open their eyes when they are dying. Sense of unpardoned guilt will make death indeed the king of terrors. They that have baffled their convictions, will, perhaps, in their dying moments, be overpowered by them. The margin reads it as a complaint of the inconvenience of his clothes; that his coat of mail which he had for his defence, or his embroidered coat, which he had for ornament, hindered him, that he could not get the spear far enough into his body, or so straitened him, now that his body swelled with anguish, that he could not expire. Let no man's clothes be his pride, for it may so happen, that they may be his burthen and snare. "Hereupon," saith our young man, "I stood upon him, and slew him;" (v. 10.) at which word, perhaps, he observed David look upon him with some show of displeasure, and therefore he excuses it, in the next words; "for I was sure he could not live"; his life was whole in him indeed, but he would certainly have fallen into the hands of the Philistines, or given himself another thrust."

(2.) It is doubtful whether this story be true. If it was, the righteousness of God is to be observed, that Saul, who spared the Amalekites, in contempt of the divine command, received his death's wound from an Amalekite. But most interpreters think that it was false, and that, though he might happen to be present, yet he was not assisting in the death of Saul, but told David so, in expectation that he would have rewarded him for it, as having done him a piece of good service. They who rejoice at the fall of an enemy, are apt to measure others by themselves, and to think that they will do so too.

But a man after God's own heart, is not to be judged of by common men. I am not clear whether this young man's story were true or no; it may consist with the narrative in the chapter before, and be an addition to it, as Peter's account of the death of Judas, Acts 1. 18. is to the narrative, Matth. 27. 5. What is there called a sword, may here be called a spear; or when he fell upon his sword, he leaned on his spear.

(3.) However, he produced that which was proof sufficient of the death of Saul, the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm. It should seem, these Saul was so foolishly fond of, as to wear them in the field of battle, which made him a fair mark for the archers, by distinguishing him from those about him: but as pride (we say) feels no cold, so it fears no danger from that which gratifies it. These fell into the hands of this Amalekite. Saul spared the best of their spoil, and now the best of his came to one of that devoted nation. He brought them to David, as the rightful owner of them now that Saul was dead, not doubting but by his officiousness herein, to recommend himself to the best preferments in his court or camp. The tradition of the Jews, is, that this Amalekite was the son of Doeg, (for the Amalekites were descendants from Edom,) and that Doeg, who, they suppose, was Saul's armour-bearer before he slew himself, gave Saul's crown and bracelet (the ensigns of his royalty) to his son, and bade him carry them to David, to curry favour with him. But this is a groundless conceit; Doeg's son, it is likely, was so well known to Saul, that he needed not ask him as he did, (v. 8.) Who art thou? David had been long waiting for the crown, and now it is brought him by an Amalekite. See how God can serve his own purpose of kindness to his people, even by designing (ill-designing) men, who aim at nothing but to set up themselves.

11. Then David took hold on his clothes, and rent them; and likewise all the men that were with him: 12. And they mourned, and wept, and fasted until even, for Saul, and for Jonathan his son, and for the people of the LORD, and for the house of Israel; because they were fallen by the sword. 13. And David said unto the young man that told him, Whence art thou? And he answered, I am the son of a stranger, an Amalekite. 14. And David said unto him, How wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thine hand to destroy the LORD's anointed? 15. And David called one of the young men, and said, Go near, and fall upon him. And he smote him that he died. 16. And David said unto him, Thy blood be upon thy head; for thy mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slain the LORD's anointed.

Here is,

I. David's reception of these tidings. So far was he from falling into a transport of joy, as the Amalekite expected, that he falls into a passion of weeping, rent his clothes, (v. 11.) mourned and fasted, (v. 12.) not only for his people Israel, and Jonathan his friend, but for Saul his enemy. This he did, not only as a man of honour, in observance of that decorum which forbids us to insult over those that are fallen, and requires us to attend our relations to the grave with respect, whatever we lost by their life, or got by their death; but as a good man and a man of conscience, that had forgiven the injuries Saul had done him, and bore him no malice. He knew before his son wrote it, (Prov. 24. 17, 18.) that if we rejoice when our enemy falls the Lord sees it, and it displeases him; and, that he who is glad at calamities, shall not go unpunished, Prov. 17. 5. By this it appears, that those passages in David's psalms, which express his desire of, and triumph in, the ruin of his enemies, proceed not from a spirit of revenge, or any irregular passion, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and the public good; for by what he did here, when he heard of Saul's death, we may perceive that his natural temper was very tender, and that he was kindly affected even to those that hated him. He was very sincere, no question, in his mourning for Saul, and it was not pretended, or a copy of his countenance only. His passion was so strong, on this occasion, that it moved those about him; all that were with him, at least, in complaisance to him, rent their clothes, and they fasted till even, in token of their sorrow; and, probably, it was a religious fast, they humbled themselves under the hand of God, and prayed for the repairing of the breaches made upon Israel by this defeat.

II. The reward he gave to him that brought him the tidings; instead of preferring him, he put him to death; judged him, out of his own mouth, as a murderer of his prince, and ordered him forthwith to be executed for the same. What a surprise was this to the messenger, who thought he should have favour shown him for his pains! In vain did he plead that he had Saul's order for it, that it was a real kindness to him, that he must inevitably have died; all those pleas are overruled, "Thy mouth has testified against thee, saying, I have slain the LORD's anointed;" (v. 16.) therefore thou must die."

Now, 1. David herein did not do unjustly. For, (1.) The man was an Amalekite. This, lest he had mistaken it in his narrative, he made him own a second time, v. 13. That nation, and all that belonged to it, were doomed to destruction; so that, in slaying him, David did what his predecessor should have done, and was rejected for not doing. (2.) He did himself confess the crime, so that the evidence was, by the consent of all laws, sufficient to convict him; for every man is presumed to make the best of himself. If he did as he said, he deserved to die for treason, (v. 14.) doing that which, it is probable, he heard Saul's own armour-bearer refuse to do; if not, yet by boasting that he had done it, he plainly showed, that if there had been occasion, he would have done it, and would have made nothing of it; and by boasting of it to David, he showed what opinion he had of him, that he would rejoice in it, as one altogether like himself, which was an intolerable affront to him, who had himself once and again refused to stretch forth his hand against the LORD's anointed. And his lying to David, if indeed it were a lie, was highly criminal, and proved, as sooner or later that sin will prove, lying against his own head.

2. He did honourably and well. Hereby he demonstrated the sincerity of his grief; discouraged all others from thinking, by doing the like, to ingratiate themselves with him; and did that which might, probably, oblige the house of Saul, and win upon them, and recommend him to the people, as one that was zealous for public justice, without regard to his own private interest. We may learn from it, that to give assistance to any in murdering themselves, directly or indirectly, if done wittingly, incurs the guilt of blood; and that the lives of princes ought to be, in a special manner, precious to us.

17. And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul and over Jonathan his son: 18. (Also he bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow: behold, it is written in the book of Jasher :) 19. The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places: how are the mighty fallen! 20. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. 21. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings: for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul, as though he had not been anointed with oil. 22. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. 23. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided: they were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions. 24. Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet, with other delights; who put on ornaments of gold upon your apparel. 25. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places. 26. I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan: very pleasant hast thou been unto me: thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women. 27. How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!

When David had rent his clothes, mourned and wept, and fasted, for the death of Saul, and done justice upon him who made himself guilty of it, one would think he had made full payment of the debt of honour he owed to his memory; yet this is not all: we have here a poem he wrote on the occasion; for he was a great master of his pen as well as sword. By this elegy he designed both to express his own sorrow for this great calamity, and to impress the like on the minds of others, who ought to lay it to heart. The putting of lamentations into poems, made them, 1. The more moving and affecting. The passion of the poet, or singer, is, by this way, wonderfully communicated to the readers and hearers. 2. The more lasting. Thus they were made, not only to spread far, but to continue long; from generation to generation. Those might gain information by poems, that would not read history.

Here we have,

I. The orders David gave with this elegy; (v. 18.) He bade them teach the children of Judah (his own tribe, whatever others did) the use of the bow; either, 1. The bow used in war. Not but that the children of Judah knew how to use the bow; (it was so commonly used in war, long before this, that the sword and bow were put for all weapons of war, Gen. 48. 22.) but, perhaps, they had of late made more use of slings, as David, in killing Goliath, because cheaper; which David would have them now to see the inconvenience of, (for they were the archers of the Philistines that bore so hard upon Saul, 1 Sam. 31. 3.) and to return more generally to the use of the bow, to exercise themselves in this weapon, that they might be in a capacity to avenge the death of their prince upon the Philistines, and to outdo them at their own weapon. It was pity but those that had such good heads and hearts, as the children of Judah, should not be well armed. David hereby showed his authority over, and concern for, the armies of Israel, and set himself to rectify the errors of the former reign. But we find that the companies which were now come to David to Ziklag, were armed with bows; (1 Chron. 12. 2.) therefore, 2. Some understand it, either of some musical instrument called a bow, to which he would have the mournful ditties sung, or, of the elegy itself; he bade them teach the children of Judah, Kesheth, the bow, that is, this song, which was so entitled, for the sake of Jonathan's bow, the achievements of which are here celebrated. Moses commanded Israel to learn his song, (Deut. 31. 19.) so David his. Probably, he bade the Levites teach them. It is written in the book of Jasher, there it was kept upon record, and from thence transcribed into this history. That book was, probably, a collection of state poems; what is said to be written in that book, (Josh. 10. 13.) is also poetical, a fragment of an historical poem. Even songs would be forgotten and lost, if they were not committed to writing, that best conservatory of knowledge.

II. The elegy itself. It is not a divine hymn, nor given by inspiration of God, to be used in divine service; nor is there any mention of God in it; but is a human composition, and therefore was inserted, not in the book of Psalms, which, being of divine original, is preserved; but in the book of Jasher, which, being only a collection of common poems, is long since lost.

This elegy bespeaks David to be,

1. A man of an excellent spirit, in four things.

(1.) He was very generous to Saul, his sworn enemy. Saul was his father-in-law, his sovereign, and the anointed of the Lord; and therefore, though he had done him a great deal of wrong, he does not wreak his revenge upon his memory when he is in his grave; but, like a good man, and a man of honour, [1.] He conceals his faults: and though there was no preventing of their appearance in his history, yet they should not appear in this elegy. Charity teaches us to make the best we can of every body; and those we can say no good of, to say nothing of, especially when they are gone. De mortuis nil nisi bonum—Speak evil of no one. We ought to deny ourselves the satisfaction of making personal reflections upon those who have been injurious to us, much more drawing their character from thence, as if every man must of necessity be a bad man, that has done ill by us. Let the corrupt part of the memory be buried with the corrupt part of the man, earth to earth, ashes to ashes; let the blemish be hidden, and a veil drawn over the deformity. [2.] He celebrates that which was praise-worthy in him. He does not commend him for that which he was not; says nothing of his piety, or fidelity; those funeral commendations, which are gathered out of the spoils of truth, are not at all to the praise of those on whom they are bestowed, but very much the dispraise of those who unjustly misplace them. But he has this to say, in honour of Saul himself, First, That he was anointed with oil, (v. 21.) the sacred oil, which signified his elevation to, and qualification for, the government. Whatever he was otherwise, the crown of the anointing oil of his God was upon him, as is said of the High Priest, (Lev. 21. 12.) and, on that account, he was to be honoured, because God, the Fountain of honour, had honoured him. Secondly, That he was a man of war, a mighty man; (v. 19.-21.) that he had often been victorious over the enemies of Israel, and reared them whithersoever he turned; (1 Sam. 14. 47.) his sword returned not empty, but satiated with blood and spoil, v. 22. His disgrace and fall, at last, must not make his former successes and services to be forgotten. Though his sun set under a cloud, time was, when it shone bright. Thirdly, That, take him with Jonathan, he was a man of a very agreeable temper, that recommended himself to the affections of his subjects; (v. 23.) Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant. Jonathan was always so, and Saul was so as long as he concurred with him. Take them together, and in the pursuit of the enemy, never were men more bold, more brave, swifter than eagles, and stronger than lions. Observe, They that were most fierce and fiery in the camp, were no less sweet and lovely in the court; as amiable to the subject, as they were formidable to the foe: a rare composition of softness and sharpness they had, which makes many a man's temper very happy. It may be understood of the harmony and affection, that, for the most part, subsisted between Saul and Jonathan; they were lovely and pleasant one to another. Jonathan a dutiful son, Saul an affectionate father, and therefore dear to each other in their lives, and in their death they were not divided, but kept close together in the stand they made against the Philistines, and fell together in the same cause. Fourthly, That he had enriched his country with the spoils of conquered nations, and introduced a more splendid attire. When they had a king like the nations, they must have clothes like the nations; and herein he was, in a particular manner, obliging to his female subjects, v. 24. The daughters of Israel be clothed in scarlet, which was their delight.

(2) He was very grateful to Jonathan his sworn friend. Beside the tears he sheds over him, and the encomiums he gives of him in common with Saul, he mentions him with some marks of distinction: (v. 25.) O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places! which, compared with v. 19. intimates that he meant him by the beauty of Israel, which, he there says, was slain upon the high places. He laments Jonathan as his particular friend; (v. 26.) My brother Jonathan; not so much of what he would have been to him if he had lived, very serviceable, no doubt, in his advancement to the throne, and instrumental to prevent those long struggles, which, for want of his assistance, he had with the house of Saul; (had this been the only ground of his grief, it had been selfish;) but he lamented him for what he had been; "Very pleasant hast thou been unto me; but that pleasantness is now over, and I am distressed for thee." He had reason to say, that Jonathan's love to him was wonderful; sure never was the like, for a man to love one who he knew was to take the crown over his head; and to be so faithful to his rival: this far surpassed the highest degree of conjugal affection and constancy. See here, [1.] That nothing is more delightful in this world than a true friend, that is wise and good, that kindly receives and returns our affection, and is faithful to us in all our true interests. [2.] That nothing is more distressful than the loss of such a friend; it is parting with a piece of one's self. It is the vanity of this world, that what is most pleasant to us, we are most liable to be distressed in. The more we love, the more we grieve.

(3.) He was deeply concerned for the honour of God; for that is it which he has an eye to, when he fears lest the daughters of the uncircumcised, that are out of covenant with God, triumph over Israel, and the God of Israel, v. 20. Good men are touched in a very sensible part by the reproaches of them that reproach God.

(4.) He was deeply concerned for the public welfare. It was the beauty of Israel that was slain, (v. 19.) and the honour of the public that was disgraced; the mighty are fallen, that is three times lamented, (v. 19, 25, 27.) and so the strength of the people is weakened. Public losses are most laid to heart by men of public spirits. David hoped God would make him instrumental to repair their losses, and yet laments them.

2. David here shows himself to be a man of a fine imagination, as well as a wise and holy man. The expressions are all excellent, and calculated to work upon the passions. (1.) The embargo he would fain lay upon Fame, is elegant, (v. 20.) Tell it not in Gath. It grieved him to the heart, to think that it would be proclaimed in the cities of the Philistines, and that they would insult over Israel upon it, and the more, in remembrance of the triumphs of Israel over them formerly, when they sung, Saul has slain his thousands; that would now be retorted. (2.) The curse he entails on the mountains of Gilboa, the theatre on which this tragedy was acted, Let there be no dew upon you, nor fields of offerings, v. 21. This is a petulant strain, like that of Job, Let the day perish wherein I was born. Not as if David wished that any part of the land of Israel might be barren, but, to express his sorrow for the thing, he speaks with a seeming indignation at the place. Observe, [1.] How the fruitfulness of the earth depends upon heaven. The worst thing he could wish to the mountains of Gilboa, was barrenness, and unprofitableness to man; these are miserable, that are useless; it was the curse Christ pronounced on the fig-tree, Never fruit grow on thee more; and that took effect, the fig-tree withered away; this, on the mountains of Gilboa, did not; but when he wished them barren, he wished there might be no rain upon them: and if the heavens be brass, the earth will soon be iron. [2.] How the fruitfulness of the earth must therefore be devoted to heaven: which is intimated in his calling the fruitful fields, fields of offerings. Those fruits of their land that were offered to God, were the crown and glory of it: and therefore the failure of the offerings is the saddest consequence of the failure of the corn. See Joel 1. 9. To want that wherewith we should honour God, is worse than to want that wherewith we should sustain ourselves. This is the reproach David fastens upon the mountains of Gilboa, which, having been stained with royal blood, thereby forfeited celestial dews. In this elegy, Saul had a more honourable interment, than that which the men of Jabesh-gilead gave him.

CHAP. II.

David had paid due respect to the memory of Saul his prince, and Jonathan his friend, and what he did, was as much his praise as theirs; he is now considering what is to be done next. Saul is dead, now therefore David arises. 1. By direction from God, he went up to Hebron, and was there anointed king, v. 1. 4. II. He returned thanks to the men of Jabesh-gilead for burying Saul, v. 5. 7. III. Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul, is set up in opposition to him, v. 8. 11. IV. A warm encounter happens between David's party, and Ish-bosheth's, in which, 1. Twelve of each side engaged hand to hand, and were all slain, v. 12. 16. 2. Saul's party was beaten, v. 17. 3. Asahel, on David's side, was slain by Abner, v. 18. 23. 4. Joab, at Abner's request, sounds a retreat, v. 24. 28. 5. Abner makes the best of his way; (v. 29.) and the loss on both sides is computed, v. 30. 32. So that here we have an account of a civil war in Israel, which in process of time, ended in the complete settlement of David on the throne.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that David inquired of the LORD, saying, Shall I go up into any of the cities of Judah? And the LORD said unto him, Go up. And David said, Whither shall I go up? And he said, Unto Hebron. 2. So David went up thither, and his two wives also, Alunoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail, Nabal's wife, the Carmelite. 3. And his men that were with him did David bring up, every man with his household: and they dwelt in the cities of Hebron. 4. And the men of Judah came, and there they anointed David king over the house of Judah. And they told David, saying, That the men of Jabesh-gilead were they that buried Saul. 5. And David sent messengers unto the men of Jabesh-gilead, and said unto them, Blessed be ye of the LORD, that ye have showed this kindness unto your lord, even unto Saul, and have buried him. 6. And now the LORD show kindness and truth unto you: and I also will requite you this kindness, because ye have done this thing. 7. Therefore now let your hands be strengthened, and be ye valiant: for your master Saul is dead, and also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them.

When Saul and Jonathan were dead, though David knew himself anointed to be king, and now saw his way very clear, yet he did not immediately send messengers through all the coasts of Israel, to summon all people to come in and swear allegiance to him, upon pain of death, but proceeded leisurely; for he that believeth, doth not make haste, but waits God's time for the accomplishment of God's promises. Many were come in to his assistance from several tribes, while he continued at Ziklag, (as we find, 1 Chron. 12. 1-22,) and by such a force he might have come in by conquest; but he that will rule with meekness, will not rise with violence. Observe here,

I. The direction he sought and had from God, in this critical juncture, v. 1. He doubted not of success, yet he uses proper means, both divine and human. Assurance of hope in God's promise, will be so far from slackening, that it will quicken pious endeavours. If I be elected to the crown of life, it does not follow, Then I will do nothing; but, Then I will do all that he directs me, and follow his conduct who chose me: this good use David made of his election, and so will all whom God has chosen. 1. David, according to the precept, acknowledged God in his way. He inquired of the Lord, by the breast-plate of judgment, which Abiathar brought him. We must apply ourselves to God, not only when we are in distress, but even then when the world smiles upon us, and second causes work in favour of us. His inquiry was, "Shall I go up to any of the cities of Judah? Shall I stir hence?" Though Ziklag be in ruins, he will not quit it without direction from God: "If I stir hence, shall I go to one of the cities of Judah?" Not limiting God to them; if God should so direct him, he would go to any of the cities of Israel. But it bespeaks his prudence, in the cities of Judah he would find most friends; and his modesty, he would look no further at present than his own tribe. In all our motions and removes, it is comfortable to see God going before us; and we may, if by faith and prayer we set him before us. 2. God, according to the promise, directed his path, bade him go up, told him whither, unto Hebron, a priest's city, one of the cities of refuge; so it was to David, and an intimation that God himself would be to him a little Sanctuary. The sepulchres of the patriarchs, adjoining to Hebron, would remind him of the ancient promise, on which God had caused him to hope. God sent him, not to Beth-lehem his own city, because that was little among the thousands of Judah; (Mic. 5. 2.) but to Hebron, a more considerable place, and which, perhaps, was then as the country town of that tribe.

II. The care he took of his family and friends in his remove to Hebron. 1. He took his wives with him, (v. 2.) that, as they had been companions with him in tribulation, they might be so in the kingdom. It does not appear that as yet he had any children; his first-born was in Hebron, ch. 3. 2. He took his friends and followers with him; (v. 3.) they had accompanied him in his wanderings, and therefore, when he gained a settlement, they settled with him. Thus if we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with him, 2 Tim. 2. 12. Nay, Christ does more for his good soldiers, than David could do for his; he found lodging for them, They dwell in the cities of Hebron, the adjacent towns; but to those who continue with Christ in his temptations, he appoints a kingdom, and will feast them at his own table, Luke 22. 29, 30.

III. The honour done him by the men of Judah; they anointed him king over the house of Judah, v. 4. The tribe of Judah had often stood by itself, more than any other of the tribes; in Saul's time it was numbered by itself as a distinct body, (1 Sam. 15. 4.) and had been used to act separately; they did so now; yet they did it for themselves only; they did not pretend to anoint him king over all Israel, (as Judg. 9. 22.) but only over the house of Judah; the rest of the tribes might do as they pleased, but as for them and their house, they would be ruled by him whom God had chosen. See how David rose gradually; he was first anointed king in reversion, then, in possession, of one tribe only, and, at last, of all the tribes, thus the kingdom of the Messiah, the son of David, is set up by degrees; he is Lord of all, by divine designation, but we see not yet all things put under him, Heb. 2. 8. David's reigning at first over the house of Judah only, was a tacit intimation of Providence, that his kingdom would in a short time be reduced to that again, as it was when the ten tribes revolted from his grandson, and it would be an encouragement to the godly kings of Judah, that David himself, at first, reigned over Judah only.

IV. The respectful message he sent to the men of Jabesh-gilead, to return them thanks for their kindness to Saul. Still he studies to honour the memory of his predecessor, and thereby to show, that he was far from aiming at the crown from any principle of ambition, or enmity to Saul, but purely because he was called of God to it. It was told him, that the men of Jabesh-gilead buried Saul, perhaps, by some that thought he would have been displeased at them as over-officious. But he was far from that; 1. He commended them for it, v. 5. According as our obligations were to love and honour any while they lived, we ought to show respect to their remains, that is, their bodies, names, and families, when they are dead; "Saul was your lord," says David, "and therefore you did well to show him this kindness, and do him this honour." 2. He prays to God to bless them for it, and to recompense it to them. Blessed be ye, and blessed may ye be of the Lord, who will deal kindly with those in a particular manner, that deal kindly with the dead, as it is in Ruth 1. 8. Due respect and affection showed to the bodies, names, and families, of those that are dead, in conscience toward God, is a piece of charity, which shall in no wise lose its reward, The Lord show kindness and truth to you! (v. 6.) that is, kindness according to the promise: what kindness God shows, is, in truth, what one may trust to. 3. He promises to make them amends for it, I also will requite you. He does not turn them over to God for recompense, that he might excuse himself from rewarding them; good wishes are good things, and instances of gratitude, but they are too cheap to be rested in where there is an ability to do more. 4. He prudently takes this opportunity to gain them to his interest, v. 7. They had paid their last respects to Saul, and he would have them to be the last; "The house of Judah have anointed me king, and it will be your wisdom to concur with them, and in that to be valiant." We must not so dote on the dead, how much soever we have valued them, as to neglect or despoise the blessings we have in those that survive, whom God has raised up to us in their stead.

8. But Abner the son of Ner, captain of Saul's host, took Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and brought him over to Mahanaim: 9. And he made him king over Gilead, and over the Ashurites, and over Jezreel, and over Ephraim, and over Benjamin, and over all Israel. 10. Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, was forty years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years. But the house of Judah followed David. 11. And the time that David was king in Hebron, over the house of Judah, was seven years and six months. 12. And Abner the son of Ner, and the servants of Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, went out from Mahanaim to Gibeon. 13. And Joab the son of Zeruiah, and the servants of David, went out, and met together by the pool of Gibeon: and they sat down, the one on the one side of the pool, and the other on the other side of the pool. 14. And Abner said to Joab, Let the young men now arise, and play before us. And Joab said, Let them arise. 15. Then there arose, and went over by number, twelve of Benjamin, which pertained to Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and twelve of the servants of David. 16. And they caught every one his fellow by the head, and thrust his sword into his fellow's side; so they fell down together: wherefore that place was called Helkath-hazzurim, which is in Gibeon. 17. And there was a very sore battle that day: and Abner was beaten, and the men of Israel, before the servants of David.

Here is,

I. A rivalry between two kings; David, whom God made king, and Ish-bosheth, whom Abner made king. One would have thought, when Saul was slain, and all his sons that had sense and spirit enough to take the field with him, David should have come to the throne without any opposition, since all Israel knew not only how he had signalized himself, but how manifestly God had designated him to it; but such a spirit of contradiction is there, in the devices of men, to the counsels of God, that such a weak and silly thing as Ish-bosheth, who was not thought fit to go with his father to the battle, shall yet be thought fit to succeed him in the government, rather than David shall come peaceably to it. Herein David's kingdom was typical of the Messiah's, against which the heathens rage, and the rulers take counsel, Ps. 2. 1, 2. 1. Abner was the person who set up Ish-bosheth in competition with David; perhaps, in his zeal for the lineal succession; since they must have a king like the nations, in this they must be like them, that the crown must descend from father to son. Or rather, in his affection to his own family and relations, (for he was Saul's uncle,) and because he had no other way to secure to himself the post of honour he was in, as captain of the host. See how much mischief the pride and ambition of one man may be the occasion of. Ish-bosheth would never have set up himself, if Abner had not set him up, and made a tool of him to serve his own purposes. 2. Mahanaim was the place where he first made his claim. On the other side Jordan, where it was thought David had the least interest, and being at a distance from his forces, they might have time to strengthen themselves. But, having set up his standard there, the unthinking people of all the tribes of Israel, that is, the generality of them submitted to him, (v. 9.) and Judah only was entire for David. This was a further trial of the faith of David in the promise of God, and of his patience, whether he could wait God's time for the performance of that promise. 3. Some difficulty there is about the time of the continuance of this competition. David reigned over Judah only, about seven years; (v. 11.) and yet (v. 10.) Ish-bosheth reigned over Israel but two years: either before these two years, or after, or both, it was in general for the house of Saul, (ch. 3. 6.) and not any particular person of that house, that Abner declared. Or, these two years he reigned, before the war broke out, (v. 12.) which continued long, even the remaining five years, ch. 3. 1.

II. A rencounter between their two armies. It does not appear that either side brought their whole force into the field, for the slaughter was but small, v. 30, 31. We may wonder, 1. That the men of Judah did not appear and act more vigorously for David, to reduce all the nation into obedience to him; but, it is likely, David would not suffer them to act offensively, choosing rather to wait till the thing would do itself, or rather till God would do it for him, without the effusion of Israelitish blood, for to him, as a type of Christ, that was very precious, Ps. 72. 14. Even those that were his adversaries he looked upon as his subjects, and would treat them accordingly. 2. That the men of Israel could in a manner stand neuter, and sit down tamely under Ish-bosheth, for so many years, especially considering what characters many of the tribes displayed at this time, as we find, 1 Chron. 12. 23, &c. Wise men, mighty men, men of valour, expert in war, and not of double heart, and yet for seven years together, for aught that appears, most of them seemed indifferent in whose hand the public administration was. Divine Providence serves its own purposes, by the stupidity of men at some times, and the activity of the same persons at other times; they are unlike themselves, and yet the motions of Providence uniform.

(1.) In this battle Abner was the aggressor. David sat still to see how the matter would fall; but the house of Saul, and Abner at the head of it, gave the challenge, and they went by the worst. Therefore go not forth hastily to strive, nor be forward to begin quarrels, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, Prov. 25. 8. A fool's lips and hands enter into contention.

(2.) The seat of the war was Gibeon; Abner chose it, because it was in the lot of Benjamin, where Saul had the most friends; yet, since he offerred battle, Joab, David's general, would not decline it, but there joined issue with him, and met him by the pool of Gibeon, v. 13. David's cause, being built upon God's promise, feared not the disadvantages of the ground; the pool between them gave both sides time to deliberate.

(3.) The engagement was first proposed by Abner, and accepted by Joab, to be between twelve and twelve of a side. [1.] It should seem this trial of skill began in sport. Abner made the motion, (v. 14.) Let the young men arise, and play before us, as gladiators; perhaps, Saul had used his men to these barbarous pastimes, like a tyrant indeed, and Abner had learnt it of him, to make a jest of wounds and death, and divert himself with the scenes of blood and horror. He meant, "Let them fight before us," when he said, "Let them play before us;" fools thus make a mock at sin. But he is unworthy the name of a man, that can be thus prodigal of human blood, that can thus throw about fire-brands, arrows, and death, and say, Am not I in sport? Prov. 26. 18, 19. Joab, having been bred up under David, had so much wisdom as not to make such a proposal, yet had not resolution enough to resist and gainsay it when another made it. For he stood upon a point of honour, and thought it a blemish to his reputation to refuse a challenge; and therefore said, Let them arise; not that he was fond of the sport, or expected that the duels would be decisive, but he would not be hectored by his antagonist. How many precious lives have thus been sacrificed to the caprice of proud men! Twelve of each side were accordingly called out as champions to enter the lists, a double jury of life and death, not of others, but their own; and the champions on Abner's side seem to have been most forward, for they took the field first, (v. 15.) having, perhaps, been bred up in a foolish ambition, thus to serve the humour of their commander-in-chief. But, [2.] However it began, it ended in blood; (v. 16.) they thrust every man his sword into his fellow's side, spurred on by honour, not by enmity; so they fell down together, that is, all the twenty-four were slain; such an equal match were they for one another, and so resolute, that neither side would either beg or give quarter; they did as it were by agreement, (says Josephus), despatch one another with mutual wounds. They that strike at other men's lives, often throw away their own, and death only conquers and rides in triumph. The wonderful obstinacy of both sides was remembered in the name given to the place, Helkath-hazzurim, the field of rocky men; men that were not only strong in body, but of firm and unshaken constancy, that stirred not at the sight of death. Yet the stout-hearted were spoiled, and slept their sleep, Ps. 76. 5. Poor honour for men to purchase at so vast an expense: they that lose their lives for Christ shall find them.

(4.) The whole army, at length, engaged, and Abner's forces were routed, v. 17. The former was a drawn battle, in which all were killed on both sides, and therefore they must put it upon another trial, in which (as it often happens) they that give the challenge went away with loss. David had God on his side; his side therefore was victorious.

18. And there were three sons of Zeruiah there, Joab, and Abishai, and Asahel: and Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe. 19. And Asahel pursued after Abner; and in going he turned not to the right hand nor to the left from following Abner. 20. Then Abner looked behind him, and said, Art thou Asahel? And he answered, I am. 21. And Abner said to him, Turn thee aside to thy right hand or to thy left, and lay thee hold on one of the young men, and take thee his armour. But Asahel would not turn aside from following of him. 22. And Abner said again to Asahel, Turn thee aside from following me: wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy brother? 23. Howbeit, he refused to turn aside: wherefore Abner, with the hinder end of the spear, smote him under the fifth rib, that the spear came out behind him; and he fell down there, and died in the same place: and it came to pass, that as many as came to the place where Asahel fell down and died, stood still. 24. Joab also and Abishai pursued after Abner: and the sun went down when they were come to the hill of Ammah, that lieth before Giah, by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon.

We have here the contest between Abner and Asahel: Asahel, the brother of Joab, and cousin-german to David, was one of the principal commanders of David's forces, and was famous for swiftness in running; he was as light of foot as a wild roe; (v. 18.) this he got the name of, by swift pursuing, not swift flying. Yet, we may suppose, he was not comparable to Abner, as a skilful, experienced soldier; we must therefore observe,

1. How rash he was in aiming to make Abner his prisoner. He pursued after him, and no other, v. 19. Proud of his relation to David and Joab, his own swiftness, and the success of his party, no less a trophy of victory would serve the young warrior, than Abner himself, either slain or bound, which he thought would put an end to the war, and effectually open David's way to the throne. This made him very eager in the pursuit, and careless of the opportunities he had of seizing others in his way, on his right hand, and on his left; his eye is on Abner only. The design was brave, but he been par negotio—equal to the accomplishment of it: but let not the swift man glory in his swiftness, any more than the strong man in his strength: magnis excidit ausis—he perished in an attempt too vast for him.

2. How fair Abner was, in giving him notice of the danger he exposed himself to, and advising him not to meddle to his own hurt, 2 Chron. 25. 19. (1.) He bid him content himself with a lesser prey; (v. 21.) "Lay hold on one of the young men, plunder him, and make him thy prisoner; meddle with thy match, but pretend not to one who is so much superior to thee." It is wisdom in all contests to compare our own strength with that of our adversaries, and to take heed of being partial to ourselves in making the comparison, lest we prove, in the issue, enemies to ourselves, Luke 14. 31. (2.) He begged of him not to put him upon the necessity of slaying him in his own defence, which he was very loath to do, but must do, rather than be slain by him, v. 22. Abner, it seems, either loved Joab, or feared him, for he was very loath to incur his displeasure, which he would certainly do, if he slew Asahel. It is commendable for enemies to be thus respectful one to another. Abner's care how he should lift up his face to Joab, gives cause to suspect that he really believed David would have the kingdom at last, according to the divine designation, and then, in opposing him, he acted against his conscience.

3. How fatal Asahel's rashness was to him. He refused to turn aside, thinking that Abner spoke so kindly, because he feared him; but what came of it? Abner, as soon as he came up to him, gave him his death's wound with a back stroke; (v. 23.) he smote him with the hinder end of his spear, from which he feared no danger. This was a pass which Asahel was not acquainted with, nor had learned to stand upon his guard against; but Abner, perhaps, had formerly used it, and done execution with it; and here it did effectual execution, Asahel died immediately of the wound. See here, (1.) How death often comes upon us by ways that we least suspect. Who would fear the hand of a flying enemy, or the butt-end of a spear? Yet from these Asahel receives his death's wound. (2.) How we are often betrayed by the accomplishments we are proud of. Asahel's swiftness, which he presumed so much upon, did him no kindness, but forwarded his fate, and with it he ran upon his death, instead of running from it. Asahel's fall was not only Abner's security from him, but put a full stop to the conqueror's pursuit, and gave Abner time to rally again; for all that came to the place, stood still: only Joab and Abishai, instead of being disheartened, were exasperated by it, pursued Abner with so much the more fury, (v. 24.) and overtook him at last about sunset, when the approaching night would oblige them to retire.

25. And the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together after Abner, and became one troop, and stood on the top of a hill. 26. Then Abner called to Joab, and said, Shall the sword devour for ever? knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? how long shall it be then ere thou bid the people return from following their brethren? 27. And Joab said, As God liveth, unless thou hadst spoken, surely then in the morning the people had gone up every one from following his brother. 28. So Joab blew a trumpet, and all the people stood still, and pursued after Israel no more, neither fought they any more. 29. And Abner and his men walked all that night through the plain, and passed over Jordan, and went through all Bithron, and they came to Mahanaim. 30. And Joab returned from following Abner: and when he had gathered all the people together, there lacked of David's servants nineteen men and Asahel. 31. But the servants of David had smitten of Benjamin, and of Abner's men, so that three hundred and threescore men died. 32. And they took up Asahel, and buried him in the sepulchre of his father, which was in Beth-lehem. And Joab and his men went all night, and they came to Hebron at break of day.

Here, 1. Abner being conquered, meanly begs for a cessation of arms: he rallied the remains of his forces on the top of a hill, (v. 25.) as if he would have made head again, but becomes an humble supplicant to Joab for a little breathing-time, v. 26. He that was most forward to fight, was the first that had enough of it. He that made a jest of bloodshed, v. 14. Let the young men arise and play before us, is now shocked at it, when he finds himself on the losing side; and the sword he made so light of drawing, threatening to touch himself. Observe how his note is changed: then, it was but playing with the sword; now, Shall the sword devour for ever? It had devoured but one day, yet to him it seemed for ever; because it went against him; and very willing he is now, that the sun should not go down upon his wrath. Now he can appeal to Joab himself concerning the miserable consequences of a civil war, Knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? It will be reflected upon with regret, when the account comes to be made up; for whoever gets in a civil war, the community is sure to lose. Perhaps he refers to the bitterness that was in the tribes of Israel, in the end of their war with Benjamin, when they wept sore for the desolations which they themselves had made, Judg. 21. 2. Now he begs of Joab to sound a retreat, and pleads that they were brethren, who ought not thus to bite and devour one another: he that in the morning would have Joab bid the people fall upon their brethren, now would have bid them lay down their arms. See here, (1.) How easy it is for men to use reason, when it makes for them, who would not use it if it made against them! If Abner had been the conqueror, we should not have had him complaining of the voraciousness of the sword, and the miseries of a civil war, nor pleading that both sides were brethren; but, finding himself beaten, all these reasonings are mustered up and improved for the securing of his retreat, and the saving of his scattered troops from being cut off. (2.) How the issue of things alters men's minds. The same thing which looked pleasant in the morning, at night looked dismal. These that are forward to enter into contention, will, perhaps, repent it before they have done with it, and therefore had better leave it off before it be meddled with, as Solomon advises. It is true of every sin, (O that men would consider it in time!) that it will be bitterness in the latter end. At the last, it bites, like a serpent, those on whom it fawned.

2. Joab, though a conqueror, generously grants it, and sounds a retreat, knowing very well his master's mind, and how averse he was to the shedding of blood. He does indeed justly upbraid Abner with his forwardness to engage; he lays the blame upon him, that there had been so much blood shed as there was; (v. 27.) "Unless thou hadst spoken," that is, "hadst given orders to fight, hadst bidden the young men arise and play before us, none of us had struck a stroke, nor drawn a sword against our brethren. Thou complainest that the sword devours: but who first unsheathed it? Who began? Now thou wouldst have the people parted, but remember who set them on to fight. We had retired in the morning, if thou hadst not given the challenge." Those that are forward to make mischief, are commonly the first to complain of it. This might have served to excuse Joab, if he had pushed on his victory, and made a full end of Abner's forces; but, like one that pitied the mistake of his adversaries, and scorned to make an army of Israelites pay dear for the folly of their commander, he very honourably, by sound of trumpet, put a stop to the pursuit, (v. 28.) and suffered Abner to make an orderly retreat. It is good husbandry to be sparing of blood. As the soldiers were here very obsequious to the general's orders, so he, no doubt, observed the instructions of his prince, who sought the welfare of all Israel, and therefore not the hurt of any.

3. The armies being separated, both retired to the places whence they came, and both marched in the night; Abner to Mahanaim, on the other side Jordan, (v. 29.) and Joab to Hebron, where David was, v. 32. The slain on both sides are computed. On David's side, only nineteen men were missing, and Asahel, (v. 30.) who was worth more than all; on Abner's side, three hundred and three score, v. 31. In civil wars formerly great slaughters had been made; (as Judg. 12. 6.—20. 44.) in comparison with which, this was nothing. It is to be hoped that they were grown wiser and more moderate. Asahel's funeral is here mentioned; the rest they buried in the field of battle, but he was carried to Beth-lehem, and buried in the sepulchre of his father, v. 32. Thus are distinctions made between the dust of some and that of others; but in the resurrection no other difference will be made, but that between godly and ungodly, which will remain for ever.

CHAP. III.

The battle between Joab and Abner did not end the controversy between the two houses of Saul, and David, but it is in this chapter working towards a period. Here is, I. The gradual advance of David's interest, v. 1. II. The building up of his family, v. 2, 5. III. Abner's quarrel with Ish-bosheth, and his treaty with David, v. 6, 12. IV. The preliminaries settled, v. 13, 16. V. Abner's undertaking and attempt to bring Israel over to David, v. 17, 21. VI. The treacherous murder of Abner, by Joab, when he was carrying on this matter, 22, 27. VII. David's great concern and trouble for the death of Abner, v. 28, 39.

1. NOW there was a long war between the house of Saul and the house of David: but David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker. 2. And unto David were sons born in Hebron: and his first-born was Amnon, of Ahinoam the Jezreelitess; 3. And his second, Chileab, of Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite; and the third, Absalom, the son of Maacah the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur; 4. And the fourth, Adonijah, the son of Haggith; and the fifth, Shephatiah, the son of Abital; 5. And the sixth, Ithream, by Eglah, David's wife. These were born to David in Hebron. 6. And it came to pass, while there was war between the house of Saul and the house of David, that Abner made himself strong for the house of Saul.

Here is,

1. The struggle that David had with the house of Saul, before his settlement in the throne was completed, v. 1. (1.) Both sides contested; Saul's house, though beheaded and diminished, would not fall tamely. It is not strange that there was war between them; but one would wonder it should be a long war, when David's house had right on its side, and therefore God on its side; but though truth and equity will triumph at last, God may, for wise and holy ends, prolong the conflict. The length of this war tried the faith and patience of David, and made his establishment at last the more welcome to him. (2.) David's side got ground. The house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker, lost places, lost men, sunk in its reputation, grew less considerable, and was foiled in every engagement; but the house of David grew stronger and stronger; many deserted the declining cause of Saul's house, and prudently came into David's interest, being convinced that he would certainly win the day. The contest between grace and corruption in the hearts of believers, who are sanctified but in part, may fitly be compared to this recorded here. There is a long war between them, the flesh lusting against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; but as the work of sanctification is carried on, corruption, like the house of Saul, grows weaker and weaker; while grace, like the house of David, grows stronger and stronger, till it come to a perfect man, and judgment be brought forth unto victory.

2. The increase of his own house. Here is an account of six several wives, in the seven years he reigned in Hebron. Perhaps this is mentioned here, as that which strengthened David's interest; every child, whose welfare was embarked in the common safety, was a fresh security given to the commonwealth for his care of it. He that has his quiver filled with arrows, shall speak with his enemy in the gate, Ps. 127. 5. As the death of Saul's sons weakened his interest, so the birth of David's strengthened his. (1.) It was David's fault thus to multiply wives, contrary to the law, (Deut. 17. 17.) and it was a bad example to his successors. (2.) It does not appear, that in these seven years he had above one son by each of these wives; some have had as numerous a progeny, and with much more honour and comfort, by one wife. (3.) We read not that any of these sons came to be famous, three of them were infamous, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah; we have therefore reason to rejoice with trembling, in the building up of our families. (4.) His son by Abigail is called Chileab, v. 3. whereas, 1 Chron. 3. 1. he is called Daniel. Bishop Patrick tells the reason which the Hebrew doctors give for these names: that his first name was Daniel, God has judged me, namely, against Nabal; but David's enemies reproached him, and said, "It was Nabal's son, and not David's;" to confute which calumny, Providence so ordered it, that, as he grew up, he became, in his countenance and features, extremely like David, and resembled him more than any of his children, upon which he gave him the name of Chileab, which signifies, like his father; or, the father's picture. (5.) Absalom's mother is said to be the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur, a heathen prince. perhaps David thereby hoped to strengthen his interest, but the issue of the marriage was one that proved his grief and shame. (6.) The last is called David's wife, which therefore, some think, was Michal, his first and most rightful wife, called here by another name; and though she had no child after she mocked David, she might have had before.

Thus was David's house strengthened; but it was Abner that made himself strong for the house of Saul, which is mentioned, (v. 6.) to show that if he failed them, they would fall of course.

7. And Saul had a concubine, whose name was Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah: and Ish-bosheth said to Abner, Wherefore hast thou gone in unto my father's concubine? 8. Then was Abner very wroth, for the words of Ish-bosheth, and said, Am I a dog's head, which against Judah do show kindness this day unto the house of Saul thy father, to his brethren, and to his friends, and have not delivered thee into the hand of David, that thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman! 9. So do God to Abner, and more also, except as the Lord hath sworn to David, even so I do to him; 10. To translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel, and over Judah, from Dan even to Beer-sheba. 11. And he could not answer Abner a word again, because he feared him. 12. And Abner sent messengers to David on his behalf, saying, Whose is the land? saying also, Make thy league with me, and, behold, my hand shall be with thee, to bring about all Israel unto thee. 13. And he said, Well; I will make a league with thee: but one thing I require of thee, that is, Thou shalt not see my face, except thou first bring Michal, Saul's daughter, when thou comest to see my face. 14. And David sent messengers to Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, saying, Deliver me my wife Michal, which I espoused to me for a hundred foreskins of the Philistines. 15. And Ish-bosheth sent, and took her from her husband, even from Phaltiel the son of Laish. 16. And her husband went with her along weeping behind her to Bahurim. Then said Abner unto him, Go, return. And he returned. 17. And Abner had communication with the elders of Israel, saying, Ye sought for David in times past to be king over you: 18. Now then do it: for the LORD hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of my servant David I will save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies. 19. And Abner also spake in the ears of Benjamin: and Abner went also to speak in the ears of David in Hebron all that seemed good to Israel, and that seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin. 20. So Abner came to David to Hebron, and twenty men with him: and David made Abner, and the men that were with him, a feast. 21. And Abner said unto David, I will arise and go, and will gather all Israel unto my lord the king, that they may make a league with thee, and that thou mayest reign over all that thine heart desireth. And David sent Abner away; and he went in peace.

Here,

I. Abner breaks with Ish-bosheth, and deserts his interest, upon a little provocation which Ish-bosheth unadvisedly gave him. God can serve his own purposes by the sins and follies of men. 1. Ish-bosheth accused Abner of no less a crime than debauching one of his father's concubines, v. 7. Whether it was so or no, does not appear, nor what ground he had for the suspicion: but however it was, it had been Ish-bosheth's prudence to connive at it, considering how much it was his interest not to disoblige Abner. If the thing was false, and his jealousy groundless, it was very disingenuous and ungrateful to entertain unjust surmises of one who had ventured his all for him, and was certainly the best friend he had in the world. 2. Abner resented the charge very deeply. Whether he was guilty of the fault concerning this woman, or no, he does not say, (v. 8.) but we suspect he was guilty, for he does not expressly deny it; and though he was, he lets Ish-bosheth know, (1.) that he scorned to be reproached with it by him, and would not take it at his hands. "What!" says Abner, "am I a dog's head, a vile and contemptible animal, that thou exposest me thus? v. 8. Is this my recompense for the kindness I have shown to thee and thy father's house, and the good services I have done you?" He magnifies the service with this, That it was against Judah, the tribes on which the crown was settled, and which would certainly have it at last; so that, in supporting the house of Saul, he acted both against his conscience, and against his interest, for which he deserved a better requital than this: and yet, perhaps, he would not have been so zealous for the house of Saul, if he had not thereby gratified his own ambition, and hoped to find his own account in it. Note, Proud men will not bear to be reproved, especially by those whom they think they have obliged. (2.) That he would certainly be avenged on him, v. 9, 10. With the utmost degree of arrogance and insolence, he lets him know, that, as he had raised him up, so he could pull him down again, and would do it. He knew that God had sworn to David to give him the kingdom, and yet opposed it with all his might, from a principle of ambition; but now he complies with it from a principle of revenge, under colour of some regard to the will of God, which was but a pretence. They that are slaves to their lusts, have many masters, which drive, some one way, and some another, and according as they make head, men are violently hurried into self-contradictions. Abner's ambition made him zealous for Ish-bosheth, and now his revenge made him zealous for David; if he had sincerely regarded God's promise to David, and acted with an eye to that, he had been steady and uniform in his counsels, and acted in consistence with himself. But while Abner serves his own lusts, God, by him, serves his own purposes, makes even his wrath and revenge to praise him, and ordains strength to David by it. Lastly, See how Ish-bosheth was thunderstruck by Abner's insolence; he could not answer him again, v. 11. If Ish-bosheth had had the spirit of a man, especially of a great prince, he might have answered him, that his merits were the aggravation of his crimes: that he would not be served by so bad a man, and doubted not but to do well enough without him. But he was conscious to himself of his own weakness, and therefore said not a word, lest he should make bad worse. His heart failed him, and he now became, as David had foretold, concerning his enemies, like a bowing wall, and a tottering fence, Ps. 62. 3.

II. Abner treats with David. We must suppose that he began to grow weary of Ish-bosheth's cause, and sought an opportunity to desert it; or else, however he might threaten Ish-bosheth with it, for the quashing of the charge against himself, he would not have made good his angry words so soon as he did, v. 12. He sent messengers to David, to tell him that he was at his service. "Whose is the land? Is it not thine? For thou hast the best title to the government, and the best interest in the people's affections." Note, God can find out ways to make those serviceable to the kingdom of Christ, who yet have no sincere affection for it, and who have vigorously set themselves against it. Enemies are sometimes made a footstool, not only to be trodden upon, but to ascend by. The earth helped the woman.

III. David enters into a treaty with Abner, but upon condition that he procure him the restitution of Michal his wife, v. 13. Hereby, 1. David showed the sincerity of his conjugal affection to his first and most rightful wife; neither her marrying another nor h's, had alienated him from her; many waters could not quench that love. 2. He testified his respect to the house of Saul; so far was he from trampling upon it, now that it was fallen, that, even in his elevation, he valued himself not a little on his relation to it. He cannot be pleased with the honours of the throne, unless he have Michal, Saul's daughter, to share with him in them; so far was he from bearing any malice to the family of his enemy. Abner sent him word, that he must apply himself to Ish-bosheth, which he did, v. 14. pleading, that he had purchased her at a dear rate, and she was wrongfully taken from him. Ish-bosheth durst not deny his demand, now that he had not Abner to stand by him, but took her from Phaltiel, to whom Saul had married her, v. 15. and Abner conducted her to David, not doubting, but that then he should be doubly welcome, when he brought him a wife in one hand, and a crown in the other. Her latter husband was loath to part with her, and followed her weeping; (v. 16.) but there was no remedy, he must thank himself; for when he took her, he knew that another had a right to her. Usurpers must expect to resign. Let no man therefore set his heart on that which he is not entitled to. If any disagreement has separated husband and wife, as they expect the blessing of God, let them be reconciled, and come together again; let all former quarrels be forgotten, and let them live together in love, according to God's holy ordinance.

IV. Abner uses his interest with the elders of Israel, to bring them over to David; knowing, that which ever way they went, the common people would follow of course. Now that it serves his own turn, he can plead in David's behalf, that he was, 1. Israel's choice, (v. 17.) "Ye sought for him in times past to be king over you; when he had signalized himself in so many engagements with the Philistines, and done you so much good service; no man can pretend to greater personal merit than David, nor to less than Ish-bosheth: you have tried them both, Detur digniori—Give the crown to him that best deserveth it. Let David be your king." 2. God's choice; (v. 18.) The Lord hath spoken of David. Compare v. 9. "When God appointed Samuel to anoint him, he did, in effect, promise, that by his hand he would save Israel; for, for that end he was made king. God having promised, by David's hand, to save Israel, it is both your duty, in compliance with God's will, and your interest, in order to your victories over your enemies, to submit to him; and it is the greatest folly in the world to oppose him." Who would have expected such reasonings as these out of Abner's mouth? But thus God will make the enemies of his people to know, and own, that he has loved them, Rev. 3. 9. He particularly applied himself to the men of Benjamin, those of his own tribe, on whom he had the greatest influence, and whom he had drawn in to appear for the house of Saul; he was the man that had deceived them, and therefore he was concerned to undeceive them. Thus the multitude are as they are managed.

V. David concludes the treaty with Abner; and he did wisely and well therein; for, whatever induced Abner to it, it was a good work to put an end to the war, and to settle the Lord's anointed on the throne; and it was as lawful for David to make use of his agency, as it is for a poor man to receive an alms from a Pharisee, who gives it in pride and hypocrisy. Abner reported to David the sense of the people, and the success of his communications with them, v. 19. He came now, not, as at first, privately, but with a retinue of twenty men, and David entertained them with a feast, (v. 20.) in token of reconciliation and joy, and as a pledge of the agreement between them: it was a feast upon a covenant, like that, Gen. 26. 30, If thine enemy hunger, feed him; but if he submit, feast him. Abner, pleased with his entertainment, the prevention of his fall with Saul's house, (which would have been inevitable, if he had not taken this course,) and much more with the prospect he had of preferment under David, undertakes, in a little time, to perfect the revolution, and to bring all Israel into obedience to David, v. 21. He tells David he shall reign over all that his heart desired. He knew David's elevation took rise from God's appointment, yet he insinuates that it sprang from his own ambition and desire of rule; thus (as bad men often do) he measured that good man by himself. However, David and he parted very good friends, and the affair between them was well settled. Thus it behoves all, who fear God and keep his commandments, to avoid strife, even with the wicked; to live at peace with all men, and to show the world that they are children of the light.

22. And, behold, the servants of David and Joab came from pursuing a troop, and brought in a great spoil with them; (but Abner was not with David in Hebron; for he had sent him away, and he was gone in peace.) 23. When Joab and all the host that was with him were come, they told Joab, saying, Abner the son of Ner came to the king, and he hath sent him away, and he is gone in peace. 24. Then Joab came to the king, and said, What hast thou done? behold, Abner came unto thee; why is it that thou hast sent him away, and he is quite gone? 25. Thou knowest Abner the son of Ner, that he came to deceive thee, and to know thy going out, and thy coming in, and to know all that thou doest. 26. And when Joab was come out from David, he sent messengers after Abner, which brought him again from the well of Sirah: but David knew it not. 27. And when Abner was returned to Hebron, Joab took him aside in the gate to speak with him quietly, and smote him there under the fifth rib, that he died, for the blood of Asahel his brother. 28. And afterward, when David heard it, he said, I and my kingdom are guiltless before the LORD for ever from the blood of Abner the son of Ner. 29. Let it rest on the head of Joab, and on all his father's house; and let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue, or that is a leper, or that leaneth on a staff, or that falleth on the sword, or that lacketh bread. 30. So Joab and Abishai his brother slew Abner, because he had slain their brother Asahel at Gibeon in the battle. 31. And David said to Joab, and to all the people that were with him, Rend your clothes, and gird you with sackcloth, and mourn before Abner. And king David himself followed the bier. 32. And they buried Abner in Hebron: and the king lifted up his voice, and wept at the grave of Abner; and all the people wept. 33. And the king lamented over Abner, and said, Died Abner as a fool dieth? 34. Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put into fetters: as a man falleth before wicked men, so fellest thou. And all the people wept again over him. 35. And when all the people came to cause David to eat meat while it was yet day, David sware, saying, So do God to me, and more also, if I taste bread, or aught else, till the sun be down. 36. And all the people took notice of it, and it pleased them: as whatsoever the king did pleased all the people. 37. For all the people, and all Israel understood that day, that it was not of the king to slay Abner the son of Ner. 38. And the king said unto his servants, Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel? 39. And I am this day weak, though anointed king; and these men the sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me: the LORD shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness.

We have here an account of the murder of Abner by Joab, and David's deep resentment of it.

I. Joab very insolently fell upon David for treating with Abner. He happened to be abroad upon service, when Abner was with David, pursuing a troop, either of Philistines, or of Saul's party; but, upon his return, was informed that Abner was just gone, (v. 22, 23.) and that a great many kind things had passed between David and him. He had all the reason in the world to be satisfied of David's prudence, and to acquiesce in the measures he took, knowing him to be a wise and good man himself, and under a divine conduct in all his affairs; and yet, as if he had the same sway in David's cause that Abner had in Ish-bosheth's, he chides David, and reproaches him to his face, as impolitic; (v. 24, 25.) What hast thou done? As if David were accountable to him for what he did: "Why hast thou sent him away, when thou mightest have made him a prisoner? He came as a spy, and will certainly betray thee." I know not whether to wonder more, that Joab had impudence enough to give such an affront to his prince, or that David had patience enough to take it. He does, in effect, call David a fool, when he tells him he knew Abner came to deceive him, and yet he trusted him. We find no answer that David gave him, not because he feared him, as Ish-bosheth did Abner, (v. 11.) but because he despised him, or because Joab had not so much good manners as to stay for an answer.

II. He very treacherously sent for Abner back, and, under colour of a private conference with him, barbarously killed him with his own hand. That he made use of David's name, under pretence of giving him some further instructions, is intimated in that, but David knew it not, v. 26. Abner, designing no harm, feared none, but very innocently returned to Hebron, and when he found Joab waiting for him at the gate, turned aside with him to speak with him privately, forgetting what he himself had said, when he slew Asahel, How shall I hold up my face to Joab thy brother? (ch. 2. 22.) and there Joab murdered him; (v. 27.) and it is intimated, (v. 30.) that Abishai was privy to the design, and was aiding and abetting, and would have come in to his brother's assistance, if there had been occasion: he is therefore charged as an accessory; Joab and Abishai slew Abner; though perhaps He only knew it, who is privy to the thoughts and intents of men's hearts.

Now in this, 1. It is certain that the Lord was righteous. Abner had unaliciously, and against the convictions of his conscience, opposed David; he had now basely deserted Ish-bosheth, and betrayed him, under pretence of regard to God and Israel, but really from a principle of pride and revenge, and impatience of control; God will not therefore use so bad a man, though David might, in so good a work, as the uniting of Israel. Judgments are prepared for such scornors as Abner was. But, 2. It is as certain that Joab was unrighteous, and, in what he did, did wickedly. David was a man after God's heart, but could not have those about him, no not in places of the greatest trust, after his own heart. Many a good prince, and a good master, has been forced to employ bad men. (1.) Even the pretence for doing this was very unjust. Abner had indeed slain his brother Asahel, and Joab and Abishai pretended herein to be the avengers of his blood; (v. 27, 30.) but Abner slew Asahel in an open war, wherein Abner indeed had given the challenge, but Joab himself had accepted it, and had slain many of Abner's friends; he did it likewise in his own defence, and not till he had given him fair warning, (which he would not take,) and he did it with reluctance; but Joab here shed the blood of war in peace, 1 Kings 2. 5. (2.) That which we have reason to think was at the bottom of Joab's enmity to Abner, made it much worse. Joab was now general of David's forces; but if Abner should come into his interest, he would possibly be preferred before him, being a senior officer, and more experienced in the art of war. This Joab was jealous of, and could better bear the guilt of blood, than the thoughts of a rival. (3.) He did it treacherously, and under pretence of speaking peaceably to him, Deut. 27. 24. Had he challenged him, he had done like a soldier; but to assassinate him was done villainously, and like a coward. His words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords, Ps. 55. 21. Thus he basely slew Amasa, ch. 20. 9, 10. (4.) The doing of it was a great affront and injury to David, who was now in treaty with Abner, and Joab knew it. Abner was now actually in his master's service, so that, through his side he struck at David himself. (5.) It was a great aggravation of the murder, that he did it in the gate, openly and avowedly, as one that was not ashamed, nor could blush. The gate was the place of judgment and the place of concourse; so that he did it in defiance of justice, both the just sentence of the magistrates, and the just resentments of the crowd; as one that neither feared God, nor regarded man, but thought himself above all control: and Hebron was a Levites' city, and a city of refuge.

III. David laid it deeply to the heart, and many ways expressed his detestation of this execrable villany.

1. He washed his hands from the guilt of Abner's blood. Lest any should suspect that Joab had some secret intimation from David to do as he did, (and the rather, because he went so long unpunished,) he here solemnly appeals to God concerning his innocence; I and my kingdom are guiltless (and my kingdom is so, because I am so) before the Lord for ever, v. 28. It is a comfort to be able to say, when any bad thing is done, that we had no hand in it; We have not shed this blood, Deut. 21. 7. However we may be censured or suspected, our hearts shall not reproach us.

2. He entailed the curse for it upon Joab and his family; (v. 29.) "Let it rest on the head of Joab; let the blood cry against him, and let divine vengeance follow him. Let the iniquity be visited upon his children, and children's children, in some hereditary disease or other." The longer the punishment is delayed, the longer let it last when it does come. Let his posterity be stigmatized, blemished with an issue, or a leprosy, which will shut them out from society; let them be beggars, or cripples, or come to some untimely end, that it may be said, "Here is one of Joab's race." This intimates that the guilt of blood brings a curse upon families; if men do not avenge it, God will, and will lay up the iniquity for the children. But, methinks, a resolute punishment of the murderer himself would better have become David, than this passionate imprecation of God's judgments upon his posterity.

3. He called upon all about him, even Joab himself, to lament the death of Abner; (v. 31.) Rend your clothes and mourn before Abner; that is, before the hearse of Abner, as Abraham is said to mourn before his dead; (Gen. 23. 2, 3.) and he gives a reason why they should attend his funeral with sincere and solemn mourning, (v. 38.) because there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel. His alliance to Saul, his place as general, his interest, and the great services he had formerly done, were enough to denominate him a prince and a great man. When he could not call him a saint and a good man, he said nothing of that, but what was true he gave him the praise of, though he had been his enemy, that he was a prince and a great man; such a man fallen in Israel, and fallen this day, just when he was doing the best deed he ever did in his life; this day, when he was likely to be so serviceable to the public peace and welfare, and could so ill be spared.

(1.) Let them all lament it. The humbling change death puts all men under, is to be lamented, especially as affecting princes and great men. Alas, alas, (alluding to Rev. 18. 10.) how mean, how little, are they made by death, who made themselves the terror of the mighty in the land of the living! But we are especially obliged to lament the fall of useful men in the midst of their usefulness, and when there is most need of them. A public loss must be every man's grief, for every man shares in it. Thus David took care that honour should be done to the memory of a man of merit, to animate others.

(2.) Let Joab, in a particular manner, lament it, which he has less at heart, but more reason to do, than any of them. If he could be brought to do it sincerely, it would be an expression of repentance for his sin in slaying him. If he did it in show only, as it is likely he did, yet it was a sort of penance imposed upon him, and a present commutation of the punishment. If he do not as yet expiate the murder with his blood, let him do something towards it with tears. This, perhaps, Joab submitted to with no great reluctance, now he had gained his point. Now that he is on the bier, no matter in what pomp he lies. Sit divus modo non sit vivus—Let him be canonized, so that he be but killed.

4. David himself followed the corpse as chief mourner, and made a funeral oration at the grave. He attended the bier, v. 31. and wept at the grave, v. 32. Though Abner had been his enemy, and might possibly have proved no fast friend, yet, because he had been a man of bravery in the field, and might have done service in the public counsels at this critical juncture, all former quarrels are forgotten, and David is the true mourner for his fall. What he said over the grave, fetched fresh floods of tears from the eyes of all that were present, when they thought they had already paid the debt in full, v. 33, 34. Died Abner as a fool dieth? (1.) He speaks as one vexed that Abner was fooled out of his life; that so great a man as he, so famed for conduct and courage, should be imposed upon by a colour of friendship, slain by surprise, and so, die as a fool dies. The wisest and stoutest of men have no fence against treachery. To see Abner, who thought himself the main hinge on which the great affairs of Israel turned, so considerable as, himself, to be able to turn the scale of a trembling government, his head full of great projects, and great prospects, to see him made a fool of by a base rival, and falling, on a sudden, a sacrifice to his ambition and jealousy—this stains the pride of all glory, and would put one out of conceit with worldly grandeur; Put not your trust in princes, Ps. 146. 3, 4. And let us therefore make that sure, which we cannot be fooled of. A man may have his life, and all that is dear to him, taken from him, and not be able to prevent it with all his wisdom, care, and integrity; but there is that which no thief can break through to steal. See here how much more we are beholden to God's providence, than to our own prudence, for the continuance of our lives and comforts. Were it not for the hold God has of the consciences of bad men, how soon would the weak and innocent become an easy prey to the strong and merciless, and the wisest die as fools! Or, (2.) He speaks as one maintaining that Abner did not fool himself out of his life. "Died Abner as a fool dies?" No, he did not, not as a criminal, a traitor or felon, that forfeits his life into the hands of public justice; his hands were not pinioned, or his feet fettered, as those of a malefactor's are. Abner falls not before just men, by a judicial sentence, but as a man, an innocent man, falleth before wicked men, thieves and robbers, so fellest thou. Died Abner as Nabal died? So the Seventy read it. Nabal died as he lived, like himself, like a sot; but Abner's fate was such as might have been the fate of the wisest and best man in the world. Abner did not throw away his life as Asahel did, who wilfully ran upon the spear, after fair warning, but he was struck by surprise. Note, It is a sad thing to die like a fool, as they do, that any way shorten their own days, and much more they that make no provision for another world.

5. He fasted all that day, and would by no means be persuaded to eat any thing till night, v. 35. It was then the custom of great mourners to refrain for the time from bodily refreshments, as ch. 1. 12. 1 Sam. 31. 13. How incongruous is it then to turn the house of mourning into a house of feasting! The respect which David paid to Abner, was very pleasing to the people, and satisfied them that he was not, in the least, accessory to the murder; (v. 36, 37.) he was solicitous to avoid the suspicion, lest Joab's villany should have made him odious, as that of Simeon and Levi did Jacob, Gen. 34. 30. On this occasion it is said, Whatever the king did pleased all the people. Which bespeaks, (1.) His good affection to them; he studied to please them in every thing, and carefully avoided what might be disobliging. (2.) Their good opinion of him; they thought every thing he did, well done; such a mutual willingness to please, and easiness to be pleased, will make every relation comfortable.

6. He bewailed it that he could not, with safety, do justice on the murderers, v. 39. He was weak, his kingdom newly planted, and a little shake would overthrow it; Joab's family had a great interest, were bold and daring, and to make them his enemies now might be of bad consequence. These sons of Zeruiah were too hard for him, too big for the law to lay hold of; and therefore, though by man, by the magistrate, the blood of a murderer should be shed, (Gen. 9. 6.) David bears the sword in vain, and contents himself, as a private person, to leave them to the judgment of God; The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness. Now this is a diminution, (1.) To David's greatness; he is anointed king, and yet is kept in awe by his own subjects, and some of them are too hard for him. Who would be fond of power, when a man may have the name of it, and must be accountable for it, and yet be hampered in the use of it? (2.) To David's goodness; he ought to have done his duty, and trusted God with the issue. Piat justitia, ruat celum—Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall asunder. If the law had had its course against Joab, perhaps the murder of Ish-bosheth, Amnon, and others, had been prevented. It was carnal policy and cruel pity that spared Joab. Righteousness supports the throne, and will never shake it. Yet it was only a reprieve that David gave to Joab; on his death-bed, he left it to Solomon (who could the better wield the sword of justice, because he had no occasion to draw the sword of war) to avenge the blood of Abner. Evil pursues sinners, and will overtake them at last. David preferred Abner's son Jaasiel, 1 Chron. 27. 21.

CHAP. IV.

When Abner was slain, David was at a loss for a friend to perfect the reduction of those tribes that were yet in Ish-bosheth's interest; which way to adopt for the accomplishment of it, he could not tell; but here Providence brings it about by the removal of Ish-bosheth. I. Two of his own servants slew him, and brought his head to David, v. 1-8. II. David, instead of rewarding them, put them to death for what they had done, v. 9-12.

1. AND when Saul's son heard that Abner was dead in Hebron, his hands were feeble, and all the Israelites were troubled. 2. And Saul's son had two men that were captains of bands; the name of the one was Baanah, and the name of the other Rechab, the sons of Rimmon a Beerothite, of the children of Benjamin: (for Beeroth also was reckoned to Benjamin: 3. And the Beerothites fled to Gittaim, and were sojourners there until this day.) 4. And Jonathan, Saul's son, had a son that was lame of his feet, and was five years old when the tidings came of Saul and Jonathan out of Jezreel, and his nurse took him up, and fled: and it came to pass, as she made haste to flee, that he fell, and became lame. And his name was Mephibosheth. 5. And the sons of Rimmon, the Beerothite, Rechab and Baanah, went, and came about the heat of the day to the house of Ish-bosheth, who lay on a bed at noon: 6. And they came thither into the midst of the house, as though they would have fetched wheat; and they smote him under the fifth rib: and Rechab and Baanah his brother escaped. 7. For when they came into the house, he lay on his bed in his bed-chamber; and they smote him, and slew him, and beheaded him, and took his head, and gat them away through the plain all night. 8. And they brought the head of Ish-bosheth unto David to Hebron, and said to the king, Behold the head of Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul thine enemy, which sought thy life; and the LORD hath avenged my lord the king this day of Saul, and of his seed.

Here is,

I. The weakness of Saul's house; still it grew weaker and weaker. 1. As for Ish-bosheth, who was in possession of the throne, his hands were feeble; (v. 1.) all the strength they ever had, was from Abner's support, and now that he was dead, he had no spirit left in him. Though Abner had, in a passion, deserted his interest, yet he hoped, by his means, to have made good terms with David; but now even that hope fails him, and he sees himself forsaken by his friends, and at the mercy of his enemies. All the Israelites that adhered to him, were troubled, and at a loss what to do, whether to proceed in their treaty with David or no. 2. As for Mephibosheth, who, in the right of his father Jonathan, had a prior title, his feet were lame, and he was unfit for any service, v. 4. He was but five years old when his father and grandfather were killed; his nurse, hearing of the Philistines' victory, was apprehensive that, in pursuit of it, they would immediately send a party to Saul's house, to cut off all that pertained to it, and would especially aim at her young master, who was now next heir to the crown. Under the apprehension of this, she fled with the child in her arms, to secure it either in some secret place where he could not be found, or in some strange place where he could not be come at; and, making more haste than good speed, she fell with the child, and by the fall some bone was broken or put out, and not well set, so that he was lame of it as long as he lived, and unfit either for court or camp. See what sad accidents children are liable to in their infancy, the effect of which may be felt by them, to their great uneasiness, all their days: even the children of princes and great men, the children of good men, for such a one Jonathan was, children that are well tended, and have nurses of their own to take care of them, yet are not always safe. What reason have we to be thankful to God for the preservation of our limits and senses to us, through the many perils of the weak and helpless state of infancy, and to own his goodness in giving his angels a charge concerning us, to bear us up in their arms, out of which there is no danger of falling, Ps. 91. 12.

II. The murder of Saul's son: we are here told,

1. Who were the murderers, Baanah and Rechab, v. 2, 3. They were own brothers, as Simeon and Levi, and partners in iniquity. They were, or had been, Ish-bosheth's own servants employed under him; so much the more base and treacherous was it in them to do him a mischief. They were Benjamites, of his own tribe. They were of the city of Beeroth; for some reason which we cannot now account for, care is here taken to let us know (in a parenthesis) that the city belonged to the lot of Benjamin; (so we find Josh. 18. 25.) but that the inhabitants, upon some occasion or other, perhaps upon the death of Saul, retired to Gittaim, another city which lay not far off in the same tribe, but was better fortified by nature, being situate (if we may depend upon Mr. Fuller's map) between the two rocks Bozez and Seneh; there the Beerothites were when this was written, and, probably, took root there, and never returned to Beeroth again, which made Beeroth, that had been one of the cities of the Gibeonites, (Josh. 9. 17.) to be forgotten, and Gittaim to be famous long after, as we find, Neh. 11. 33.

2. How the murder was committed, v. 5-7. See here (1.) The slothfulness of Ish-bosheth. He lay upon his bed at noon; it does not appear that the country was at any time of the year so hot, as to oblige the inhabitants to retire at noon, as we are told they do in Spain in the heat of summer; but Ish-bosheth was a sluggish man, loved his ease, and hated business: and when he should have been, at this critical juncture, at the head of his forces in the field, or at the head of his counsels in a treaty with David, he was lying upon his bed, and sleeping, for his hands were feeble, (v. 1.) and so were his head and heart. When those difficulties dispirit us, which should rather invigorate us, and sharpen our endeavours, we betray both our crowns and lives. Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty and ruin. The idle soul is an easy prey to the destroyer. (2.) The treachery of Baanah and Rechab. They came into the house, under pretence of fetching wheat for the victualling of their regiments; and such was the plainness of those times, that the king's corn-chamber, and his bed-chamber, lay near together, which gave them an opportunity, when they were fetching wheat, to murder him as he lay on the bed. We know not when and where death will meet us: when we lie down to sleep, we are not sure but that we may sleep the sleep of death before we awake; nor do we know from what unsuspected hand a fatal stroke may come. Ish-bosheth's own men, who should have protected his life, took it away.

3. The murderers triumphed in what they had done. As if they had performed some very glorious action, and the doing of it for David's advantage was enough not only to justify it, but to sanctify it, they make a present of Ish-bosheth's head to David; (v. 8.) Behold the head of thine enemy; than which they thought nothing could be more acceptable to him: yea, and they make themselves instruments of God's justice, ministers to bear his sword, though they had no commission; The Lord hath avenged thee this day of Saul, and of his seed. Not that they had any regard either to God, or David's honour; they aimed at nothing but to make their own fortunes, (as we say,) and to get preferment in David's court; but, to ingratiate themselves with him, they pretend a concern for his life, a conviction of his title, and a zealous desire to see him in full possession of the throne. Jehu pretended zeal for the Lord of hosts, when an ambition to set up himself and his own family was the spring of his actions.

9. And David answered Rechab and Baanah his brother, the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, and said unto them, As the Lord liveth, who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity, 10. When one told me, saying, Behold, Saul is dead, (thinking to have brought good tidings,) I took hold of him, and slew him in Ziklag, who thought that I would have given him a reward for his tidings: 11. How much more, when wicked men have slain a righteous person in his own house upon his bed? shall I not therefore now require his blood of your hand, and take you away from the earth? 12. And David commanded his young men, and they slew them, and cut off their hands and their feet, and hanged them up over the pool in Hebron. But they took the head of Ish-bosheth, and buried it in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron.

We have here justice done upon the murderers of Ish-bosheth.

1. Sentence past upon them. There needed no evidence, their own tongues witnessed against them, and were so far from denying the fact, that they gloried in it; David therefore shows them the heinousness of the crime, and that blood called for blood from his hand, who was now the chief magistrate, and was, by office, the avenger of blood. And, perhaps, he was the more vigorous in the prosecution, because, for reasons of state, he had spared Joab. "Shall I not require the blood of the slain at the hand of the slayers, and since they cannot make restitution, take their's instead of it?" Observe, 1. How he aggravates the crime, v. 11. Ish-bosheth was a righteous person: he had done them no wrong, nor designed them any. As to himself, David was satisfied that what opposition he gave him, was not from malice, but mistake, from an idea he had of his own title to the crown, and the influence of others upon him, who urged him to put in for it. Note, Charity teaches us to make the best, not only of our friends, but of our enemies, and to think those may be righteous persons, who yet, in some instances, do us wrong. I must not presently judge a man a bad man, because I think him so to me. David owns Ish-bosheth an honest man, though he had created him a deal of trouble unjustly. The manner of it much aggravated the crime. To slay him in his own house, which should have been his castle, and upon his bed, when he was in no capacity of making any opposition; this is treacherous and barbarous, and all that is base, and that which every man's heart will rise with indignation at the thought of, that is not perfectly lost to all honour and humanity. Assassinating is confessedly the most odious and villainous way of murdering. Cursed is he that smiteth his neighbour secretly. 2. He quotes a precedent; (v. 10.) he had put him to death, who had brought him the tidings of the death of Saul, because he thought it would be good tidings to David. Nothing is here said of that Amalekite's helping Saul to kill himself, only of his bringing the tidings of it: by which it should seem that the story he told, was, upon inquiry, found to be false, and that he lied against his own head. "Now," (says David,) "did I treat him as a criminal, and not a favourite," (as he expected,) "who brought me Saul's crown, and shall they be held guiltless, that bring me Ish-bosheth's head?" 3. He ratifies the sentence with an oath; (v. 9.) As the Lord liveth, who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity. He expresses himself thus resolutely, to prevent the making of any intercession for the criminals by those about him: and thus piously, to intimate that his dependence was upon God for the putting of him in possession of the promised throne, and that he would not be beholden to any man to help him to it, by any indirect or unlawful practices. God had redeemed him from all adversity hitherto, helped him over many a difficulty, and through many a danger, and therefore he would depend upon him to crown and complete his own work. He speaks of his redemption from all adversity, as a thing done, though he had many a storm yet before him, because he knew that he who had delivered, would deliver. Hereupon, he signs a warrant for the execution of these men, v. 12. This may seem severe, when they intended him a kindness in what they did; but, (1.) He would thus show his detestation of the villany. When he heard that the Lord smote Nabal, he gave thanks, 1 Sam. 25. 38, 39. for he is the God to whom vengeance belongeth; but if wicked men smite Ish-bosheth, they deserve to die, for taking God's work out of his hands. 2. He would thus show his resentment of the great wrong they put upon him, in expecting that he should patronise and reward it; they could scarcely have done him a greater injury, than thus to think him altogether such a one as themselves; one that cared not what blood he waded through to the crown.

II. Execution done. The murderers were put to death according to law, and their hands and feet were hung up; not their whole bodies, the law forbade that, but only their hands and feet, in terrorem—to frighten others, and to be monuments of David's justice, to make that to be taken notice of, which would recommend him to the esteem of the people, as a man fit to rule, and that aimed not at his own preferment, nor had any enmity to the house of Saul, but only and sincerely, designed the public welfare. But what a confusion was this to the two murderers! What a horrid disappointment! And such they will meet with, who think to serve the interests of the Son of David, by any immoral practices, by war and persecution, fraud and rapine; who, under colour of religion, murder princes, break solemn contracts, lay countries waste, hate their brethren, and cast them out, and say, Let the Lord be glorified; kill them, and think they do God good service. However men may canonize such methods of serving the church and the catholic cause, Christ will let them know, another day, that christianity was not intended to destroy humanity; and they, who thus think to merit heaven, shall not escape the damnation of hell.

CHAP. V.

How far Abner's deserting the house of Saul, his murder, and the murder of Ish-bosheth, might contribute to the perfecting of the revolution, and the establishing of David king over all Israel, does not appear; but, it should seem, that happy change followed presently thereupon, which in this chapter we have an account of. Here is, I. David anointed king by all the tribe, v. 1..5. II. Making himself master of the strong hold of Zion, v. 6..10. III. Building himself a house, and strengthening himself in his kingdom, v. 11, 12. IV. His children that were born after this, v. 13..16. His victories over the Philistines, v. 17..25.

1. THEN came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying, Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh. 2. Also in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel: and the LORD said to thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be a captain over Israel. 3. So all the elders of Israel came to the king to Hebron; and king David made a league with them in Hebron before the LORD: and they anointed David king over Israel. 4. David was thirty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned forty years. 5. In Hebron he reigned over Judah seven years and six months; and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty and three years over all Israel and Judah

Here is,

I. The humble address of all the tribes of Israel to David, beseeching him to take upon him the government, (for they were now as sheep having no shepherd,) and owning him for their king. Though David might by no means approve the murder of Ish-bosheth, yet he might improve the advantages he gained thereby, and accept the applications made to him thereupon. Judah had submitted to David as their king, above seven years ago, and their ease and happiness, under his administration, encouraged the rest of the tribes to make their court to him.

What number came from each tribe, with what zeal and sincerity they came, and how they were entertained for three days at Hebron, when they were all of one heart to make David king, we have a full account, 1 Chron. 12. 23..40. Here we have only the heads of their address, containing the grounds they went upon in making David king. 1. Their relation to him was some inducement. "We are thy bone, and thy flesh," v. 1. Not only thou art our bone, and our flesh, not a stranger, unqualified by the law to be king, (Deut. 17. 15.) but we are thine;" that is, "we know that thou considerest us as thy bone and thy flesh, and hast a tender concern for us, as a man has for his own body, which Saul and his house had not. We are thy bone and thy flesh, and therefore thou wilt be as glad as we shall be, to put an end to this long civil war; and thou wilt take pity on us, protect us, and do thine utmost for our welfare." Those who take Christ for their King, may thus plead with him, "We are thy bone and thy flesh; thou hast made thyself in all things like unto thy brethren, (Heb. 2. 17.) therefore be thou our Ruler, and let this ruin be under thy hand," Isa. 3. 6. 2. His former good services to the public were a further inducement; (v. 2.) "When Saul was king, he was but the cipher, thou wast the figure, thou wast he that leddest out Israel to battle, and broughtest them in triumph; and therefore who so fit now to fill the vacant throne?" He that is faithful in a little deserves to be intrusted with more. Former good offices done for us should be gratefully remembered by us, when there is occasion. 3. The divine appointment was the greatest inducement of all. The Lord said, Thou shalt feed my people Israel; that is, thou shalt rule them; for princes are to feed their people as shepherds, in every thing consulting the subjects' benefit; feeding them, and not fleecing them. "And thou shalt be not only a king to govern in peace, but a captain to preside in war, and be exposed to all the toils and perils of the camp." Since God has said so, now at length, when need drives them to it, they are persuaded to say so too.

II. The public and solemn inauguration of David, v. 3. A convention of the states was called, all the elders of Israel came to him; the contract was settled, the facta conventa—covenants sworn to, and subscribed on both sides; he obliged himself to protect them as their judge in peace, and captain in war; and they obliged themselves to obey him; he made a league with them, to which God was a Witness; it was before the Lord. Hereupon he was, the third time, anointed king. His advances were gradual, that his faith might be tried, and that he might gain experience. And thus his kingdom typified that of the Messiah, which was to come to its height by degrees; for we see not yet all things put under him, (Heb. 2. 8.) but we shall see it, 1 Cor. 15. 25.

III. A general account of his reign and age. He was thirty years old when he began to reign, upon the death of Saul, v. 4. At that age, the Levites were at first appointed to begin their ministration. Numb. 4. 3. About that age, the Son of David entered upon his public ministry, Luke 3. 23. Then men come to their full maturity of strength and judgment. He reigned, in all, forty years and six months; of which, seven years and a half in Hebron, and thirty-three years in Jerusalem, v. 5. Hebron had been famous; (Josh. 14. 15.) it was a priests' city, but Jerusalem was to be more so, and to be the holy city. Great kings affected to raise cities of their own; (Gen. 10. 11.—36. 32..33.) David did so, and Jerusalem was it; the city of David. It is a name famous to the end of the Bible, (Rev. 21.) where we read of a new Jerusalem.

6. And the king and his men went to Jerusalem unto the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land; which spake unto David, saying, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither: thinking, David cannot come in hither. 7. Nevertheless David took the strong hold of Zion: the same is the city of David. 8. And David said on that day, Whosoever getteth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, and the lame and the blind, that are hated of David's soul, he shall be chief and captain: wherefore they said, The blind and the lame shall not come into the house. 9. So David dwelt in the fort, and called it The city of David: and David built round about, from Millo and inward. 10. And David went on, and grew great; and the LORD God of hosts was with him.

If Salem, the place which Melchizedek king of, was Jerusalem, (as seems probable from Ps. 76. 2.) it was famous in Abraham's time; Joshua, in his time, found it the chief city of the south part of Canaan, Josh. 10. 1-3. It fell to Benjamin's lot, (Josh. 18. 28.) but joined close to Judah's, Josh. 15. 8. The children of Judah had taken it, (Judg. 1. 8.) but the children of Benjamin suffered the Jebusites to dwell among them, (Judg. 1. 21.) and they grew so upon them, that it became a city of Jebusites, Judg. 19. 11. Now the very first exploit David did, after he was anointed king over all Israel, was, to gain Jerusalem out of the hand of the Jebusites, which, because it belonged to Benjamin, he could not well attempt, till that tribe, which long adhered to Saul's house, (1 Chron. 12. 29.) submitted to him. Here we have,

I. The Jebusites' defiance of David, and his forces. They said, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither, v. 6. They sent David this provoking message, because, as it is said afterward, on another occasion, they could not believe that ever an enemy should enter into the gates of Jerusalem, Lam. 4. 12. They confided, either, 1. In the protection of their gods, which David, in contempt, had called the blind and the lame, for they have eyes and see not, feet and walk not; "But," say they, "these are the guardians of our city, and except thou take those away, (which thou canst never do,) thou wilt not come in thither." Some think they were constellated images of brass, set up in the recess of the fort, and intrusted with the custody of the place. They call their idols their Mauzzim, or strong holds, (Dan. 11. 38.) and as such relied on them; the name of the Lord is our strong tower, and his arm is strong, his eyes piercing. Or, 2. In the strength of their fortifications, which they thought were made so impregnable by nature or art, or both, that the blind and the lame were sufficient to defend them against the most powerful assailant.

The strong hold of Zion they especially depended on, as that which could not be forced. Probably, they set blind and lame people, invalids or maimed soldiers, to make their appearance upon the walls, in scorn of David and his men, judging them an equal match for him. Though there remain but wounded men among them, yet they should serve to beat back the besiegers. Compare Jer. 37. 10. Note, The enemies of God's people are often very confident of their own strength, and most secure when their day to fall draws near.

II. David's success against the Jebusites. Their pride and insolence, instead of daunting him, animated him, and when he made a general assault, he gave this order to his men; "He that smiteth the Jebusites, let him also throw down in the ditch, or gutter, the lame and the blind, which are set upon the wall to affront us and our God. It is probable they had spoken blasphemous things, and were therefore hated of David's soul. Thus v. 8. may be read; we fetch our reading of it from 1 Chron. 11. 6. which speaks only of smiting the Jebusites, but nothing of the blind and the lame. The Jebusites had said, that if these images of their's did not protect them, the blind and the lame should not come into the house, that is, they would never again trust their palladium, (so Mr. Gregory understands it,) nor pay the respect they had paid to their images; and David, having gained the fort, said so too, that these images, which could not protect their worshippers, should never have any place there more.

III. His fixing his royal seat in Zion; he himself dwelt in the fort, (the strength whereof, which had given him opposition, and was a terror to him, now contributed to his safety,) and he built houses round about for his attendants and guards, (v. 9.) from Millo (the town-hall, or state-house) and inward. He proceeded and prospered in all he set his hand to; grew great in honour, strength, and wealth; more and more honourable in the eyes of his subjects, and formidable in the eyes of his enemies; for the Lord God of hosts was with him. God has all creatures at his command, makes what use he pleases of them, and serves his own purposes by them; and he was with him, to direct, preserve, and prosper him: those that have the Lord of hosts for them, need not fear what hosts of men or devils can do against them. Those who grow great, must ascribe it to the presence of God with them, and give him the glory of it. The church is called Zion, and the city of the living God; the Jebusites, Christ's enemies, must first be conquered and dispossessed, the blind and the lame taken away, and then Christ divides the spoil, sets up his throne there, and makes it his residence by the Spirit.

11. And Hiram king of Tyre sent messengers to David, and cedar-trees, and carpenters, and masons; and they built David a house. 12. And David perceived that the LORD had established him king over Israel, and that he had exalted his kingdom for his people Israel's sake. 13. And David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem, after he was come from Hebron: and there were yet sons and daughters born to David. 14. And these be the names of those that were born unto him in Jerusalem; Shammuah, and Shobab, and Nathan, and Solomon, 15. Ibhah also, and Elishua, and Nepheg, and Japhia, 16. And Elishama, and Eliada, and Eliphalet.

Here is,

I. David's house built, a royal palace, fit for the reception of the court he kept, and the homage that was made to him, v. 11. The Jews were husbandmen and shepherds, and did not much addict themselves either to merchandise or manufactures; and therefore Hiram, king of Tyre, a wealthy prince, when he sent to congratulate David on his accession to the throne, offered him workmen to build him a house: David thankfully accepted the offer, and Hiram's workmen built David a house to his mind. Many have excelled in arts and sciences, who were strangers to the covenants of promise; yet David's house was never the worse, nor the less fit to be dedicated to God, for its being built by the sons of the stranger: it is prophesied of the gospel-church, The sons of strangers shall build up thy wall, and their kings shall minister unto thee, Isa. 60. 10.

II. David's government rooted and built up, v. 12. 1. His kingdom was established; there was nothing to shake it, none to disturb his possession, or question his title. He that made him king, established him, because he was to be a type of Christ, with whom God's hand should be established, and his covenant stand fast, Ps. 89. 21-28. Saul was made king, but not established; so Adam in innocency. David was established king, so is the Son of David, and all who, through him, are made to our God kings and priests. 2. It was exalted in the eyes both of its friends and enemies: never had the nation of Israel looked so great or made such a figure, as it began now to do. Thus it is promised of Christ, that he shall be higher than the kings of the earth, Ps. 89. 27. God has highly exalted him, Philip. 2. 9. 3. David perceived it, by the wonderful concurrence of providences to his establishment and advancement; By this I know that thou favourest me, Ps. 41. 11. Many have the favour and love of God, and do not perceive it, and so want the comfort of it: but to be exalted to that, and established in it, and to perceive it, is happiness enough. 4. He owned that it was for his people Israel's sake, that God had done such great things for him: that he might be a blessing to them, and they might be happy under his administration. God had not made Israel his subjects for his sake, that he might be great, and rich, and absolute; but he made him their king for their sake, that he might lead, and guide, and protect them. Kings are ministers of God to their people for good, Rom. 13. 4.

III. David's family multiplied and increased. All the sons that were born to him after he came to Jerusalem, are here mentioned together; eleven in all; beside the six that were born to him before in Hebron, ch. 3. 2-5. There the mothers are mentioned, not here; only, in general, that he took him more concubines and wives, v. 13. Shall we praise him for this? We praise him not; we justify him not; nor can scarce excuse him. The bad example of the patriarchs might make him think there was no harm in it, and he might hope it would strengthen his interest, by multiplying his alliances, and increasing the royal family. Happy is the man that has his quiver full of these arrows. But one vine by the side of the house, with the blessing of God, may send boughs to the sea, branches to the rivers. Adam, by one wife, peopled the world, and Noah re-peopled it. David had many wives, and yet that did not keep him from coveting his neighbour's wife, and defiling her; for men that have once broken the fence, will wander endlessly. Of David's concubines, see ch. 15. 16.—16. 22.—19. 3. Of his sons, see 1 Chron. 3. 5.

17. But when the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel, all the Philistines came up to seek David; and David heard of it, and went down to the hold. 18. The Philistines also came, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. 19. And David inquired of the LORD, saying, Shall I go up to the Philistinues? wilt thou deliver them into mine hand? And the LORD said unto David, Go up; for I will doubtless deliver the Philistines into thine hand. 20. And David came to Baal-perazim, and David smote them there; and said, The LORD hath broken forth upon mine enemies before me, as the breach of waters. Therefore he called the name of that place Baal-perazim. 21. And there they left their images, and David and his men burnt them. 22. And the Philistines came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. 23. And when David inquired of the LORD, he said, Thou shalt not go up; but fetch a compass behind them, and come upon them over against the mulberry-trees. 24. And let it be, when thou hearest the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry-trees, that then thou shalt bestir thyself: for then shall the LORD go out before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines. 25. And David did so, as the LORD had commanded him; and smote the Philistines from Geba until thou come to Gazer.

The particular service which David was raised up for, was, to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, ch. 3. 18. This therefore Divine Providence, in the first place, gives him an opportunity of accomplishing. Two great victories obtained over the Philistines we have here an account of, by which David not only balanced the disgrace, and retrieved the loss, Israel had sustained in the battle wherein Saul was slain, but went far toward the total subduing of those vexatious neighbours, the last remains of the devoted nations.

I. In both these actions, the Philistines were the aggressors, stirred first toward their own destruction, and pulled it on their own heads. 1. In the former, they came up to seek David, (v. 17.) because they heard that he was anointed king over Israel. He that under Saul had slain his ten thousands, what would he do when he himself came to be king? They therefore thought it was time to look about them, and try to crush his government in its infancy, before it was well settled. Their success against Saul, some years ago, perhaps, encouraged them to make this attack upon David; but they considered not that David had that presence of God with him, which Saul had forfeited and lost. The kingdom of the Messiah, as soon as ever it was set up in the world, was thus vigorously attacked by the powers of darkness, who, with the combined force both of Jews and Gentiles, made head against it; the heathen raged, and the kings of the earth set themselves to oppose it; but all in vain, Ps. 2. 1, &c. The destruction will turn, as this here did, upon Satan's own kingdom. They took counsel together, but were broken in pieces, Isa. 8. 9, 10. 2. In the latter, they came up yet again, hoping to recover what they had lost in the former engagement, and their hearts being hardened to their destruction, v. 22. 3. In both, they spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim, which lay very near Jerusalem: that city they hoped to make themselves masters of, before David had completed the fortifications of it. Jerusalem, from its infancy, had been aimed at, and struck at, with a particular enmity. Their spreading themselves, intimates that they were very numerous, and that they made a very formidable appearance. We read of the church's enemies going upon the breadth of the earth; (Rev. 20. 9.) but the further they spread themselves, the fairer mark they are to God's arrows.

II. In both, David, though forward enough to go forth against them, (for, as soon as he heard it, he went down to the hold, to secure some important advantageous post, v. 17.) yet he entered not upon action, till he had inquired of the Lord by the breast-plate of judgment, v. 19. and again, v. 23. His inquiry was twofold. 1. Concerning his duty; "Shall I go up?" Shall I have a commission from heaven to engage them?" One would think he needed not doubt this; what was he made king for, but to fight the battles of the Lord, and Israel? But a good man loves to see God going before him in every step he takes. "Shall I go up now?" It is to be done, but is it to be done at this time? In all thy ways acknowledge him. And besides, though the Philistines were public enemies, yet some of them had been his particular friends; Achish had been kind to him in his distress, and had protected him: "Now," says David, "ought not I, in remembrance of that, rather to make peace with them, than to make war with them?" "No," says God, "they are Israel's enemies, and are doomed to destruction, and therefore never scruple it, but go up." 2. Concerning his success. His conscience asked the former question, Shall I go up? his prudence asked this, Wilt thou deliver them into my hand? Hereby he owns his dependence on God for victory, that he could not conquer them unless God delivered them into his hand; and refers himself to the good pleasure of God, Wilt thou do it? Yea, says God, I will doubtless do it. If God sends us, he will bear us out, and stand by us: the assurance God has given us of victory over our spiritual enemies, that he will tread Satan under our feet shortly, should animate us in our spiritual conflicts. We do not fight at uncertainty. David had now a great army at command, and in good heart, yet he relied more on God's promise than his own force.

III. In the former of these engagements, David routed the army of the Philistines by dint of sword, (v. 20.) he smote them; and when he had done, 1. He gave his God the glory; he said, "The Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies before me; I could not have done it, if he had not done it before me; he opened the breach, like the breach of waters in a dam, which, when once opened, grows wider and wider." The principal part of the work was God's doing; nay, he did all; what David did, was not worth speaking of; and therefore, Not unto us, but unto the Lord, give glory. He hoped likewise that this breach, like that of waters, was as the opening of the sluice, to let in a final desolation upon them: and, to perpetuate the remembrance of it, he called the place Boal-perazim, the master of the breaches; because, God having broken in upon their forces, he soon had the mastery of them. Let posterity take notice of it to God's honour. 2. He put their gods to shame. They brought the images of their gods into the field, as their protectors, in imitation of the Israelites bringing the ark into their camp: but being put to flight, they could not stay to carry off their images, for they were a burthen to the weary beasts, (Isa. 46. 1.) and therefore they left them to fall with the rest of their baggage into the hands of the conqueror. Their images failed them, and gave them no assistance, and therefore they left their images to shift for themselves. God can make men weary of those things that they have been most fond of, and compel them to desert what they doted upon, and cast even the idols of silver and gold to the moles and the bats, Isa. 2. 20, 21. David and his men converted to their own use the rest of the plunder, but the images they burnt, as God had appointed; (Dent. 7. 5.) "Ye shall burn their graven images with fire, in token of your detestation of idolatry, and lest they should be a snare." Bishop Patrick well observes here, that when the ark fell into the Philistines' hands, it consumed them, but when these images fell into the hands of Israel, they could not save themselves from being consumed.

IV. In the latter of these engagements, God gave David some sensible tokens of his presence with him, bade him not fall upon them directly, as he had done before, but fetch a compass behind them, v. 23. 1. God appoints him to draw back, as Israel stood still, to see the salvation of the Lord. 2. He promised him to charge the enemy himself, by an invisible host of angels, v. 24. Thou shalt hear the sound of a going, like the march of an army in the air, upon the tops of the mulberry-trees. Angels tread light, and he that can walk upon the clouds, can, when he pleases, walk on the tops of trees, or, (as Bishop Patrick understands it,) at the head of the mulberry-tree; that is, of the wood, or hedge-row, of those trees. "And by that sign thou shalt know that the Lord goes out before thee; though thou see him not, yet thou shalt hear him, and faith shall come and be confirmed by hearing. He goes forth to smite the host of the Philistines." When David had himself smitten them, (v. 20.) he ascribed it to God; The Lord has broken forth upon mine enemies; to reward him for which thankful acknowledgment, the next time God did it himself alone, without putting him to any toil or peril; for those that own God in what he has done for them, he will do more. But observe, though God promised to go before them and smite the Philistines, yet David, when he heard the sound of the going, must bestir himself, and be ready to pursue the victory. Note, God's grace must quicken our endeavours. If God work in us both to will and to do, it does not follow that we must sit still, as those that have nothing to do, but we must therefore work out our salvation with all possible care and diligence, Phil. 2. 12, 13. The sound of the going was, (1.) A signal to David when to move; it is comfortable going out when God goes before us. And, (2.) Perhaps, it was an alarm to the enemy, and put them into confusion. Hearing the march of an army against their front, they retreated with precipitation, and fell into David's army, which lay behind them in their rear. Of those whom God fights against, it is said, (Lev. 26. 36.) The sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them.

The success of this is briefly set down, v. 25. David observed his orders, waited till God moved, and stirred then, but not till then. Thus he was trained up in a dependence on God and his providence. God performed his promise, went before him, and routed all the enemies' force, and David failed not to improve his advantages; he smote the Philistines, even to the borders of their own country. When the kingdom of the Messiah was to be set up, the apostles that were to beat down the Devil's kingdom, must not attempt any thing till they received the promise of the Spirit: who came with a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, (Acts 2. 2.) which was typified by this sound of the going on the tops of the mulberry-trees; and when they heard that, they must bestir themselves, and did so; they went forth conquering and to conquer.

CHAP. VI.

The obscurity of the ark, during the reign of Saul, had been as great a grievance to Israel as the insults of the Philis-times. David having humbled the Philistines and mortified them, in gratitude for that favour, and in pursuance of his designs for the public welfare, is here bringing up the ark to his own city, that it might be near him, and be an ornament and strength to his new foundation. Here is, 1. An attempt to do it, which failed and miscarried. The design was well laid, v. 1, 2. But, 1. They were guilty of an error in carrying it in a cart, v. 3. 5. 2. They were punished for that error by the sudden death of Uzzah, (v. 6, 7.) which was a great terror to David, (v. 8, 9.) and put a stop to his proceedings, 10, 11. II. The great joy and satisfaction with which it was, at last, done, v. 12. 15. And, 1. The good understanding between David and his people, v. 16. 19. 2. The uneasiness between David and his wife, upon that occasion, v. 16, 20. 23. And when we consider that the ark was both the token of God's presence, and a type of Christ, we shall see that this story is very instructive.

1. A GAIN, David gathered together all the chosen men of Israel, thirty thousand. 2. And David arose, and went with all the people that were with him from Baale of Judah, to bring up from thence the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of The Lord of hosts, that dwelleth between the cherubims. 3. And they set the ark of God upon a new cart, and brought it out of the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah: and Uzzah and Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, drove the new cart. 4. And they brought it out of the house of Abinadab, which was at Gibeah, accompanying the ark of God: and Ahio went before the ark. 5. And David and all the house of Israel, played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir-wood, even on harps, and psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets, and on cymbals.

We have not heard a word of the ark, since it was lodged in Kerijath-jearim, immediately after its return out of its captivity among the Philistines, (1 Sam. 7. 1, 2.) except that, once, Saul called for it, 1 Sam. 14. 18. That which, in former days, had made so great a figure, is now thrown aside, as a neglected thing, for many years. And if now the ark was for so many years in a house, let it not seem strange that we find the church so long in the wilderness, Rev. 12. 14. Perpetual visibility is no mark of the true church. God is graciously present with the souls of his people, when they want the external tokens of his presence. But now that David is settled in the throne, the honour of the ark begins to revive, and Israel's care of it to flourish again, wherein also, no doubt, the good people among them had been careful, but they lacked opportunity, Phil. 4. 10.

I. Here is honourable mention made of the ark. Because it had not been spoken of a great while, now that it is spoken of, observe how it is described; (v. 2.) it is the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts, that dwelleth between the cherubims: or, at which the name, even the name of the Lord of hosts, was called upon, or, upon which the name of the Lord of hosts was called: or, because of which the name is proclaimed, the name of the Lord of hosts; that is, God was greatly magnified in the miracles done before the ark. Or, the ark of God, who is called the name; (Lev. 24. 11. 16.) the name of the Lord of hosts, sitting on the cherubims upon it. Let us learn hence, 1. To think and speak highly of God. He is the name above every name; the Lord of hosts, that has all the creatures in heaven and earth at his command, and receives homage from them all, and yet is pleased to dwell between the cherubims, over the propitiatory or mercy seat, graciously manifesting himself to his people, reconciled in a Mediator, and ready to do them good. 2. To think and speak honourably of holy ordinances, which are to us, as the ark was to Israel, the tokens of God's presence, (Matth. 28. 20.) and the means of our communion with him; Ps. 27. 4. It is the honour of the ark, that it is the ark of God, he is jealous for it, is magnified in it, his name is called upon it. The divine institution puts a beauty and grandeur upon holy ordinances, which otherwise have no form nor comeliness. Christ is our Ark, in and by him God manifests his favour, and communicates his grace to us, and accepts our adorations and addresses.

II. Here is an honourable attendance given to the ark upon the removal of it. Now, at length, it is inquired after; David made the motion, (1. Chron. 13. 1. 3.) and the heads of the congregation agreed to it, v. 4. All the chosen men of Israel are called together, to grace the solemnity, to pay their respects to the ark, and to testify their joy on its removal. The nobility and gentry, elders and officers, came, to the number of thirty thousand, (v. 1.) and the generality of the common people besides; (1 Chron. 13. 5.) for, some think, it was done at one of the three great festivals. This would make a noble cavalcade, and would help to inspire the young people of the nation, who, perhaps, had scarcely heard of the ark, with a great veneration for it, for this was certainly a treasure of inestimable value, which the king himself, and all the great men, waited upon, and were a guard to.

III. Here are great expressions of joy, upon the removal of the ark, v. 5. David himself, and all that were with him that were musically inclined, made use of such instruments as they had, to excite and express their rejoicing upon this occasion. It might well put them into a transport of joy, to see the ark rise out of obscurity, and move towards a public station. It is better to have the ark in a house, than not at all, better in a house than a captive in Dagon's temple. But it is very desirable to have it in a tent pitched on purpose for it, where the resort to it may be more free and open. As secret worship is better the more secret it is, so public worship is better the more public it is: and we have reason to rejoice, when restraints are taken off, and the ark of God finds welcome in the city of David, and has not only the protection and support, but the countenance and encouragement, of the civil powers; for joy of this, they played before the Lord. Note, Public joy must always be as before the Lord, with an eye to him, and terminating in him; and must not degenerate into that which is carnal and sensual. Dr. Lightfoot supposes that, upon this occasion, David penned the 68th Psalm, because it begins with that ancient prayer of Moses, at the removing of the ark, Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered; and notice is taken there (v. 25.) of the singers and players on instruments that attended, and (v. 27.) of the princes of several of the tribes; and perhaps those words in the last verse, O God thou art terrible out of thy holy places, were added, upon occasion of the death of Uzzah.

IV. Here is an error that they were guilty of in this matter, that they carried the ark in a cart or carriage, whereas the priests should have carried it upon their shoulders, v. 3. The Kohathites that had the charge of the ark, had no waggons assigned them, because their service was to bear it on their shoulders, Numb. 7. 9. The ark was no such heavy burthen, but that they might, among them, have carried it as far as Mount Zion upon their shoulders, they needed not put it in a cart like a common thing. It was no excuse for them, that the Philistines had done so, and were not punished for it; they knew no better, nor had they any priests or Levites with them to undertake the carrying of it; better carry it in a cart, than that any of Dagon's priests should carry it. Philistines may cart the ark with impunity; but if Israelites do, it is at their peril. And it mended the matter very little, that it was a new cart; old or new, it was not what God had appointed. I wonder how so wise and good a man as David was, that conversed so much with the law of God, came to be guilty of such an oversight. We will charitably hope that it was because he was so extremely intent upon the substance of the service, that he forgot to take care of this circumstance.

6. And when they came to Nachon's threshing-floor, Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it; for the oxen shook it. 7. And the anger of the LORD was kindled against Uzzah, and God smote him there for his error; and there he died by the ark of God. 8. And David was displeased, because the LORD had made a breach upon Uzzah: and he called the name of the place Perez-uzzah to this day. 9. And David was afraid of the LORD that day, and said, How shall the ark of the LORD come to me? 10. So David would not remove the ark of the LORD unto him into the city of David; but David carried it aside into the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. 11. And the ark of the LORD continued in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite three months: and the LORD blessed Obed-edom, and all his household.

We have here Uzzah struck dead for touching the ark, when it was upon its journey toward the city of David; a sad providence, which damped their mirth, stopped the progress of the ark, and for the present, dispersed this great assembly, which was come together to attend it, and sent them home in a fright.

I. Uzzah's offence seemed very small. He and his brother Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, in whose house the ark had long been lodged, having been used to attend it, to show their willingness to prefer the public benefit to their own private honour and advantage, undertook to drive the cart, in which the ark was carried; this being, perhaps, the last service they were likely to do it, for others would be employed about it when it came to the city of David. Ahio went before, to clear the way, and, if need were, to lead the oxen; Uzzah followed close to the side of the cart; it happened that the oxen shook it, v. 6. The critics are not agreed about the signification of the original word: They stumbled; so our margin: They kicked; so some; perhaps, against the goad with which Uzzah drove them. They stuck in the mire, so some. By some accident or other, the ark was in danger of being overthrown. Uzzah thereupon laid hold on it, to save it from falling; we have reason to think, with a very good intention, to preserve the reputation of the ark, and to prevent a bad omen. Yet this was his crime: Uzzah was a Levite, but priests only might touch the ark. The law was express concerning the Kohathites, that though they were to carry the ark by the staves, yet they must not touch any holy thing, lest they die, Numb. 4. 15. Uzzah's long familiarity with the ark, and the constant attendance he had given to it, might occasion his presumption, but would not excuse it.

II. His punishment for this offence seems very great; (v. 7.) The anger of the Lord was kindled against him, (for in sacred things he is a jealous God,) and he smote him there for his rashness, as the word is, and struck him dead upon the spot. There he sinned, and there he died, by the ark of God; even the mercy-seat would not save him. Why was God thus severe with him? 1. The touching of the ark was forbidden to the Levites, expressly under pain of death, lest they die; and God, by this instance of severity, would show how he might justly have dealt with our first parents, when they had eaten that which was forbidden under the same penalty, lest ye die. 2. God saw the presumption and irreverence of Uzzah's heart. Perhaps he affected to show, before this great assembly, how bold he could make with the ark, having been so long acquainted with it. Familiarity, even with that which is most awful, is apt to breed contempt. 3. David afterward owned that Uzzah died for an error they were all guilty of, which was carrying the ark in a cart; because it was not carried on the Levites' shoulders, The Lord made that breach upon us, 1 Chron. 15. 13. But Uzzah was singled out to be made an example, perhaps, because he had been most forward in advising that way of conveyance; however, he had fallen into another error, which was occasioned by that. Perhaps, the ark was not covered, as it should have been, with the covering of badgers' skins, (Numb. 4. 6.) and that was a further provocation. 4. God would hereby strike an awe upon the thousands of Israel, would convince them that the ark was never the less venerable for its having been so long in mean circumstances; and thus he would teach them to rejoice with trembling, and always to treat holy things with reverence and holy fear. 5. God would hereby teach us that a good intention would not justify a bad action; it will not suffice to say of that which is ill done, that it was well meant. He will let us know that he can and will secure his ark, and needs not any man's sin to help him to do it. 6. If it were so great a crime for one to lay hold on the ark of the covenant, that had no right to do so, what is it for those to lay claim to the privileges of the covenant, that come not up to the terms of it? To the wicked, God says, What hast thou to do to take my covenant in thy mouth? Ps. 50. 16. Friend, how comest thou in hither? If the ark was so sacred, and not to be touched irreverently, what is the blood of the covenant? Heb. 10. 29.

III. David's feelings on the infliction of this stroke, were keen, and perhaps not altogether as they should have been. He should have humbled himself under God's hand, confessed the error, acknowledged God's righteousness, and deprecated the further tokens of his displeasure, and then have gone on with the good work he had in hand. But we find,

1. He was displeased; it is not said because Uzzah had affronted God, but because God had made a breach upon Uzzah, v. 8. David's anger was kindled. It is the same word that is used for God's displeasure, v. 7. Because God was angry, David was angry and out of humour. As if God might not assert the honour of his ark, and frown upon one that touched it rudely, without asking David's leave. Shall mortal man pretend to be more just than God; arraign his proceedings, or charge him with iniquity? David did not now act like himself, like a man after God's own heart. It is not for us to be displeased at any thing that God does, how unpleasing soever it is to us. The death of Uzzah was indeed an eclipse to the glory of a solemnity, which David valued himself upon more than any thing else, and might give birth to some speculations among those that were disaffected to him, as if God were departing from him too; but, however, he ought to have subscribed to the righteousness and wisdom of God in it, and not to have been displeased at it. When we lie under God's anger, we must keep under our own.

2. He was afraid, v. 9. It should seem he was afraid with amazement; for he said, How shall the ark of the Lord come to me? As if God sought advantages against all that were about him, and was so extremely tender of his ark, that there was no dealing with it; and therefore better for him to keep it at a distance. Qui procul a Jove, procul a fulmine—To retire from Jove, is to retire from the thunder-bolt. He should rather have said, "Let the ark come to me, and I will take warning by this to treat it with more reverence." Provoke me not, (says God, Jer. 25. 6.) and I will do you no hurt. Or, this may be looked upon as a good use which David made of this tremendous judgment; he did not say, "Surely, Uzzah was a sinner above all men, because he suffered such things," but is concerned for himself, as one conscious, not only of his own unworthiness of God's favour, but his obnoxiousness to God's displeasure; "God might justly strike me dead, as he did Uzzah; my flesh trembles for fear of thee," Ps. 119. 120. This God intends in his judgments, that others may hear and fear. David therefore will not bring the ark into his own city, (v. 10.) till he is better prepared for its reception.

3. He took care to perpetuate the remembrance of this stroke by a new name he gave to the place, Perez-uzzah, the breach of Uzzah, v. 8. He had been lately triumphing in the breach made upon his enemies, and called the place Baal-Perazim, a place of breaches. But here is a breach upon his friends. When we see one breach, we should consider, that we know not where the next will be. The memorial of this stroke would be a warning to posterity, to take heed of all rashness and irreverence in dealing about holy things; for God will be sanctified in those that come nigh unto him.

4. He lodged the ark in a good house, the house of Obed-edom a Levite, which happened to be near the place where this disaster happened, and there, (1.) It was kindly entertained and bid welcome, and continued there three months, v. 10, 11. Obed-edom knew what slaughter the ark had made among the Philistines that imprisoned it, and the Bethshemites that looked into it. He saw Uzzah struck dead for touching it, and perceived that David himself was afraid of meddling with it; yet he cheerfully invites it to his own house, and opens his doors to it without fear, knowing it was a savour of death unto death, to those only that treated it ill. "O the courage," says Bishop Hall, "of an honest and faithful heart; nothing can make God otherwise than amiable to his own: even his very justice is lovely." (2.) It paid well for his entertainment. The Lord blessed Obed-edom and all his household. The same hand that punished Uzzah's proud presumption, rewarded Obed-edom's humble boldness, and made the ark unto him a savour of life unto life. Let none think the worse of the gospel for the judgments inflicted on those that reject it, but set in opposition to them the blessings it brings to those that duly receive it. None ever had, or ever shall have reason to say that it is in vain to serve God. Let masters of families be encouraged to keep up religion in their families, and to serve God and the interests of his kingdom, with their houses and estates, for that is the way to bring a blessing upon all they have. The ark is a guest which none shall lose by, that bid it welcome. Josephus says, that whereas, before Obed-edom was poor on a sudden, in these three months, his estate increased, to the envy of his neighbours. Piety is the best friend to prosperity. In wisdom's left hand are riches and honour. His household shared in the blessing: it is good living in a family that entertains the ark, for all about it will fare the better for it.

12. And it was told king David, saying, The LORD hath blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that pertaineth unto him, because of the ark of God. So David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-edom into the city of David with gladness. 13. And it was so, that when they that bare the ark of the LORD had gone six paces, he sacrificed oxen and fatlings. 14. And David danced before the LORD with all his might: and David was girded with a linen ephod. 15. So David and all the house of Israel brought up the ark of the LORD with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet. 16. And as the ark of the LORD came into the city of David, Michal, Saul's daughter, looked through a window, and saw king David leaping and dancing before the LORD; and she despised him in her heart. 17. And they brought in the ark of the LORD, and set it in his place, in the midst of the tabernacle that David had pitched for it: and David offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the LORD. 18. And as soon as David had made an end of offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, he blessed the people in the name of the LORD of hosts. 19. And he dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine. So all the people departed every one to his house.

We have here the second attempt to bring the ark home to the city of David; and this succeeded, though the former miscarried. It should seem, the blessing with which the house of Obed-edom was blessed for the ark's sake, was a great inducement to David to bring it forward; for when that was told him, (v. 12.) he hastened to fetch it to him. For, 1. It was an evidence that God was reconciled to them, and his anger was turned away. As David could read God's frowns upon them all in Uzzah's stroke, so he could read God's favour to them all in Obed-edom's prosperity; and if God be at peace with them, they can cheerfully go on with their design. 2. It was an evidence that the ark was not such a burthensome stone, as it was taken to be, but, on the contrary, happy was the man that had it near him. Christ is indeed a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence, to them that are disobedient; but to them which believe, he is a Corner-stone, elect, precious, 1 Pet. 2. 6-8. When David heard that Obed-edom had such joy of the ark, then he would have it in his own city. Note, The experience others have had of the gains of godliness, should encourage us to be religious. Is the ark a blessing to other's houses? Let us bid it welcome to our's; we may have it, and the blessing of it, without fetching it from our neighbours.

Let us see how David managed the matter now.

I. He rectified the former error; he did not put the ark in a cart now, but ordered those, whose business it was, to carry it on their shoulders. This is implied here, (v. 13.) and expressed 1 Chron. 15. 15. Then we make a good use of the judgments of God on ourselves and others, when we are awakened by them to reform and amend whatever has been amiss.

II. At their first setting out, he offered sacrifices to God, (v. 13.) by way of atonement for their former errors, and in a thankful acknowledgment of the blessings bestowed on the house of Obed-edom. Then we are likely to speed in our enterprises, when we begin with God, and give diligence to make our peace with him. When we attend upon God in holy ordinances, our eye must be to the great Sacrifice, to which we owe it that we are taken into covenant and communion with God, Ps. 50. 5.

III. He himself attended the solemnity with the highest expressions of joy that could be, (v. 14.) he danced before the Lord with all his might; he leaped for joy, as one transported with the occasion, and the more, because of the disappointment he met with the last time. It is a pleasure to a good man to see his errors rectified, and himself in the way of his duty. His dancing, I suppose, was not artificial, by any certain rule or measure, nor do we find that any danced with him; but it was a natural expression of his great joy and exultation of mind. He did it with all his might; so we should perform all our religious services, as those that are intent upon them, and desire to do them in the best manner: all our might is little enough to be employed in holy duties: the work deserves it all. On this occasion, David laid aside his imperial purple, and put on a plain ephod, which was light and convenient for dancing, and was used in religious exercises by those who were no priests, for Samuel wore one, 1 Sam. 2. 18. That great prince thought it no disparagement to him to appear in the habit of a minister to the ark.

IV. All the people triumphed in this advancement of the ark; (v. 15.) They brought it up into the city with shouting, and with sound of trumpet, so expressing their own joy in loud acclamations, and giving notice to all about them to rejoice with them. The public and free administration of ordinances, not only under the protection, but under the smiles, of the civil powers, is just matter of rejoicing to any people.

V. The ark was safely brought to, and honourably deposited in, the place prepared for it, v. 17. They set it in the midst of the tabernacle, or tent, which David had pitched for it; not the tabernacle which Moses reared, that was at Gibeon, (2 Chron. 1. 13.) and, we may suppose, being made of cloth, in so many hundred years, it was gone to decay, and not fit to be removed; but this was a tent set up on purpose to receive the ark. He would not bring it into a private house, no not his own, lest it should seem to be too much engrossed, and people's resort to it, to pray before it, should be less free; yet he would not build a house for it, lest that should supersede the building of a more stately temple in due time; and therefore, for the present, he placed it within curtains, under a canopy, in imitation of Moses's tabernacle. As soon as ever it was lodged, he offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, in thankfulness to God, that the business was now done without any more errors or breaches; and in supplication to God for the continuance of his favour. Note, All our joys must be sanctified both with praises and prayers; for with such sacrifices

God is well pleased. Now, it should seem, he penned Ps. 132.

VI. The people were then dismissed with great satisfaction. He sent them away, 1. With a gracious prayer; he blessed them in the name of the Lord of hosts, (v. 18.) having not only a particular interest in heaven as a prophet, but an authority over them as a prince, for the less is blessed of the better, Heb. 7. 7. He prayed to God to bless them, and particularly to reward them for the honour and respect they had now shown to his ark; assuring them they should be no losers by their journey, but the blessing of God upon their affairs at home would more than bear their charges. He testified his desire for their welfare by this prayer for them, and let them know they had a king that loved them. 2. With a generous treat; for so it was, rather than a distribution of alms; the great men, it is probable, he entertained at his own house, but to the multitude of Israel, men and women, (and children, says Josephus,) he dealt, to each, a cake of bread; (a spice-cake, so some;) a good piece of flesh; (a handsome, decent piece, so some;) a part of the peace-offerings, so Josephus; that they might feast with him upon the sacrifice;) and a flagon, or bottle, of wine, v. 19. Probably, he ordered this provision to be made for them at their respective quarters, and this he did, (1.) In token of his joy and gratitude to God. When the heart is enlarged by cheerfulness, that should open the hand in liberality. The feast of Purim was observed with sending portions one to another, Esth. 9. 22. As those to whom God is merciful, ought to show mercy in forgiving; so those to whom God is bountiful, ought to exercise bounty in giving. (2.) To recommend himself to the people, and to confirm his interest in them; for every one is a friend to him that giveth gifts. They that care not for his prayers, would love him for his generosity; and this would encourage them to attend him another time, if he saw cause to call them together.

20. Then David returned to bless his household. And Michal, the daughter of Saul, came out to meet David, and said, How glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself! 21. And David said unto Michal, It was before the LORD, which chose me before thy father, and before all his house, to appoint me ruler over the people of the LORD, over Israel: therefore will I play before the LORD. 22. And I will yet be more vile than thus, and will be base in mine own sight: and of the maid-servants, which thou hast spoken of, of them shall I be had in honour. 23. Therefore Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death.

David, having dismissed the congregation with a blessing, returned to bless his household; (v. 20.) that is, to pray with them and for them, and to offer up his family-thanksgiving for this national mercy. Ministers must not think that their public performances will excuse them from their family-worship; but when they have, with their instructions and prayers, blessed the solemn assemblies, they must return in the same manner to bless their households, for with them they are in a particular manner charged. David, though he had prophets, and priests, and Levites, about him, to be his chaplains, yet did not devolve the work upon them, but himself blessed his household. It is angel's work to worship God, and therefore surely that can be no disparagement to the greatest men.

Never did David return to his house with so much pleasure and satisfaction, as he did now that he had got the ark into his neighbourhood, and yet even this joyful day concluded with some uneasiness, occasioned by the pride and peevishness of his wife. Even the palaces of princes are not exempt from domestic troubles. David had pleased all the multitude of Israel, but Michal was not pleased with his dancing before the ark: for this, when he was at a distance, she scorned him, and when he came home, she scolded him. She was not displeased at his generosity to the people, nor did she grudge the entertainment he gave them, but she thought he demeaned himself too much in dancing before the ark. It was not her covetousness, but her pride, that made her fret.

I. When she saw David in the street dancing before the Lord, she despised him in her heart, v. 16. She thought this mighty zeal of his for the ark of God, and the transport of joy he was in, upon its coming home to him, was but a foolish thing, and unbecoming so great a soldier, and statesman, and monarch, as he was: it had been enough for him to encourage the devotion of others, but she looked upon it as a thing below him to appear so very devout himself. "What a fool" (thinks she) "does my husband make of himself now! How fond is he of this ark, that might as well have lain still where it had lain for so many years! Much devotion has almost made him mad." Note, The exercises of religion appear very mean in the eyes of those that have little or no religion themselves.

II. When he came home in the very best disposition, she began to upbraid him, and was so full of disdain and indignation, that she could not hold her peace till she had him in private, but went out to meet him with her reproaches.

Observe, 1. How she taunted him; (v. 20.) "How glorious was the King of Israel to-day! What a figure didst thou make to-day in the midst of the mob; how unbecoming thy post and character!" Her contempt of him and his devotion began in the heart, but out of the abundance of that the mouth spake. That which displeased her, was, his affection to the ark, which she could wish he had no greater kindness for than she had: but she basely represents his conduct, in dancing before the ark, as lewd and immodest; and, while really she was displeased at it, as a diminution to his honour, she pretended to dislike it, as a reproach to his virtue, that he uncovered himself in the eyes of his maid-servants, so as no man would have done, but one of the vain fellows, that cares not how much he shames himself. We have no reason to think that this was true in fact: David, no doubt, observed decorum, and governed his zeal with discretion; but it is common for those that reproach religion, thus to put false colours upon it, and lay it under the most odious characters. To have abused any man thus, for his pious zeal, had been very profane; but to abuse her own husband thus, whom she ought to reverence, and one whose prudence and virtue were above the reach of malice itself to disparage, one who had showed such affection for her, that he would not accept a crown, unless he might have her restored to him, (ch. 3. 13.) was a most base and wicked thing, and showed her to have more of Saul's daughter in her, than of David's wife, or Jonathan's sister.

2. How he replied to her reproach. He does not upbraid her with her treacherous departure from him, to embrace the bosom of a stranger. He had forgiven that, and therefore had forgotten it, though, it may be, his own conscience, on this occasion, upbraided him with his folly in receiving her again, (for that is said to pollute the land, Jer 3. 1.) but he justifies himself in what he did.

(1.) He designed thereby to honour God; (v. 21.) It was before the Lord, and with an eye to him. Whatever invidious construction she was pleased to put upon it, he had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he sincerely aimed at the glory of God, for whom he thought he could never do enough. Here he reminds her indeed of the setting aside of her father's house, to make way for him to the throne, that she might not think herself the most proper judge of propriety; "God chose me before thy father, and appointed me to be ruler over Israel, and now I am the fountain of honour; and if the expressions of a warm devotion to God were looked upon as mean and unfashionable in thy father's court, yet I will play before the Lord, and thereby bring them into reputation again. And if this be to be vile, (v. 22.) I will yet be more vile." Note, [1.] We should be afraid of censuring the devotion of others, though it may not agree with our sentiments, because for aught that we know, the heart may be upright in it, and who are we that we should despise those whom God has accepted? [2.] If we can approve ourselves to God in what we do in religion, and do it as before the Lord, we need not value the censures and reproaches of men. If we appear right in God's eyes, no matter how mean we appear in the eyes of the world. [3.] The more we are vilified for well doing, the more resolute we should be in it, and hold our religion the faster, and bind it the closer to us, for the endeavours of Satan's agents to shake us, and to shame us out of it. I will be yet more vile.

(2.) He designed thereby to humble himself; "I will be base in my own sight, and will think nothing too mean to stoop to for the honour of God." In the throne of judgment, and in the field of battle, none shall do more to support the grandeur and authority of a prince than David shall; but in acts of devotion he lays aside the thoughts of majesty, humbles himself to the dust before the Lord, joins in with the meanest services done in honour of the ark, and yet thinks it no diminution to him. The greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of Jesus Christ.

(3.) He doubted not but even this would turn to his reputation among those whose reproach he feared; Of the maid-servants shall I be had in honour. The common people would be so far from thinking the worse of him for these pious condescensions, that they would esteem and honour him so much the more. Those that are truly pious, are sometimes manifested in the consciences even of those that speak ill of them; 2 Cor. 5. 11. Let us never be driven from our duty by the fear of reproach, for to be steady and resolute in it, will, perhaps, turn to our reputation more than we think it will. Piety will have its praise: let us not then be indifferent in it, nor afraid or ashamed to own it.

David was contented thus to justify himself, and did not any further animadvert upon Michal's insolence, but God punished her for it, writing her for ever childless from this time forward, v. 23. She unjustly reproached David for his devotion, and therefore God justly put her under the perpetual reproach of barrenness. They that honour God, he will honour; but those that despise him, and his servants and service, shall be lightly esteemed.

CHAP. VII.

Still the ark is David's care as well as his joy. In this chapter, we have, I. His consultation with Nathan about building a house for it; he signifies his purpose to do it, (v. 1, 2.) and Nathan approves his purpose, v. 3. II. His communion with God about it. 1. A gracious message God sent him about it, accepting his purpose, countermanding the performance, and promising him an entail of blessings upon his family, v. 4.. 17. 2. A very humble prayer which David offered up to God, in return to that gracious message: thankfully accepting God's promises to him, and earnestly praying for the performance of them, v. 18.. 29. And in both these, there is an eye to the Messiah, and his kingdom.

I. AND it came to pass, when the king sat in his house, and the LORD had given him rest round about from all his enemies, 2. That the king said unto Nathan the prophet, See now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains. 3. And Nathan said to the king, Go, do all that is in thine heart: for the LORD is with thee.

Here is,

I. David at rest. He sat in his house, (v. 1.) quiet and undisturbed, having no occasion to take the field; The Lord had given him rest round about, from all those that were enemies to his settlement in the throne, and he sets himself to enjoy that rest; though he was a man of war, he was for peace, (Ps. 120. 7.) and did not delight in war. He had not been long at rest, nor was it long before he was again engaged in war; but, at present, he enjoyed a calm, and he was in his element when he was sitting in his house, meditating on the law of God.

II. David's thoughts of building a temple for the honour of God. He had built a palace for himself, and a city for his servants; and now he thinks of building a habitation for the ark. 1. Thus he would make a grateful return for the honours God had put upon him. Note, When God, in his providence, has remarkably done much for us, it should put us upon contriving what we may do for him and his glory. What shall I render unto the Lord? 2. Thus he would improve the present calm, and make a good use of the rest God had given him. Now that he was not called out to serve God and Israel in the high places of the field, he would employ his thoughts, and time, and estate, in serving him another way, and not indulge himself in ease, much less in luxury. When God, in his providence, gives us rest, and finds us little to do of worldly business, we must do so much the more for God and our souls. How different were the thoughts of David, when he sat in his palace, from Nebuchadnezzar's, when he walked in his! Dan. 4. 29, 30. That proud man thought of nothing but the might of his own power, and the honour of his own majesty; this humble soul is full of contrivance how to glorify God, and give honour to him; and how God resisted the proud, and gave grace and glory to the humble, the event showed. David considered (v. 2.) the stateliness of his own habitation, (I dwell in a house of cedar,) and compared with that the meanness of the habitation of the ark, (that dwells within curtains,) and thought this incongruous, that he should dwell in a palace, and the ark in a tent. David had been uneasy till he found out a place for the ark, (Ps. 132. 4, 5.) and now he is uneasy till he finds out a better place. Gracious, grateful souls, (1.) never think they can do enough for God, but when they have done much, are still projecting to do more, and devising liberal things. (2.) They cannot enjoy their own accommodations, while they see the church of God in distress and under a cloud. David can take little pleasure in a house of cedar for himself, unless the ark have one. Those who stretched themselves upon beds of ivory, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, though they had David's music, had not David's spirit; (Amos 6. 4, 6.) nor they who dwell in their ceiled houses, while God's house lay waste, Hag. 1. 4.

III. His communicating of his thought to Nathan the prophet. He told him, as a friend and confidant whom he used to advise with. Could not David have gone about it himself? Was it not a good work? Was not he himself a prophet? Yes, but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety. David told him that by him he might know the mind of God. It was certainly a good work, but it was uncertain whether it was the will of God that David should have the doing of it.

IV. Nathan's approbation of it; Go, do all that is in thine heart, for the Lord is with thee, v. 3. We do not find that David told him that he proposed to build a temple, only that it was a trouble to him that there was not one built; from which Nathan easily gathered what was in his heart, and bade him go on and prosper. Note, We ought to do all we can, to encourage and promote the good purposes and designs of others, and put in a good word, as we have opportunity, to forward a good work. Nathan spoke this, not in God's name, but as from himself; not as a prophet, but as a wise and good man; it was agreeable to the revealed will of God, which requires that all in their places should lay out themselves for the advancement of religion and the service of God, though, it seems, the secret will was otherwise that David should not do this. It was Christ's prerogative always to speak the mind of God, which he perfectly knew; other prophets spake it only when the spirit of prophecy was upon them; but if in any thing they mistook, (as Samuel, 1 Sam. 16. 6. and Nathan here,) God soon rectified the mistake.

4. And it came to pass that night, that the word of the LORD came unto Nathan, saying, 5. Go and tell my servant David, Thus saith the LORD, Shalt thou build me a house for me to dwell in? 6. Whereas I have not dwelt in any house since the time that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt even to this day, but have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle. 7. In all the places wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel, spake I a word with any of the tribes of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people Israel, saying, Why build ye not me a house of cedar? 8. Now therefore so shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, I took thee from the sheep-cote, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people, over Israel: 9. And I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest, and have cut off all thine enemies out of thy sight, and have made thee a great name, like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth. (10. Moreover, I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as before-time, 11. And as since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel, and have caused thee to rest from all thine enemies.) Also the LORD telleth thee, that he will make thee a house. 12. And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. 13. He shall build a house for my name, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom for ever. 14. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men: 15. But my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee. 16. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever. 17. According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David.

We have here a full revelation of God's favour to David, and the kind intentions of that favour; the notices and assurances of which, God sent him by Nathan the prophet, whom he intrusted to deliver this long message to him. The design of it is to take him off from his purpose of building the temple, and was therefore sent, 1. By the same hand that had given him encouragement to do it: lest, if it had been sent by any other, Nathan should have been despised and insulted, and David should have been perplexed, being encouraged by one prophet, and discouraged by another. 2. The same night, that Nathan might not continue long in an error, nor David have his head any further filled with thoughts of that which he must never bring to pass. God might have said this to David himself immediately, but he chose to send it by Nathan, to support the honour of his prophets, and to preserve in David a regard to them: though he be the head, they must be the eyes by which he must see the visions of the Almighty, and the tongue by which he must hear the word of God. He that delivered this long message to Nathan, assisted his memory to retain it, that he might deliver it fully, (he being resolved to deliver it faithfully,) as he received it of the Lord.

Now in this message we have,

I. David's purpose to build God a house superseded. God took notice of that purpose, for he knows what is in man; and he was well pleased with it, as appears, 1 Kings 8. 18, Thou didst well that it was in thine heart; yet he forbade him to go on with his purpose, v. 5, "Shalt thou build me a house? No, thou shalt not," as it is explained in the parallel place, 1 Chron. 17. 4. "There is other work appointed for thee to do, which must be done first." David is a man of war, and he must enlarge the borders of Israel, by carrying on their conquests. David is a sweet psalmist, and he must prepare psalms for the use of the temple when it is built, and settle the courses of the Levites; but his son's genius will better suit for building the house, and he will have a better treasure to bear the charge of it, and therefore let it be reserved for him to do. As every man hath received the gift, to let him minister.

The building of a temple was to be a work of time, and preparation made for it; but it was a thing that had never been spoken of till now. God tells him, 1. That hitherto he never had had a house built for him; (v. 6.) a tabernacle had served hitherto, and it might serve a while longer. God values not outward pomp in his service; his presence was as surely with his people when the ark was in a tent, as when it was in a temple; David was uneasy that the ark was in curtains, (a mean and moveable habitation,) but God never complained of it as any uneasiness to him. He did not dwell, but walk, and yet fainted not, nor was weary. Christ, like the ark, when here on earth, walked in a tent and tabernacle, for he went about doing good, and dwelt not in any house of his own, till he ascended on high, to the mansions above, in his Father's house, and there he sat down. The church, like the ark, in this world, is ambulatory, dwells in a tent, because its present state is both pastoral and military; its continuing city is to come. David, in his Psalms, often calls the tabernacle a temple, (as Ps. 5. 7.—27. 4.—29. 9.—65. 4.—138. 2.) because it answered the intention of a temple, though it was made but of curtains: wise and good men value not the show, while they have the substance. David perhaps had more true devotion, and sweeter communion with God, in a house of curtains, than any of his successors in the house of ced'ur. 2. That he had never given any orders or directions, or the least intimation, to any of the sceptres of Israel, that is, to any of the judges, 1 Chron. 17. 6. (for rulers are called sceptrates, Ezek. 19. 14. the great Ruler is called so, Numb. 24. 17.) concerning the building of the temple, v. 7. That worship only is acceptable, which is instituted: why should David therefore design what God never ordained? Let him wait for a warrant, and then let him do it. Better a tent of God's appointing, than a temple of his own inventing.

II. David is reminded of the great things God had done for him, to let him know that he was a favourite of Heaven, though he had not the favour to be employed in this service: as also that God was not indebted to him for his good intentions; but, whatever he did for God's honour, God was beforehand with him, v. 8. 9. 1. He had raised him from a very mean and low condition: he took him from the sheep-cote. It is good for those who are come to great preferment, to be often reminded of their small beginnings, that they may always be humble and thankful. 2. He had given him success and victory over his enemies; (v. 9.) "I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest, to protect thee when pursued, to prosper thee when pursuing; I have cut off all thine enemies, that stood in the way of thine advancement and settlement." 3. He had crowned him not only with power and dominion in Israel, but with honour and reputation among the nations about, I have made thee a great name. He was become famous for his courage, conduct, and great achievements, and was more talked of than any of the great men of his day. A great name is what they who have, have great reason to be thankful for, and may improve to good purposes; but what they that have not, have no reason to be ambitious of: a good name is more desirable. A man may pass through the world very obscurely, and yet very comfortably.

III. A happy establishment is promised to God's Israel, v. 10, 11. This comes in in a parenthesis, before the promises made to David himself, to let him understand, that what God designed to do for him, was for Israel's sake, that they might be happy under his administration, and to give him the satisfaction of foreseeing peace upon Israel, when it was promised him that he should see his children's children, Ps. 128. 6. A good king cannot think himself happy unless his kingdom be so. The promises that follow, relate to his family and posterity, these, therefore, which speak of the settlement of Israel, intend the happiness of his own reign. Two things are promised. 1. A quiet place; I will appoint a place for my people Israel. It was appointed long ago, yet they were disappointed, but now that appointment should be made good. Canaan should be clearly their own, without any ejection or molestation. 2. A quiet enjoyment of that place; the children of wickedness, meaning especially the Philistines, who had been so long a plague to them, shall not afflict them any more; but, as in the time that I caused judges to be over my people Israel, I cause thee to rest from all thine enemies; so v. 11. may be read; that is, "I will continue and complete that rest; the land shall rest from war, as it did under the judges."

IV. Blessings are entailed upon the family and posterity of David. David had purposed to build God a house, and, in requital, God promises to build him a house, v. 11. Whatever we do for God, or sincerely design to do, though Providence prevents our doing it, we shall in no wise lose our reward. He had promised to make him a name, v. 9. here he promises to make him a house, which should bear up that name. It would be a great satisfaction to David, while he lived, to have the inviolable assurance of a divine promise, that his family should flourish when he is gone. Next to the happiness of our souls, and the church of God, we would desire the happiness of our seed, that those who come of us, may be praising God on earth, when we are praising him in heaven.

1. Some of these promises relate to Solomon, his immediate successor, and to the royal line of Judah. (1.) That God would advance him to the throne. Those words, when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, intimate that David himself should come to his grave in peace; and then I will set up thy seed. This favour was so much the greater, because it was more than God had done for Moses, or Joshua, or any of the judges, whom he called to feed his people. David's government was the first that was entailed; for the promise made to Christ, of the kingdom, was to reach to his spiritual seed: if children, then heirs. (2.) That he would settle him in the throne. I will establish his kingdom, v. 12. The throne of his kingdom, v. 13. His title shall be clear and uncontested, his interest confirmed, and his administration steady. 3. That he would employ him in that good work of building the temple, which David had only the satisfaction of designing. He shall build a house for my name, v. 13. The work shall be done, though David shall not have the doing of it. (4.) That he would take him into the covenant of adoption; (v. 14, 15.) I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son. We need no more to make us and ours happy, than to have God to be a Father to us and them: and all those to whom God is a Father, he by his grace makes his sons, by giving them the disposition of children. If he be a careful, tender, bountiful Father to us, we must be obedient, tractable, dutiful children to him. The promise here speaks as unto sons. [1.] That his Father would correct him, when there was occasion; for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? Afflictions are an article of the covenant, and are not only consistent with, but flow from, God's Fatherly love. "If he commit iniquity," (as it proved he did, 1 Kings 11. 1.) "I will chasten him to bring him to repentance; but it shall be with the rod of men, such a rod as men may wield; I will not plead against him with the great power of a God," Job 23. 6. Or rather, such a rod as men may bear. "I will consider his frame, and correct him with all possible tenderness and compassion, when there is need, and no more than there is need of; it shall be with the stripes, the touches," (so the word is,) "of the children of men; not a stroke, or wound, but a gentle touch." [2.] That yet he would not disinherit him; (v. 15.) My mercy (and that is the inheritance of sons) shall not depart from him. The revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David was their correction for iniquity, but the constant adherence of the other two to that family, which was a competent support of the royal dignity, perpetuated the mercy of God to the seed of David, according to this promise; though that family was cut short, yet it was not cut off, as the house of Saul was. Never any other family swayed the sceptre of Judah, than that of David. This is that covenant of royalty celebrated Ps. 89. 3, &c. as typical of the covenant of redemption and grace.

2. Others of them relate to Christ, who is often called David, and the Son of David; that son of David to whom these promises pointed, and in whom they had their full accomplishment. He was of the seed of David, Acts 13. 23. To him God gave the throne of his father David, Luke 1. 32. All power, both in heaven and earth, and authority to execute judgment. He was to build the gospels temple, a house for God's name, Zech. 6. 12, 13. That promise, I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, is expressly applied to Christ by the apostle, Heb. 1. 5. But the establishing of his house, and his throne, and his kingdom for ever, (v. 13.) and again, and a third time, (v. 16.) for ever, can be applied to no other than Christ and his kingdom; David's house and kingdom are long since come to an end, it is only the Messiah's kingdom that is everlasting, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. The supposition of committing iniquity cannot indeed be applied to the Messiah himself, but it is applicable (and very comfortably) to his spiritual seed; true believers have their infirmities, for which they may expect to be corrected, but they shall not be cast off. Every transgression in the covenant will not throw us out of covenant.

Now, (1.) This message Nathan faithfully delivered to David, v. 17. Though, in forbidding him to build the temple, he contradicted his own words, yet he was not backward to do it, when he was better informed concerning the mind of God. (2.) These promises God faithfully performed to David, and his seed, in due time. Though David came short of making good his purpose to build God's house, yet he did not come short of making good his promise to build him a house. Such is the tenor of the covenant we are under; though there are many failures in our performances, there are none in God's.

18. Then went king David in, and sat before the LORD; and he said, Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? 19. And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, O Lord God; but thou hast spoken also of thy servant's house for a great while to come. And is this the manner of man, O Lord God? 20. And what can David say more unto thee? for thou, Lord God, knowest thy servant. 21. For thy word's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thou done all these great things, to make thy servant know them. 22. Wherefore thou art great, O Lord God: for there is none like thee, neither is there any God besides thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears. 23. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to himself, and to make him a name, and to do for you great things and terrible, for thy land, before thy people, which thou redeemedst to thee from Egypt, from the nations and their gods? 24. For thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel, to be a people unto thee for ever: and thou, LORD, art become their God. 25. And now, O Lord God, the word that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, establish it for ever, and do as thou hast said. 26. And let thy name be magnified for ever, saying, The LORD of hosts is the God over Israel: and let the house of thy servant David be established before thee. 27. For thou, O LORD of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee a house: therefore hath thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee. 28. And now, O Lord God, thou art that God, and thy words be true, and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant: 29. Therefore now let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may continue for ever before thee: for thou, O Lord God, hast spoken it; and with thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed for ever.

We have here the solemn address David made to God, in answer to the gracious message God had sent him. We are not told what he said to Nathan; no doubt he received him very kindly and respectfully, as his messenger, but his answer to God he took himself, and did not send by Nathan. When ministers deliver God's message to us, it is not to them, but to God, that our hearts must reply; he understands the language of the heart, and to him we may come boldly. David had no sooner received the message, than while the impressions of it were fresh, he retired to return an answer. Observe,

I. The place he retired to; he went in before the Lord, that is, into the tabernacle where the ark was, which was the token of God's presence; before that he presented himself. God's will now is, that men pray every where; but wherever we pray, we must set ourselves as before the Lord, and set him before us.

II. The posture he put himself into; he sat before the Lord. 1. It denotes the posture of his body. Kneeling or standing is certainly the most proper gesture to be used in prayer; but the Jews, from this instance, say, "It was allowed to the kings of the house of David to sit in the temple, and to no other." But this will by no means justify the ordinary use of that gesture in prayer, whatever may be allowed in a case of necessity. David went in, and took his place before the Lord, so it may be read; but when he prayed, he stood up as the manner was. Or, he went in and continued before the Lord; staid some time silently meditating, before he began his prayer, and then remained longer than usual in the tabernacle. Or, 2. It may denote the frame of his spirit at this time. He went in and composed himself before the Lord; thus we should do in all our approaches to God; O God, my heart is fixed, my heart is fixed.

III. The prayer itself, which is full of the breathings of pious and devout affection toward God.

1. He speaks very humbly of himself, and his own merits. So he begins as one astonished, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is my house? v. 18. God had reminded him of the meanness of his original, (v. 8.) and he subscribed to it; he had low thoughts, (1.) Of his personal merits, Who am I? He was, upon all accounts, a very considerable and valuable man. His endowments, both of body and mind, were extraordinary. His gifts and graces were eminent. He was a man of honour, success, and usefulness, the darling of his country, and the dread of its enemies; yet he says, when he comes to speak of himself before God, "Who am I? A man not worth taking notice of." (2.) Of the merits of his family. What is my house? His house was of the royal tribe, and descended from the prince of that tribe; he was allied to the best families of the country, and yet, like Gideon, thinks his family poor in Judah, and himself the least in his father's house, Judg. 6. 15. David thus humbled himself, when Saul's daughter was mentioned to him for a wife, (1 Sam. 18. 18.) but now with much more reason. Note, It very well becomes the greatest and best of men, even in the midst of the highest advancements, to have low and mean thoughts of themselves. For the greatest of men are worms, the best are sinners, and those that are highest advanced, have nothing but what they have received; "Who am I, that thou hast brought me hitherto"; brought me to the kingdom, and to a settlement in it, and rest from all mine enemies?" It intimates that he could not have reached this himself by his own management, if God had not brought him to it. All our attainments must be looked upon as God's vouchsafements.

2. He speaks very highly and honourably of God's favours to him. (1.) In what he had done for him. "Thou hast brought me hitherto, to this great dignity and dominion. Hitherto thou hast helped me." Though we should be left at uncertainty concerning further mercy, we have great reason to be thankful for that which has been done for us hitherto, Acts 26. 22. (2.) In what he had yet further promised him. God had done great things for him already, and yet, as if those had been nothing, he had promised to do much more, v. 19. Note, What God has laid out upon his people is much, but what he has laid up for them is infinitely more, Ps. 31. 19. The present graces and comforts of the saints are invaluable gifts; and yet, as if these were too little for God to bestow upon his children, he has spoken concerning them for a great while to come, even as far as eternity itself reaches. Of this we must own, as David here, [1.] That it is far beyond what we could expect. Is this the manner of men? That is, First, Can man expect to be so dealt with by his Maker? Is this the law of Adam? Note, Considering what the character and condition of men are, it is very surprising and amazing that God should deal with them as he does. Man is a mean creature, and therefore under a law of distance; unprofitable to God, and therefore under a law of disesteem and disregard; guilty and obnoxious, and therefore under a law of death and damnation. But how unlike are God's dealings with man to this law of Adam! He is brought near to God, purchased at a high rate; taken into covenant and communion with God; could this ever have been thought of? Secondly, Do men usually deal thus one with another? No, the way of our God is far above the manner of men. Though he be high, he has respect to the lowly; and is this the manner of men? Though he is offended by us, he beseeches us to be reconciled, waits to be gracious, multiplies his pardons; and is this the manner of men? Some give another sense of this, reading it thus: And this is the law of man, the Lord Jehovah: that is, "This promise of one whose kingdom shall be established for ever, must be understood of one that is a man, and yet the Lord Jehovah, this must be the law of such a one. A Messiah from my loins must be man, but, reigning for ever, must be God." [2.] That beyond this, there is nothing we can desire. "And what can David say more unto thee? v. 20. What can I ask, or wish for more? Thou, Lord, knowest thy servant, knowest what will make me happy, and what thou hast promised is enough to do so." The promise of Christ includes all; if that man, the Lord God, be ours, what can we ask, or think of, more? Eph. 3. 20. The promises of the covenant of grace are framed by him that knows us, and therefore knows how to adapt them to every branch of our necessity. He knows us better than we know ourselves; and therefore let us be satisfied with the provision he has made for us; what can we say more for ourselves in our prayers, than he has said for us in his promises?

3. He ascribes all to the free grace of God; (v. 21.) both the great things he had done for him, and the great things he had made known to him. All was, (1.) For his word's sake, that is, for the sake of Christ the eternal Word; it is all owing to his merit. Or, "That thou mayest magnify thy word of promise above all thy name, in making it the stay and store-house of thy people." (2.) According to thy own heart, thy gracious counsels and designs, ex mero motu—of thy own good pleasure; Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. All that God does for his people in his providences, and secures to them in his promises, is for his pleasure, and for his praise; the pleasure of his will, and the praise of his word.

4. He adores the greatness and glory of God; (v. 22.) Thou art great, O Lord God, for there is none like thee. God's gracious condescension to him, and the honour he had put upon him, did not at all abate his awful veneration for the Divine Majesty; for the nearer any are brought to God, the more they see of his glory; and the dearer we are in his eyes, the greater he should be in ours. And this we acknowledge concerning God, that there is no Being like him, nor any God beside him; and that what we have seen with our eyes of his power and goodness, is according to all we have heard with our ears, and the one half not told us.

5. He expresses a great esteem for the Israel of God, v. 23, 24. As there were none among the gods to be compared with Jehovah, so none among the nations to be compared with Israel; considering, (1.) The works he had done for them. He went to redeem them, applied himself to it as a great work, went about it with solemnity, Ellohim hælccu, dū iverunt—The gods went. As if there were the same consultation and concurrence of all the persons in the blessed Trinity, about the work of redemption, that there was about the work of creation, when God said, Let us make man. Whom they that were sent of God, went to redeem; so the Chaldee, meaning, I suppose, Moses and Aaron. The redemption of Israel, as described here, was typical of our redemption by Christ, in that, [1.] They were redeemed from the nations and their gods; so are we from all iniquity, and all conformity to this present world; Christ came to save his people from their sins. [2.] They were redeemed to be a people unto God, purified and appropriated to himself, that he might make himself a great name, and do for them great things; the honour of God, and the eternal happiness of the saints, are the two things aimed at in their redemption. (2.) The covenant he had made with them, v. 24. It was, [1.] Mutual; "They to be a people to thee, and thou to be a God to them; all their interests consecrated to thee, and all thine attributes engaged for them." [2.] Immutable; "Thou hast confirmed them." He that makes the covenant, makes it sure, and will make it good.

6. He concludes with humble petitions to God. (1.) He grounds his petitions upon the message which God had sent him; (v. 27.) Thou hast revealed this to thy servant; that is, "Thou hast of thine own good will given me the promise, that thou wilt build me a house, else I could never have found in my heart to pray such a prayer as this; I durst not have asked such great things, if I had not been directed and encouraged by thy promise to ask them: they are indeed too great for me to beg, but not too great for thee to give. Thy servant has found in his heart to pray this prayer;" so it is in the original, and the Septuagint. Many, when they go to pray, have their hearts to seek, but David's heart was found, that is, it was fixed; gathered in from its wanderings, and entirely engaged to the duty, and employed in it. That prayer which is found in the tongue only, will not please God; it must be found in the heart; that must be lifted up and poured out before God. My son, give God thy heart. (2.) He builds his faith, and hopes to speed, upon the fidelity of God's promise, v. 28. Thou art that God; thou art he, even that God; the Lord of hosts, and God of Israel; or, That God whose words are true, God whom one may depend upon; and that thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant, which I am therefore bold to pray for. (3.) Thence he fetches the matter of his prayer, and refers himself to that, as the guide of his prayers.

[1.] He prays for the performance of his promise; (v. 25.) "Let the word be made good to me, on which thou hast caused me to hope, (Ps. 119. 49.) and do as thou hast said; I desire no more, and I expect no less; so full is the promise, and so firm." Thus we must turn God's promises into prayers, and then they shall be turned into performances; for, with God, saying and doing are not two things, as they often are with men; God will do as he hath said.

[2.] He prays for the glorifying of God's name; (v. 26.) Let thy name be magnified for ever; this ought to be the summary and centre of all our prayers, the Alpha and the Omega of them; begin with Hallowed be thy name, and end with Thine is the glory for ever. "Whether I be magnified or no, let thy name be magnified." And he reckons that nothing magnifies God's name more than this, to say, with suitable affections, The Lord of hosts is the God over Israel. This bespeaks the God of Israel gloriously great, that he is the Lord of hosts; and this bespeaks the Lord of hosts gloriously good, that he is God over Israel; in both, let his name be magnified for ever: let all the creatures, and all the churches, give him the glory of these two. David desired the performance of God's promise for the honour, not of his own name but of God's. Thus the Son of David prayed, Father, glorify thy name; (John 12. 28.—17. 1.) Glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee.

[3.] He prays for his house, for to that the promise has special reference: First, That it might be happy; (v. 29.) Let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant; and again, with thy blessing, let the house of thy servant be truly and eternally blessed. Those whom thou bleesest are blessed indeed. The care of good men is very much concerning their families; and the best entail on their families is that of the blessing of God. The repetition of this request is not a vain repetition, but expressive of the value he had of the divine blessing, and his earnest desire of it, as all in all to the happiness of his family. Secondly, That the happiness of it might remain. Let it be established before thee, v. 26. Let it continue for ever before thee, v. 29. He prays, 1. That the entail of the crown might not be cut off, but remain in his family; that none of his might ever forfeit it, but that they might walk before God, and that would be their establishment. 2. That his kingdom might have its perfection and perpetuity in the kingdom of the Messiah. When Christ for ever sat down on the right hand of God, (Heb. 10. 12.) and received all possible assurance that his seed and throne shall be as the days of heaven, this prayer of David the son of Jesse for his seed was abundantly answered, that it might continue before God for ever. See Ps. 72. 17. The perpetuity of the Messiah's kingdom is the desire and faith of all good people.

CHAP. VIII.

David having sought first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, settling the ark as soon as he was himself well settled, we are here told how all things were added to him. Here is an account, I. Of his conquests. He triumphed, 1. Over the Philistines, v. 1. 2. Over the Moabites, v. 2. 3. Over the king of Zobah, v. 3, 4. 4. Over the Syrians, v. 5, 8, 13. 5. Over the Edomites, v. 14. II. Of the presents that were brought him, and the wealth he got from the nations he subdued, which he dedicated to God, v. 9, 12. III. Of his court; the administration of his government, (v. 15.) and his chief officers, v. 16, 18. This gives us a general idea of the prosperity of David's reign.

1. AND after this it came to pass, that David smote the Philistines, and subdued them: and David took Gath out of the hand of the Philistines. 2. And he smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive: and so the Moabites became David's servants, and brought gifts. 3. David smote also Hadadezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. 4. And David took from him a thousand chariots, and seven hundred horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen: and David houghed all the chariot horses, but reserved of them for a hundred chariots. 5. And when the Syrians of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer king of Zobah, David slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men. 6. Then David put garrisons in Syria of Damascus: and the Syrians became servants to David, and brought gifts. And the Lord preserved David whithersoever he went. 7. And David took the shields of gold that were on the servants of Hadadezer, and brought them to Jerusalem. 8. And from Bethah, and from Berothai, cities of Hadadezer, king David took exceeding much brass.

God had given David rest from all his enemies that opposed him and made head against him; and he, having made a good use of that rest, has now commission given him to make war upon them, and to act offensively for the avenging of Israel's quarrels and the recovery of their rights, for as yet they were not in full possession of that country, which by the promise of God they were entitled to.

I. He quite subdued the Philistines, v. 1. They had attacked him when they thought him weak, (ch. 5. 17.) and went by the worse then; but when he found himself strong, he attacked them, and made himself master of their country. They had long been vexatious and oppressive to Israel; Saul got no ground against them, but David completed Israel's deliverance, which Samson had begun long before, Judg. 13. 5. Meteg-ammah was Gath, (the chief and royal city of the Philistines,) and the towns belonging to it, among which there was a constant garrison kept by the Philistines on the hill Ammah, (ch. 2. 24.) which was Meteg, a bridle (so it signifies) or curb upon the people of Israel, this David took out of their hand, and used it as a curb upon them. Thus when the strong man is disarmed, the armour wherein he trusted, is taken from him, and used against him, Luke 11. 22. And after the long and frequent struggles which the saints have had with the powers of darkness, like Israel with the Philistines, the Son of David shall tread them all under their feet, and make the saints more than conquerors.

II. He smote the Moabites, and made them tributaries to Israel, v. 2. He divided the country into three parts; two of which he destroyed, casting down the strong holds, and putting all to the sword; the third part he spared, to till the ground, and be servants to Israel. Dr. Lightfoot says, he laid them on the ground, and measured them with a cord, who should be slain, and who should live, and this is called meting out the valley of Succoth, Ps. 60. 6. The Jews say, he used this severity with the Moabites, because that they had slain his parents, and brethren, whom he put under the protection of the king of Moab during his exile. 1 Sam. 22. 3, 4. He did it in justice, because they had been, and in policy, because, if left in their strength, they still would have been, dangerous enemies to the Israel of God. But observe, though it was necessary that two-thirds should be cut off, yet the line that was to keep alive, though it was but one, is ordered to be a full line. Be sure to give that length enough; let the line of mercy be stretched to the utmost, in favorem vitæ—so as to favour life: acts of indemnity must be construed so as to enlarge the favour. Now Balaam's prophecy was fulfilled, A sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, to the utmost of which the fatal line extended, Numb. 24. 17. The Moabites continued tributaries to Israel till after the death of Ahab, (2 Kings 3. 4, 5.) then they rebelled and were never reduced.

III. He smote the Syrians, or Aramites: of them there were two distinct kingdoms, as we find them spoken of in the title of the 60th Psalm, Aram Naharaim, Syria of the rivers, whose head city was Damascus, (famed for its rivers, 2 Kings, 5. 12.) and Aram Zobah, which joined to it, but extended to Euphrates. These were the two northern crowns. 1. David began with the Syrians of Zobah, v. 3, 4. As he went to settle his border at the river Euphrates, (for so far the land conveyed by the divine grant to Abraham and his seed did extend, Gen. 15. 18.) the king of Zobah opposed him, being himself possessed of these countries which belonged to Israel; but David routed his forces, and took his chariots and horsemen. The horsemen are here said to be seven hundred, but 1 Chron. 18. 4. seven thousand. If they divided their horse by ten in a company, as it is probable they did, the captains and companies were 700, but the horsemen were 7000. David houghed the horses, cut the sinews of their hams, and so lamed them, and made them unserviceable, at least in war, God having forbidden them to multiply horses, Deut. 17. 16. David reserved only one hundred chariots out of one thousand for his own use; for he placed his strength, not in chariots or horses, but in the living God, (Ps. 20. 7.) and wrote it from his own observation, that a horse is a vain thing for safety, Ps. 33. 16, 17. 2. The Syrians of Damascus coming in to the relief of the king of Zobah, fell with him: 22,000 were slain in the field; (v. 5.) so that it was easy for David to make himself master of the country, and garrison it for himself, v. 6. The enemies of God's church, that think to secure themselves, will prove, in the end, to ruin themselves, by their confederacies with each other. Associate yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces, Isa. 8. 9.

In all these wars, (1.) David was protected. The Lord preserved him whithersoever he went. It seems, he went in person, and, in the cause of God and Israel, jeopardied his own life in the high places of the field; but God covered his head in the day of battle, which he often speaks of, in his Psalm, to the glory of God. (2.) He was enriched. He took the shields of gold which the servants of Hadadezer had in their custody, (v. 7.) and much brass from several cities of Syria, (v. 8.) which he was entitled to not only jure belli—by the uncontrollable right of the longest sword, ("Get it, and take it,") but by commission from heaven, and the ancient entail of these countries on the seed of Abraham.

9. When Toi king of Hamath heard that David had smitten all the host of Hadadezer, 10. Then Toi sent Joram his son unto king David, to salute him, and to bless him, because he had fought against Hadadezer, and smitten him, (for Hadadezer had wars with Toi;) and Joram brought with him vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and vessels of brass; 11. Which also king David did dedicate unto the Lord, with the silver and gold that he had dedicated of all nations which he subdued; 12. Of Syria, and of Moab, and of the children of Ammon, and of the Philistines, and of Amalek, and of the spoil of Hadadezer, son of Rehob, king of Zobah. 13. And David gat him a name when he returned from smiting of the Syrians in the valley of Salt, being eighteen thousand men. 14. And he put garrisons in Edom; throughout all Edom put he garrisons: and all they of Edom became David's servants. And the Lord preserved David whithersoever he went.

Here is,

1. The court made to David by the king of Hamath, who, it seems, was at this time at war with the king of Zobah. He, hearing of David's success against his enemy, sent his own son ambassador to him, (v. 9, 10.) to congratulate him on his victory, to return him thanks for the favour he had done him, in breaking the power of one he was in fear of, and to beg his friendship; thus he not only secured but strengthened himself. And David lost nothing by taking this little prince under his protection, any more than the old Romans did by the like policy; for the wealth he had from the countries he conquered by way of spoil, he had from this by way of present or gratuity: Vessels of silver and gold. Better get by composition than by compulsion.

2. The offering David made to God of the spoils of the nations, and all the rich things that were brought him. He dedicated all to the Lord, v. 11, 12. This crowned all his victories, and made them far to outshine Alexander's, or Cæsar's; that they sought their own glory, but he aimed at the glory of God. All the precious things he was master of, were dedicated things; that is, they were designed for the building of the temple; and a good omen it was of kindness to the Gentiles in the fulness of time, and of the making of God's house a house of prayer for all people, that the temple was built of the spoils and presents of Gentile nations. In allusion to which, we find the kings of the earth bringing their glory and honour into the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21. 24. Their gods of gold David burnt, (ch. 5. 21.) but their vessels of gold he dedicated; thus, in the conquest of a soul, by the grace of the Son of David, what stands in opposition to God must be destroyed, every lust mortified and crucified, but what may glorify him must be dedicated, and the property of it altered: even the merchandise and the hire must be holiness to the Lord, (Isa. 23. 18.) the gim consecrated to the Lord of the whole earth, (Mic. 4. 13.) and then it is truly our own, and that most comfortably.

3. The reputation he got, in a particular manner, by his victory over the Syrians, and their allies the Edomites, who acted in conjunction with them; as appears by comparing the title of the 60th Psalm, which was penned on this occasion, with v. 13, he gat him a name, for all that conduct and courage which are the praise of a great and distinguished general. Something extraordinary, it is likely, there was in that action, which turned very much to his honour, yet he is careful to transfer the honour to God, as appears by the psalm he penned on this occasion, v. 12. It is through God, that we do valiantly.

4. His success against the Edomites; they all became David's servants, v. 14. Now, and not till now, Isaac's blessing was accomplished, by which Jacob was made Esau's lord; (Gen. 27. 37. . 40.) and the Edomites continued long tributaries to the kings of Judah, as the Moabites were to the kings of Israel, till, in Joram's time, they revolted, (2 Chron. 21. 8.) as Isaac had there foretold that Esau should, in process of time, break the yoke from off his neck. Thus David, by his conquests, (1.) Secured peace to his son, that he might have time to build the temple. And (2.) Procured wealth for his son, that he might have wherewith to build it. God employs his servants variously; some in one employment, others in another; some in the spiritual battles, others in the spiritual buildings; and one prepares work for the other, that God may have the glory of all. All David's victories were typical of the success of the gospel against the kingdom of Satan, in which the Son of David rode forth, conquering and to conquer, and he shall reign, till he has brought down all opposing rule, principality, and power: and he has, as David had, (v. 2.) a line to kill, and a line to save; for the same gospel is to some a saviour of life unto life, to others a saviour of death unto death.

15. And David reigned over all Israel: and David executed judgment and justice unto all his people. 16. And Joab the son of Zeruiah was over the host; and Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder; 17. And Zadok the son of Ahitub, and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar, were the priests; and Seraiah was the scribe; 18. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over both the Cherethites and the Pelethites; and David's sons were chief rulers.

David was not so engaged in his wars abroad, as to neglect the administration of the government at home.

1. His care extended itself to all parts of his dominion. He reigned over all Israel; (v. 15.) not only he had a right to reign over all the tribes, but he did so; they were all safe under his protection, and shared in the fruits of his good government.

2. He did justice with an unbiassed unshaken hand; he executed judgment unto all his people; neither did wrong, nor denied or delayed right to any. It bespeaks, (1.) His industry, and close application to business; also his easiness of access, and readiness to admit all addresses and appeals made to him. All his people, even the meanest, and those too of the meanest tribes, were welcome to his council-board. (2.) His impartiality and the equity of his proceedings, in administering justice; he never perverted justice for favour or affection, nor had respect of persons, in judgment. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was faithful and true, and who doth in righteousness both judge and make war, Rev. 19. 11. See Ps. 72. 1, 2.

3. He kept good order, and good officers, in his court. David being the first king that had an established government, (for Saul's reign was short and unsettled,) he had the modelling of the administration: in Saul's time, we read of no other great officer than Abner, that was captain of the host; but David instituted more officers. Here are, (1.) Two military officers; Joab that was general of the forces in the field, and Benaiah that was over the Cherethites and Pelethites, who were either the city train-bands, archers and slingers, so the Chaldee, or rather the life-guard, or standing force, that attended the king's person; the pretorian band, the militia. They were ready to do service at home, to assist in the administering of justice, and to preserve the public peace: we find them employed in proclaiming Solomon, 1 Kings 1. 38. (2.) Two ecclesiastical officers: Zadok and Ahimelech were priests, that is, they were most employed in the priests' work under Abiathar, the high priest. (3.) Two civil officers; one that was recorder, or remembrancer, to put the king in mind of business in its season; he was prime minister of state, yet not intrusted with the custody of the king's conscience, as they say of our lord chancellor, but only of the king's memory; let the king be put in mind of business, and he would do it himself. Another that was scribe, or secretary of state, that drew up public orders and despatches, and recorded judgments given. Lastly, David's sons, as they grew up to be fit for business, were made chief rulers; they had places of honour and trust assigned them, either in the household, or in the camp, or in the courts of justice, according as their genius led them. They were chief about the king; (so it is explained, 1 Chron. 18. 17.) employed near him, that they might be under his eye. Our Lord Jesus has appointed officers in his kingdom, for his honour and the good of the community; when he ascended on high, he gave these gifts, (Eph. 4. 8. 11.) to every man his work, Mark 13. 34. David made his sons chief rulers; but all believers, Christ's spiritual seed, are better preferred, for they are made to our God kings and priests, Rev. 1. 6.

CHAP. IX.

The only thing recorded in this chapter, is, the kindness David showed to Jonathan's seed for his sake. I. The kind inquiry he made after the remains of the house of Saul, and his discovery of Mephibosheth, v. 1. . 4. II. The kind reception he gave to Mephibosheth, when he was brought to him, v. 5. . 8. III. The kind provision he made for him and his, v. 9. . 13.

1. AND David said, Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake? 2. And there was of the house of Saul a servant whose name was Ziba: and when they had called him unto David, the king said unto him, Art thou Ziba? And he said, Thy servant is he. 3. And the king said, Is there not yet any of the house of Saul, that I may show the kindness of God unto him? And Ziba said unto the king, Jonathan hath yet a son, which is lame on his feet. 4. And the king said unto him, Where is he? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he is in the house of Machir the son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar. 5. Then king David sent, and fetched him out of the house of Machir the son of Ammiel, from Lo-debar. 6. Now when Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, was come unto David, he fell on his face, and did reverence. And David said, Mephibosheth! And he answered, Behold thy servant. 7. And David said unto him, Fear not: for I will surely show thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father; and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually. 8. And he bowed himself, and said, What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?

Here is,

1. David's inquiry after the remains of the ruined house of Saul, v. 1. This was a great while after his accession to the throne, for it should seem that Mephibosheth, who was but five years old when Saul died, had now a son born, v. 12. David had too long forgotten his obligations to Jonathan, but now, at length, they are brought to his mind. It is good sometimes to bethink ourselves, whether there be any promises or engagements that we have neglected to make good; better do it late than never. The compendium which Paul gives us of the life of David, is this, (Acts 13. 36.) that he served his generation according to the will of God, that is, he was a man that made it his business to do good; witness this instance, where we may observe,

1. That he sought an opportunity to do good. He might perhaps have satisfied his conscience with the performance of his promise to Jonathan, if he had been only ready, upon request or application made to him by any of his seed, to help and succour them. But he does more, he inquires of those about him first, (v. 1.) and when he met with a person that was likely to inform him, asked him particularly, "Is there any yet left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness?" v. 3. Is there any, not only to whom I may do justice, (Numb. 5. 8.) but to whom I may show kindness?" Note, Good men should seek opportunities of doing good. The liberal deviseth liberal things, Isa. 32. 8. For the most proper objects of our kindness and charity are such as will not be frequently met with without inquiry. The most necessitous are the least clamorous.

2. Those he inquired after, were the remains of the house of Saul, to whom he would show kindness for Jonathan's sake; Is there any left of the house of Saul? Saul had a very numerous family, (1 Chron. 8. 33.) enough to replenish a country, and yet so emptied, that none of it appeared; but it was come to this inquiry, Is there any left? See how the providence of God can empty full families; see how the sin of man will do it! Saul's was a bloody house, no marvel it was thus reduced, ch. 21. 1. But though God visited the iniquity of the father upon the children, David would not. "Is there any left that I can show kindness to, not for Saul's own sake, but for Jonathan's?"

(1.) Saul was David's sworn enemy, and yet he would show kindness to his house with all his heart, and was forward to do it. He does not say, "Is there any left of the house of Saul, that I may find some way to take them off, and prevent them giving disturbance to me or my successor." It was against Abimelech's mind, that any one was left of the house of Gideon, (Judg. 9. 5.) and against Athaliah's mind, that any one was left of the seed royal; (2 Chron. 22. 10, 11.) those were usurped governments. David's needed no such vile supports; he was desirous to show kindness to the house of Saul, not only because he trusted in God and feared not what they could do unto him, but because he was of a charitable disposition, and forgave what they had done to him. Note, We must evidence the sincerity of our forgiving those that have been any way unjust or injurious to us, by being ready, as we have opportunity, to show kindness both to them and their's. We must not only not avenge ourselves upon them, but we must love them, and do them good, (Matth. 5. 44.) and not be backward to do any office of love and good-will to those that have done us many an injury, (1 Pet. 3. 9.) but contrariwise, blessing. This is the way to overcome evil, and to find mercy for ourselves and ours, when we or they need it.

(2.) Jonathan was David's sworn friend, and therefore he would show kindness to his house. This teaches us, [1.] To be mindful of our covenant. The kindness we have promised, we must conscientiously perform, though it should not be claimed. God is faithful to us, let us not be unfaithful to one another. [2.] To be mindful of our friendships, our old friendships. Note, Kindness to our friends, even to them and their's, is one of the laws of our holy religion. He that has friends, must show himself friendly, Prov. 18. 24. If Providence has raised us, and our friends and their families are brought low, yet we must not forget former acquaintance, but rather look upon that as giving us so much the fairer opportunity of being kind to them; then our friends have most need of us, and we are in the best capacity to help them. Though there be not a solemn league of friendship tying us to this constancy of love, yet there is a sacred law of friendship no less obliging, that to him that is in misery, pity should be showed by his friend; (Job 6. 14.) A brother is born for adversity. Friendship obliges us to take cognizance of the families and surviving relations of those we have loved, who, when they left us, left behind them their bodies, their names, and their posterity, to be kind to.

3. The kindness he promised to show them, he calls the kindness of God; not only great kindness, but, (1.) Kindness, in pursuance of the covenant that was between him and Jonathan, to which God was a witness. See 1 Sam. 20. 42. (2.) Kindness, after God's example; for we must be merciful as he is. 1. He spares those whom he has advantage against, and so must we. Jonathan's request to David was, (1 Sam. 20. 14.) "Show me the kindness of the Lord, that I did not, and the same to my seed." The kindness of God is some greater instance of kindness than one can ordinarily expect from men. (3.) It is kindness done after a godly sort, and with an eye to God, and his honour and favour.

II. Information given him concerning Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan. Ziba was an old retainer to Saul's family, and knew the state of it; he is sent for and examined, and acquaints the king that Jonathan's son was living, but lame, v. 3. How he came to be so, we read before, (ch. 4. 4.) and that he lived obscure, probably, among his mother's relations in Lo-debar, on the other side Jordan, where he was forgotten as a dead man out of mind, but bore it the more easily, because he could remember little of the honour he fell from.

III. The bringing of him to court. The king sent (Ziba, it is likely) to bring him up to Jerusalem with all convenient speed, v. 5. Thus he eased Machir of his trouble, and, perhaps, recompensed him for what he had laid out on Mephibosheth's account. This Machir appears to have been a very generous free-hearted man, and to have entertained Mephibosheth, not out of any disaffection to David, or his government, but in compassion to the reduced son of a prince, for afterward we find him kind to David himself, when he fled from Absalom; he is named (ch. 17. 27.) among those that furnished the king with what he wanted at Mahanaim: though when David sent for Mephibosheth from him, he little thought that the time would come, when he himself would gladly be beholden to him: and perhaps Machir was then the more ready to help David, in recompense for his kindness to Mephibosheth; therefore we should be forward to give, because we know not but we ourselves may sometime be in want; (Eccl. 11. 2.) And he that watereth, shall be watered also himself. Prov. 11. 25.

Now, 1. Mephibosheth presents himself to David with all the respect that was owing to his character. Lame as he was, he fell on his face, and did reverence, v. 6. David had thus made his honours to Mephibosheth's father, Jonathan, when he was next to the throne; (1 Sam. 20. 41.) he bowed himself to him three times; and now Mephibosheth, in like manner, addresses him, when affairs are so completely reversed. Those who, when they are in inferior relations, show respect, when they come to be advanced, shall have respect shown them.

2. David received him with all the kindness that could be. (1.) He spoke to him as one surprised, but pleased to see him. "Mephibosheth! Why, is there such a man living?" He remembered his name, for it is probable that he was born about the time of the intimacy between him and Jonathan. (2.) He bade him not be afraid. Fear not, v. 7. It is probable that the sight of David put him into some confusion: to free him from which, he assures him that he sent for him, not out of any jealousy he had of him, or with any bad design upon him, but to show him kindness. Great men should not take a pleasure in the timorous approaches of their inferiors, (for the great God does not,) but should encourage them. (3.) He gives him, by grant from the crown, all the land of Saul his father, that is, his paternal estate, which was forfeited by Ishbosheth's rebellion, and added to his own revenue. This was a real favour, and more than giving him a kind word. True friendship will be generous. (4.) Though he had thus given him a good estate, sufficient to maintain him, yet, for Jonathan's sake, (whom perhaps he saw some resemblance of in Mephibosheth's face,) he will take him to be a constant guest at his own table, where he will not only be comfortably fed, but have company and attendance suitable to his birth and quality. Though Mephibosheth was lame and unsightly, and does not appear to have any great fitness for business, yet, for his good father's sake, David will take him to be one of his family.

3. Mephibosheth accepts this kindness with great humility and self-abasement. He was none of those that take every favour as a debt, and think every thing too little that their friends do for them; but, on the contrary, speaks as one amazed at the grants David made him; (v. 8.) What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am? How does he vilify himself! Though the son of a prince, and the grandson of a king, yet, his family being under guilt and wrath, and himself poor and lame, he calls himself a dead dog before David. Note, It is good to have the heart humble under humbling providences: if, when Divine Providence brings our condition down, divine grace brings our spirits down with it, we shall be easy. And those who thus humble themselves, shall be exalted. How does he magnify David's kindness! It had been easy to lessen it, if he had been so disposed. Had David restored him his father's estate, it was but giving him his own. Did he take him to his table? That was policy, that he might have an eye upon him. But Mephibosheth thinks all kind, that David said and did, and himself less than the least of his favours. See 1 Sam. 18. 18.

9. Then the king called to Ziba, Saul's servant, and said unto him, I have given unto thy master's son all that pertained to Saul, and to all his house. 10. Thou therefore, and thy sons, and thy servants, shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring in the fruits, that thy master's son may have food to eat: but Mephibosheth, thy master's son, shall eat bread always at my table. Now Ziba had fifteen sons, and twenty servants. 11. Then said Ziba unto the king, According to all that my lord the king hath commanded his servant, so shall thy servant do. As for Mephibosheth, said the king, he shall eat at my table, as one of the king's sons. 12. And Mephibosheth had a young son, whose name was Micah. And all that dwelt in the house of Ziba were servants unto Mephibosheth. 13. So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem: for he did eat continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet.

The matter is here settled concerning Mephibosheth.

1. This grant of his father's estate is confirmed to him, and Ziba called to be a witness to it; (v. 9.) and, it should seem, Saul had a very good estate, for his father was a mighty man of substance; (1 Sam. 9. 1.) and he had fields and vineyards to bestow, 1 Sam. 22. 7. Be it ever so much, Mephibosheth is now master of it all.

2. The management of the estate is committed to Ziba, who knew what it was, and how to make the most of it, whom having been his father's servant, he might confide in, and who, having a numerous family of sons and servants, had hands sufficient to be employed about it, v. 10. Thus Mephibosheth is made very easy, having a good estate without care, and is in a fair way of being very rich; having much coming in, and little occasion to spend, himself being kept at David's table. Yet he must have food to eat beside his own bread, provisions for his son and servants, and Ziba's sons and servants would come in for their share of his revenue; for which reason, perhaps, their number is here mentioned, fifteen sons and twenty servants, who would require nearly all there was; for as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them, and what good has the owner thereof, save the beholding of them with his eyes? Eccl. 5. 11. All that dwell in the house of Ziba, were servants of Mephibosheth; (v. 12.) that is, they all lived upon him, and made a prey of his estate, under pretence of waiting on him, and doing him service. The Jews have a saying, "He that multiplies servants, multiplies thieves." Ziba is now pleased, for he loves wealth, and will have abundance: As the king has commanded, so shall thy servant do; (v. 11.) let me alone with the estate: and as for Mephibosheth, (they seem to be Ziba's words,) "if the king please, he need not trouble the court, he shall eat at my table, and be as well treated as one of the king's sons." But David will have him to his own table, and Mephibosheth is as well pleased with his post, as Ziba with his; how unfaithful Ziba was to him, we shall find afterward, ch. 16. 3.

Now because David was a type of Christ, his Lord and Son, his Root and Offspring, let his kindness to Mephibosheth serve to illustrate the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward fallen man, which yet he was under no obligation to, as David was to Jonathan. Man was convicted of rebellion against God, and, like Saul's house, under a sentence of rejection from him, was not only brought low and impoverished, but lame and impotent, made so by the fall: the son of God inquires after this degenerate race, that inquired not after him; comes to seek and save them. To those of them that humble themselves before him, and commit themselves to him, he restores the forfeited inheritance, he entitles them to a better paradise than that which Adam lost, and takes them into communion with himself, sets them with his children at his table, and feasts them with the dainties of heaven. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldest thus magnify him!

CHAP. X.

This chapter gives us an account of a war David had with the Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, with the occasion and success of it. I. David sends a friendly embassy to Hanun king of the Ammonites, v. 1, 2. II. He, upon a base surmise that it was ill-intended, abused David's ambassadors, v. 3, 4. III. David resenting it, (v. 5.) the Ammonites prepared for war against him, v. 6. IV. David carries the war into their own country, sends Joab and Abishai against them, who address themselves to the battle with a great deal of conduct and bravery, v. 7. 12. V. The Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, were totally routed, v. 13, 14. VI. The forces of the Syrians, which rallied again, were a second time defeated, v. 15. 19. Thus did David advance his own reputation for gratitude, in returning kindnesses; and justice, in repaying injuries.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that the king of the children of Ammon died, and Hanun his son reigned in his stead. 2. Then said David, I will show kindness unto Hanun the son of Nabash, as his father showed kindness unto me. And David sent to comfort him, by the hand of his servants, for his father. And David's servants came into the land of the children of Ammon. 3. And the princes of the children of Ammon said unto Hanun their lord, Thinkest thou that David doth honour thy father, that he hath sent comforters unto thee? hath not David rather sent his servants unto thee to search the city, and to spy it out, and to overthrow it? 4 Wherefore Hanun took David's servants, and shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in the middle, even to their buttocks, and sent them away. 5. When they told it unto David, he sent to meet them, because the men were greatly ashamed: and the king said, Tarry at Jericho until your beards be grown, and then return.

Here is,

I. The great respect David paid to his neighbour, the king of the Ammonites, v. 1, 2. 1. The inducement to it was, some kindnesses he had formerly received from Nahash, the deceased king. He showed kindness to me, says David; (v. 2.) and therefore (having lately had satisfaction in showing kindness to Mephibosheth, for his father's sake) he resolves to show kindness to his son, and to keep up a friendly correspondence with him. Thus the pleasure of doing one kind and generous action, should excite us to another. Nahash had been an enemy to Israel, a cruel enemy, (1 Sam. 11. 2.) and yet had showed kindness to David, perhaps only in contradiction to Saul, who was unkind to him: however, if David received kindness, he is not nice in examining the grounds and principles of it, but resolves gratefully to return it. If a Pharisee give alms in pride, though God will not reward it, yet he that receives the alms, ought to return thanks for it: God knows the heart, but we do not. 2. The particular instance of respect, was, sending an embassy to condole with him on his father's death, as is common among princes in alliance with each other. David sent to comfort him. Note, It is a comfort to children, when their parents are dead, to find that their parents' friends are theirs, and that they intend to keep up acquaintance with them. It is a comfort to mourners, to find that there are those who mourn with them, are sensible of their loss, and share with them in it. It is a comfort to those who are honouring the memory of their deceased relations, to find there are others who likewise honour it, and had a value for those they valued.

II. The great affront which Hanun the king of the Ammonites put upon David in his ambassadors. 1. He hearkened to the spiteful suggestions of his princes, who insinuated that David's ambassadors, under pretence of being comforters, were sent as spies, v. 3. False men are ready to think others as false as themselves; and they that bear ill-will to their neighbours, are resolved not to believe that their neighbours bear any good-will to them. They would not thus have imagined that David dissembled, but that they were conscious to themselves that they could have dissembled, to serve a turn. Ill-founded suspicion argues a bad mind. Bishop Patrick's note on this, is, that there is nothing so well meant, but it may be ill-interpreted, and is wont to be so by men who love nobody but themselves. Men of the greatest honour and virtue must not think it strange if they be thus misrepresented. Charity thinketh no evil. 2. Entertaining this vile suggestion, he basely abused David's ambassadors, like a man of a sordid villainous spirit, that was fitter to rake a kennel than to wear a crown. If he had any reason to suspect that David's messengers came on a bad design, he had done prudently enough to be upon the reserve with them, and to dismiss them as soon as he could; but it is plain he only sought an occasion to put the utmost disgrace he could upon them, out of an antipathy to their king and country. They were themselves men of honour, and much more so, as they represented the prince that sent them; they and their reputation were under the special protection of the law of nations; they put a confidence in the Ammonites, and came among them unarmed; yet Hanun used them like rogues and vagabonds, and worse; shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in the midst, to expose them to the contempt and ridicule of his servants, that they might make sport with them, and that they might seem vile.

III. David's tender concern for his servants that were thus abused. He sent to meet them, and to let them know how much he interested himself in their quarrel, and how soon he would avenge it, and directed them to stay at Jericho, a private place, where they would not have occasion to come into company, till that half of their beards, which was shaved off, was grown to such a length that the other half might be decently cut to it, v. 5. The Jews wore their beards long, reckoning it an honour to appear aged and grave; and therefore it was not fit that persons of their rank and figure should appear at court unlike their neighbours. Change of raiment, it is likely, they had with them, to put on, instead of those which were cut off; but the loss of their beards would not be so soon repaired; yet, in time, those would grow again, and all would be well. Let us learn not to lay too much to heart unjust reproaches; after a while, they will wear off of themselves, and turn only to the shame of their authors, while the injured reputation in a little time grows again, as these beards did. God will bring forth thy righteousness as the light, therefore wait patiently for him, Ps. 37. 6, 7.

Some have thought that David, in the indignity he received from the king of Ammon, was but well enough served for courting and complimenting that pagan prince, whom he knew to be an inveterate enemy to Israel, and might now remember how, when he would have put out the right eye of the men of Jabesh-gilead, he designed that, as he did this, for a reproach upon all Israel, 1 Sam. 11. 2. What better usage could he expect from such a spiteful family and people? Why should he covet the friendship of a people, which Israel must have so little to do with, as that an Ammonite might not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation, Deut. 23. 3.

6. And when the children of Ammon saw that they stank before David, the children of Ammon sent and hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob, and the Syrians of Zoba, twenty thousand footmen, and of king Maacah a thousand men, and of Ish-tob twelve thousand men. 7. And when David heard of it, he sent Joab, and all the host of the mighty men. 8. And the children of Ammon came out, and put the battle in array at the entering in of the gate: and the Syrians of Zoba, and of Rehob, and Ish-tob, and Maacah, were by themselves in the field. 9. When Joab saw that the front of the battle was against him before and behind, he chose of all the choice men of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians: 10. And the rest of the people he delivered into the hand of Abishai his brother, that he might put them in array against the children of Ammon. 11. And he said, If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me; but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will come and help thee. 12. Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God: and the LORD do that which seemeth him good. 13. And Joab drew nigh, and the people that were with him, unto the battle against the Syrians: and they fled before him. 14. And when the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled, then fled they also before Abishai, and entered into the city. So Joab returned from the children of Ammon, and came to Jerusalem.

Here is,

I. The preparation which the Ammonites make for war, v. 6. They saw they had made themselves very odious to David, and obnoxious to his just displeasure; this they might easily foresee, when they abused his ambassadors, which was no other than a challenge to war, and a bold defiance of him. Yet, it seems, they had not considered how unable they were, with their thousands, to meet his; for, now they found themselves an unequal match, and were forced to hire forces of other nations into their service. Thus sinners daringly provoke God, and expose themselves to his wrath; and never consider that he is stronger than they, 1 Cor. 10. 22. The Ammonites gave the affront first, and they were the first that raised forces to justify it. Had they humbled themselves, and begged David's pardon, probably an honorary satisfaction might have atoned for the offence. But when they were thus desperately resolved to stand by what they had done, they courted their own ruin.

II. The speedy descent which David's forces made upon them, v. 7. When David heard of their military preparations, he sent Joab with a great army to attack them, v. 7. They that are in war with the Son of David, not only give the provocation, but begin the war; for he wants to be gracious, but they strengthen themselves against him, and therefore, if they turn not, he will whet his sword, Ps. 7. 12. God has forces to send against those that set his wrath at defiance, (Isa. 5. 19.) which will convince them, when it is too late, that none ever hardened his heart against God and prospered. It was David's prudence to carry the war into their own country, and fight them at the entering in of the gate of their capital city, Rabbah, as some think, or Medeba, a city in their borders, before which they pitched to guard their coast, 1 Chron. 19. 7. Such are the terrors and desolations of war, that every good prince will, in love to his people, keep it, as much as may be, at a distance from them.

III. Preparations made on both sides for an engagement. 1. The enemy disposed themselves into two bodies, one of Ammonites, which, being their own, were posted at the gate of the city; the other of Syrians, whom they had taken into their pay, and who were therefore posted at a distance in the field, to charge the forces of Israel in the flank or rear, while the Ammonites charged them in the front, v. 8. 2. Joab, like a wise general, was soon aware of the design, and accordingly divided his forces: the choicest men he took under his own command, to fight the Syrians, whom, probably, he knew to be the better soldiers, and, being hired men, better versed in the art of war, v. 9. The rest of the forces he put under the command of Abishai his brother, to engage the Ammonites, v. 10. It should seem, Joab found the enemy so well prepared to receive them, that his conduct and courage were never so tried as now.

IV. Joab's speech before the battle, v. 11, 12. It is not long, but pertinent and brave. 1. He prudently concerns the matter with Abishai his brother, that the dividing of the forces might not be the weakening of them; but that, which part soever was borne hard upon, the other should come in to its assistance. He supposes the worst, that one of them should be obliged to give back; and, in that case, upon a signal given, the other should send a detachment to relieve it. Note, Mutual helpfulness is brotherly duty. If occasion be, thou shalt help me, and I will help thee. Christ's soldiers should thus strengthen one another's hands in their spiritual warfare. The strong must succour and help the weak. They that through grace are conquerors over temptation, must counsel, and comfort, and pray for, those that are tempted: When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren, Luke 22. 32. The members of the natural body help one another, 1 Cor. 12. 21. 2. He bravely encourages himself, and his brother, and the rest of the officers and soldiers, to do their utmost. Great dangers put an edge upon true courage. When Joab saw the front of the battle was against him, both before and behind, instead of giving orders to make an honourable retreat, he animates his men to charge so much the more furiously; Be of good courage, and let us play the men, not for pay and preferment, for honour and fame, but for our people, and the cities of our God; for the public safety and welfare, in which the glory of God is so much interested. God and our country, was the word. "Let us be valiant, from a principle of love to Israel, that are our people, descended from the same stock, for whom we are employed, and in whose peace we shall have peace; and from a principle of love to God, for they are his cities that we are fighting in the defence of." The relation which any person or thing stands in to God, should endear it to us, and engage us to do our utmost in its service. 3. He piously leaves the issue with God: "When we have done our part, according to the duty of our place, let the Lord do that which seemeth him good." Let nothing be wanting in us, whatever the success be; let God's work be done by us, and then God's will be done concerning us. When we make conscience of doing our duty, we may, with the greatest satisfaction, leave the event with God; not thinking that our valour bids him to prosper us, but that still he may do as he pleases, yet hoping for his salvation in his own way and time.

V. The victory Joab obtained over the confederate forces of Syria and Ammon, v. 13, 14. He provided for the worst, and put the case that the Syrians or Ammonites might prove too strong for him; (v. 11.) but he proved too strong for them both. We do not hinder our success by preparing for disappointment. The Syrians were first routed by Joab, and then the Ammonites by Abishai; the latter seem not to have fought at all, but, upon the retreat of the Syrians, to have fled into the city. It is a temptation to soldiers to fly, when they have a city at their backs to fly to. It is one thing when men may either fight or fly, and another thing when they must either fight or die.

15. And when the Syrians saw that they were smitten before Israel, they gathered themselves together. 16. And Hadarzer sent, and brought out the Syrians that were beyond the river: and they came to Helam; and Shobach, the captain of the host of Hadarezer, went before them. 17. And when it was told David, he gathered all Israel together, and passed over Jordan, and came to Helam. And the Syrians set themselves in array against David, and fought with him. 18. And the Syrians fled before Israel; and David slew the men of seven hundred chariots of the Syrians, and forty thousand horsemen, and smote Shobach the captain of their host, who died there. 19. And when all the kings that were servants to Hadarezer saw that they were smitten before Israel, they made peace with Israel, and served them. So the Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon any more.

Here is,

I. A new attempt of the Syrians to recover their lost honour, and to check the progress of David's victorious arms. The forces that were lately dispersed, rallied again, and gathered themselves together, v. 15. Even the baffled cause will make head as long as there is any life in it; the enemies of the Son of David do so, Matth. 22. 34. Rev. 19. 19. These, being conscious of their insufficiency, called in the aid of their allies and dependencies on the other side the river, (v. 16.) and, being thus recruited, they hoped to make their part good against Israel; but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, for he gathered them as sheaves into the floor; see Mic. 4. 11-13.

The defeat of this attempt by the vigilance and valour of David, who, upon notice of their design, resolved not to stay till they attacked him, but went in person at the head of his army over Jordan, (v. 17.) and in a pitched battle routed the Syrians; (v. 18.) slew 7000 men, who belonged to 700 chariots, and 40,000 other soldiers, horse and foot, as appears by comparing 1 Chron. 19. 18. Their general was killed in the battle, and David came home in triumph, no doubt.

3. The consequence of this victory over the Syrians. (1.) David gained several tributaries, v. 19. The kings, or petty princes, that had been subject to Hadarezer, when they saw how powerful David was, very wisely made peace with Israel, whom they found they could not make war with, and served them who were able to give them protection. Thus the promise made to Abraham, (Gen. 15. 18.) and repeated to Joshua, (ch. 1. 4.) that the borders of Israel should extend to the river Euphrates, was performed at length. (2.) The Ammonites lost their old allies. The Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon, not because they had an unrighteous cause, (justifying a crime which was a breach of the law of nations,) but because they found it was an unsuccessful cause. It is dangerous helping those that have God against them; for when they fall, their helpers will fall with them.

Jesus Christ, the son of David, sent his ambassadors, his apostles and ministers, after all his servants the prophets; to the Jewish Church and nation; but they treated them shamefully, as Hanun did David's ambassadors; mocked them, abused them, slew them: and this was it that filled the measure of their iniquity, and brought upon them ruin without remedy; (Matth. 21. 35, 41.—22. 7. compare 2 Chron. 36. 16.) for Christ takes the affronts and injuries done to his ministers, as done to himself, and will avenge them accordingly.

CHAP. XI.

What David said of the mournful report of Saul's death, may more fitly be applied to the sad story of this chapter, the adultery and murder David was guilty of—Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon. We wish we could draw a veil over it, and that it might never be known, might never be said, that David did such things as are here recorded of him; but it cannot, it must not, be concealed: the scripture is faithful in relating the faults even of those whom it most applauds, which is an instance of the sincerity of the penmen, and an evidence that it was not written to serve any party; and even such stories as these were written for our learning, that he that thinks he stands, may take heed lest he fall; and that others' harms may be our warnings. Many, no doubt, have been emboldened to sin, and hardened in it, by this story, and to them it is a savour of death unto death; but many have by it been awakened to a holy jealousy over themselves, and constant watchfulness against sin, and to them it is a savour of life unto life. They are very great sins, and greatly aggravated, which here we find David guilty of. I. He committed adultery with Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah, v. 1-5. II. He endeavoured to father the spurious brood upon Uriah, v. 6-13. III. When that project failed, he plotted the death of Uriah by the sword of the children of Ammon, and effected it, v. 14-25. IV. He married Bath-sheba, v. 26, 27. Is this David? Is this the man after God's own heart? How is his behaviour changed, worse than it was before Abimelech! How is this gold become dim? Let him that readeth, understand what the best of men are, when God leaves them to themselves.

1. AND it came to pass, after the year was expired, at the time when kings go forth to battle, that David sent Joab, and his servants with him, and all Israel; and they destroyed the children of Ammon, and besieged Rabbah. But David tarried still at Jerusalem. 2. And it came to pass in an evening-tide, that David arose from off his bed, and walked upon the roof of the king's house: and from the roof he saw a woman washing herself; and the woman was very beautiful to look upon. 3. And David sent and inquired after the woman. And one said, Is not this Bath-sheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite? 4. And David sent messengers, and took her: and she came in unto him, and he lay with her, (for she was purified from her uncleanness,) and she returned unto her house. 5. And the woman conceived, and sent and told David, and said, I am with child.

Here is,

I. David's glory in pursuing the war against the Ammonites, v. 1. We cannot take that pleasure in viewing this great action, which hitherto we have taken in observing David's achievements, because the beauty of it was stained and sullied by sin; otherwise we might take notice of David's wisdom and bravery in following his blow. Having routed the army of the Ammonites in the field, as soon as ever the season of the year permitted, he sent more forces to waste the country, and further to avenge the quarrel of his ambassadors. Rabbah, their metropolis, made a stand, and held out a great while; that city Joab laid close siege to, and it was at the time of that siege, that David fell into this sin.

II. David's shame, in being himself conquered and led captive, by his own lust. The sin he was guilty of, was adultery, against the letter of the seventh commandment, and (in the judgment of the patriarchal age) a heinous crime, and an iniquity to be punished by the judges; (Job 31. 11.) a sin which takes away the heart, and gets a man a wound and dishonour, more than any other, and the reproach of it is not wiped away.

1. Observe the occasions of this sin, which led to it.

(1.) Neglect of his business. When he should have been abroad with his army in the field, fighting the battles of the Lord, he devolved the care upon others, and he himself tarried still at Jerusalem, v. 1. To the war with the Syrians David went in person, ch. 10. 17. Had he been now at his post at the head of his forces, he had been out of the way of this temptation. When we are out of the way of our duty, we are in temptation.

(2.) Love of ease, and the indulgence of a slothful temper. He came off his bed at evening-tide; (v. 2.) there he had dozed away the afternoon in idleness, which he should have spent in some exercise, for his own improvement, or the good of others. He used to pray, not only morning and evening, but at noon, in the day of his trouble: it is to be feared he had, this noon, omitted it. Idleness gives great advantage to the tempter. Standing waters gather filth. The bed of sloth oft proves the bed of lust.

(3.) A wandering eye. He saw a woman washing herself, probably from some ceremonial pollution, according to the law. This sin came in at the eye, as Eve's did. Perhaps, he sought to see her; at least, he did not practice according to his own prayer. Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity; and his son's caution in a like case, Look not thou on the wine when it is red. Either he had not, like Job, made a covenant with his eyes, or, at this time, he had forgotten it.

2. The steps of the sin. When he saw her, lust immediately conceived, and, (1.) He inquired who she was, (v. 3.) perhaps, intending only, if she were unmarried, to take her to wife, as he had taken several; but if she were a wife, having no design upon her. (2.) The corrupt desire growing more violent; though he was told she was a wife, and whose wife she was, yet he sent messengers for her, and then, it may be, intended only to please himself with her company and conversation. But, (3.) When she came, he lay with her, she too easily consenting, because he was a great man, and famed for his goodness too; surely (thinks she) that can be no sin, which such a man as David is the mover of. See how the way of sin is down-hill; when men begin to do evil, they cannot soon stop themselves. The beginning of lust, as of strife is like the letting forth of water; it is therefore wisdom to leave it off before it be meddled with. The foolish fly fires her wings, and fools away her life, at last, by playing about the candle.

3. The aggravations of the sin. (1.) He was now in years, fifty at least, some think more, when those lusts, which are more properly youthful, one would think, should not have been violent in him. (2.) He had many wives and concubines of his own; this is insisted on, ch. 12. 8. (3.) Uriah, whom he wronged, was one of his own worthies; a person of honour and virtue, one that was now abroad in his service, jeopardizing his life in the high places of the field, for the honour and safety of him and his kingdom, where he himself should have been. (4.) Bath-sheba, whom he debauched, was a lady of good reputation, and, till she was drawn by him and his influence into this wickedness, no doubt, had preserved her purity: little did she think that ever she could have done so bad a thing, as to forsake the guide of her youth, and forget the covenant of her

God; nor perhaps could any one in the world, but David, have prevailed against her. The adulterer not only wrongs and ruins his own soul, but as much as he can, another's soul too. (5.) David was a king, whom God had intrusted with the sword of justice, and the execution of the law upon other criminals, particularly upon adulterers, who were, by the law, to be put to death; for him therefore to be guilty of those crimes himself, was to make himself a pattern, when he should have been a terror, to evil doers. With what face could he rebuke or punish that in others, which he was conscious to himself of being guilty of? See Rom. 2. 22.

Much more might be said to aggravate the sin; and I can think but of one excuse for it, which is, that it was done but once, it was far from being his practice; it was by the surprise of a temptation, that he was drawn into it. He was none of those, of whom the prophet complains, that they were as fed horses, neighing every one after his neighbour's wife; (Jer. 5. 8.) but, this once, God left him to himself, as he did Hezekiah, that he might know what was in his heart, 2 Chron. 32. 31. Had he been told of it before, he would have said, as Hazeel, What! is thy servant a dog? But by this instance we are taught, what need we have to pray every day, Father, in heaven, lead us not into temptation, and to watch, that we enter not into it.

6. And David sent to Joab, saying, Send me Uriah the Hittite. And Joab sent Uriah to David. 7. And when Uriah was come unto him, David demanded of him how Joab did, and how the people did, and how the war prospered. 8. And David said to Uriah, Go down to thy house, and wash thy feet. And Uriah departed out of the king's house, and there followed him a mess of meat from the king. 9. But Uriah slept at the door of the king's house, with all the servants of his lord, and went not down to his house. 10. And when they had told David, saying, Uriah went not down unto his house, David said unto Uriah, Camest thou not from thy journey? why then didst thou not go down unto thine house? 11. And Uriah said unto David, The ark, and Israel, and Judah, abide in tents; and my lord Joab, and the servants of my lord, are encamped in the open fields: shall I then go into mine house, to eat, and to drink, and to lie with my wife? as thou livest, and as thy soul liveth, I will not do this thing. 12. And David said to Uriah, Tarry here to-day also, and to-morrow I will let thee depart. So Uriah abode in Jerusalem that day and the morrow. 13. And when David had called him, he did eat and drink before him; and he made him drunk: and at even he went out to lie on his bed with the servants of his lord, but went not down to his house.

Uriah, we may suppose, had now been absent from his wife for some weeks, making the campaign in the country of the Ammonites, and not intending to return till the end of it: the situation of his wife would bring to light the hidden works of darkness; and when Uriah, at his return, should find how he had been abused, and by whom, it might well be expected, 1. That he would prosecute his wife, according to law, and have her stoned to death; for jealousy is the rage of a man, especially a man of honour; and he that is thus injured, will not spare in the day of vengeance, Prov. 6. 34.

This Bath-sheba was apprehensive of, when she sent to let David know she was with child, intimating that he was concerned to protect her, which, it is likely, if he had not promised her so to do, (so wretchedly abusing his royal power,) she would not have consented to him. Hope of impunity is a great encouragement to iniquity. 2. It might also be expected that since he could not prosecute David by law for an offence of this nature, he would take his revenge another way, and raise a rebellion against him. There have been instances of kings, who, by provocations of this nature, given to some of their powerful subjects, have lost their crowns.

To prevent this double mischief, David endeavours to father the child which should be born, upon Uriah himself, and therefore sends for him home, to stay a night or two in his own house. Observe,

I. How the plot was laid. Uriah must come home from the army, under pretence of bringing David an account how the war prospered, and how they went on with the siege of Rabbah, v. 7. Thus does he pretend a more than ordinary concern for his army, when that was, at present, the least thing in his thoughts; if he had not another turn to serve, an express, of much less figure than Uriah, might have sufficed to bring him a report of the state of the war. David, having had as much conference with Uriah as he thought requisite to cover the design, sent him to his house, and, that he might be the more pleasant there, sent a dish of meat for the entertainment of himself and his wife, v. 8. When that project failed the first night, and Uriah, being weary of his journey, and more desirous of sleep than meat, lay all night in the guard-chamber, the next night, he made him drunk, (v. 13.) or made him merry; tempted him to drink more than was fit, that he might forget his vow, (v. 11.) and might be disposed to go home to his own bed; to which, perhaps, if David could have made him dead drunk, he would have ordered him to be carried. It is a very wicked thing, upon any design whatsoever, to make a person drunk; Woe to him that doth so, Hab. 2. 15, 16. God will put into their hands a cup of trembling, who put into the hands of others the cup of drunkenness. Robbing a man of his reason, is worse than robbing him of his money; and drawing him into sin, worse than drawing him into any trouble whatsoever. Every good man, especially every magistrate, should endeavour to prevent this sin, by admonishing, restraining, and denying the glass to those whom they see falling into excess; but to further it, is to do the Devil's work, to officiate as factor for him.

II. How this plot was defeated by Uriah's firm resolution not to lie in his own bed: both nights, he slept with the life-guard, and went not down to his house, though, it is probable, his wife pressed him to do it as much as David, v. 9, 12. Now, 1. Some think he suspected what was done, being informed of his wife's attendance at court, and therefore he would not go near her. But if he had had any suspicion of that kind, surely he would have opened the letter that David sent by him to Joab. 2. Whether he suspected any thing or no, Providence put this resolution into his heart, and kept him to it, for the discovering of David's sin, and that the baffling of his design to conceal it might awaken David's conscience to confess it, and repent of it. 3. The reason he gave to David of this strange instance of self-denial and mortification, was very brave, v. 11. That while the army was encamped in the field, he would not lie at ease in his own house. The ark is in a tent, whether at home, in the tent David had pitched for it, or abroad, with Joab in the camp, is not certain. "Joab, and all the mighty men of Israel, lie hard and uneasy, and much exposed to the weather, and to the enemy; and shall I go take my ease and pleasure at my own house?" No, he protests he will not do it. Now, (1.) This was in itself a generous resolution, and shows Uriah to be a man of a public spirit, bold and hardy, and mortified to the delights of sense. In times of public difficulty and danger, it does not become us to repose ourselves in security, or roll ourselves in pleasure; or, with the king and Haman, to sit down to drink, when the city Shushan was perplexed, Esth. 3. 15. We should voluntarily endure hardness, when the church of God is constrained to endure it. (2.) It might have been of use to awaken David's conscience, and make his heart to smite him for what he had done. [1.] That he had basely abused so brave a man as Uriah was, a man so heartily concerned for him and his kingdom, and that acted for him and it with so much vigour. [2.] That he was himself so much unlike him. The consideration of the public hardships and hazards kept Uriah from lawful pleasures, yet could not keep David, though more nearly interested, from unlawful ones. Uriah's severity to himself should have shamed David for his indulgence of himself. The law was, When the host goeth forth against the enemy, then, in a special manner, keep thyself from every wicked thing, Deut. 23. 9. Uriah outdid that law, but David violated it.

14. And it came to pass in the morning, that David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah. 15. And he wrote in the letter, saying, Set ye Uriah in the fore-front of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten, and die. 16. And it came to pass, when Joab observed the city, that he assigned Uriah unto a place where he knew that valiant men were. 17. And the men of the city went out and fought with Joab: and there fell some of the people of the servants of David; and Uriah the Hittite died also. 18. Then Joab sent and told David all the things concerning the war; 19. And charged the messenger, saying, When thou hast made an end of telling the matters of the war unto the king, 20. And if so be that the king's wrath arise, and he say unto thee, Wherefore approached ye so nigh unto the city when ye did fight? knew ye not that they would shoot from the wall? 21. Who smote Abimelech the son of Jerubbesheth? did not a woman cast a piece of a millstone upon him from the wall, that he died in Thebez? why went ye nigh the wall? then say thou, Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also. 22. So the messenger went, and came and showed David all that Joab had sent him for. 23. And the messenger said unto David, Surely the men prevailed against us, and came out unto us into the field, and we were upon them even unto the entering of the gate. 24. And the shooters shot from off the wall upon thy servants, and some of the king's servants be dead, and thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also. 25. Then David said unto the messenger, Thus shalt thou say unto Joab, Let not this thing displease thee; for the sword devoureth one as well as another: make thy battle more strong against the city, and overthrow it; and encourage thou him. 26. And when the wife of Uriah heard that Uriah her husband was dead, she mourned for her husband. 27. And when the mourning was past, David sent and fetched her to his house, and she became his wife, and bare him a son. But the thing that David had done displeased the LORD.

When David's project of fathering the child upon Uriah himself failed, so that, in process of time, Uriah would certainly know the wrong that had been done him; to prevent the fruits of his revenge, the Devil puts it into David's heart to take him off, and then neither he nor Bath-sheba would be in any danger; what prosecution could there be, when there was no prosecutor? And suggesting further, that when he was out of the way, Bath-sheba might, if he pleased, be his own for ever. Adulteries have often occasioned murders, and one wickedness must be covered and secured with another. The beginnings of sin are therefore to be dreaded; for who knows where they will end?

It is resolved, in David's breast, (which one would think could never possibly have harboured so vile a thought,) that Uriah must die; that innocent, valiant, gallant man, who was ready to die for his prince's honour, must die by his prince's hand. David has sinned, and Bath-sheba has sinned, and both against him, and therefore he must die; David determines he must. Is this the man whose heart smote him, because he had cut off Saul's skirt? Quantum mutatus ab illo!—But ah, how changed! Is this he that executed judgment and justice to all his people? How can he now do so unjust a thing? See how fleshly lusts war against the soul, and what devastations they make in that war: how they blind the eyes, harden the heart, sear the conscience, and deprive men of all sense of honour and justice. Who so committeth adultery with a woman, lacketh understanding, and quite loses it; he that doth it, destroys his own soul, Pro. 6. 32.

But as the eye of the adulterer, so the hand of the murderer, seeks concealment, Job 24. 14, 15. Works of darkness hate the light. When David bravely slew Goliath, it was done publicly, and he gloried in it; but when he basely slew Uriah, it must be done clandestinely, for he is ashamed of it, and well he may. Who would do a thing that he dared not own? The Devil having, as a poisonous serpent, put it into David's heart to murder Uriah, as a subtle serpent, he puts it into his head how to do it. Not as Absalom slew Amnon, by commanding his servants to assassinate him, or as Ahab slew Naboth, by suborning witnesses to accuse him, but by exposing him to the enemy; a way of doing it, which, perhaps, would not seem so odious to conscience and the world, because soldiers expose themselves, of course: if Uriah had not been in that dangerous post, another must; he has (as we say) a chance for his life; if he fight stoutly, he may, perhaps, come off; and if he die, it is in the field of honour, where a soldier would choose to die; and yet all this will not save it from being a wilful murder, of malice prepense.

I. Orders are sent to Joab to set Uriah in the front of the hottest battle, and then to desert him, and abandon him to the enemy, v. 14, 15. This was David's project to take off Uriah, and it succeeded, as he designed. Many were the aggravations of this murder. 1. It was deliberate. He took time to consider of it; and though he had time to consider of it, for he wrote a letter about it, and though he had time to have countermanded the order afterward, before it could be put in execution, yet he did not do it. 2. He sent the letter by Uriah himself; than which nothing could be more base and barbarous, to make him accessory to his own death. And what a paradox was it, that he could bear such a malice against him, in whom yet he could repose such a confidence, as that he would carry letters, which he must not know the purport of. 3. Advantage must be taken of Uriah's own courage and zeal for his king and country, which deserves the greatest praise and recompense, to betray him the more easily to his fate. If he had not been forward to expose himself, perhaps he was a man of such importance, that Joab could not have exposed him; and that his noble fire should be designedly turned upon himself, was a most detestable instance of ingratitude. 4. Many must be involved in the guilt; Joab, the general, to whom the blood of his soldiers, especially the worthies, ought to be precious, must do it; he, and all that retire from Uriah, when they ought in conscience to support and second him, become guilty of his death. 5. Uriah cannot thus die alone, the party he commands is in danger of being cut off with him; and it proved so, some of the people, even the servants of David, (so they are called, to aggravate David's sin, in being so prodigal of their lives,) fell with him, v. 17. Nay, this wilful misconduct by which Uriah must be betrayed, might be of fatal consequence to the whole army, and, having obliged them to raise the siege, 6. It will be the triumph and joy of the Ammonites, the sworn enemies of God and Israel; it will gratify them exceedingly. David prayed for himself, that he might not fall into the hands of man, nor flee from his enemies, (ch. 24. 13, 14.) yet he sells his servant Uriah to the Ammonites, and not for any iniquity in his hand.

II. Joab executes these orders. In the next assault that was made upon the city, Uriah has the most dangerous post assigned him; is encouraged to hope, that if he be repulsed by the besieged, he shall be relieved by Joab, in dependence on which, he marches on with resolution, but, succours not coming on, the service proved too hot, and he was slain in it, v. 16, 17. It was strange that Joab would do such a thing merely upon a letter, without knowing the reason. But, 1. Perhaps he supposed Uriah had been guilty of some great crime, to inquire into which, David had sent for him, and that, because he would not punish him openly, he took this course with him to put him to death. 2. Joab had been guilty of blood, and we may suppose it pleased him very well, to see David himself falling into the same guilt, and he was willing enough to serve him in it, that he might continue to be favourable to him. It is common for those who have done ill themselves, to desire to be countenanced therein by others doing ill likewise, especially by the sins of those that are eminent in the profession of religion. Or, perhaps, David knew that Joab had a pique against Uriah, and would gladly be avenged on him; otherwise Joab, when he saw cause, knew how to dispute the king's orders, as ch. 24. 3.—19. 5.

III. He sends an account of it to David. An express is despatched away immediately, with a report of this last disgrace and loss which they had sustained, v. 18. And, to disguise the affair, 1. He supposes that David would appear to be angry at his bad conduct, would ask why they came so near the wall, v. 20. Did they not know that Abimelech lost his life by doing so? v. 21. We had the story, Judg. 9. 53. which book, it is likely, was published as a part of the sacred history in Samuel's time: and (be it noted to their praise, and for imitation) even the soldiers were conversant with their Bibles, and could readily quote the scripture-story, and make use of it for admonition to themselves, not to run upon the same attempts which there they found to be fatal. 2. He slyly orders the messenger to soothe it with telling him that Uriah the Hittite was dead also, which gave too broad an intimation to the messenger, and by him to others, that David would be secretly pleased to hear that: for murder will out. And when men do such base things, they must expect to be bantered and upbraided with them, even by their inferiors. The messenger delivered his message agreeably to orders, v. 22. . 24. He makes the besieged to sally out first upon the besiegers, They came out unto us, into the field: represents the besiegers as doing their parts with great bravery, We were upon them, even to the entering of the gate, we forced them to retire into the city with precipitation; and so concludes with a slight mention of the slaughter made among them by some shot from the wall, Some of the king's servants are dead; and particularly Uriah the Hittite, an officer of note, stood first in the list of the slain.

IV. David receives the account with a secret satisfaction, v. 25. Let not Joab be displeased, for David is not; he blames not his conduct, nor thinks they did ill, in approaching so near the wall; all is well, now that Uriah is got out of the way. This point being gained, he can make light of the loss, and turn it off easily with an excuse, The sword devours one as well as another; it was a chance of war, nothing more common. He orders Joab to make the battle more strong next time, while he, by his sin, was weakening it, and provoking God to blast the undertaking.

Lastly, He married the widow, in a little time. She submitted to the ceremony of mourning for her husband, as little time as custom would admit, (v. 26.) and then David took her to his house as his wife, and she bare him a son. Uriah's revenge was prevented by his death, but the birth of the child, so soon after the marriage, published the crime; sin will have shame; yet that was not the worst of it, The thing that David had done, displeased the Lord; the whole matter of Uriah, (as it is called, 1 Kings 15. 5.) the adultery, falsehood, murder, and this marriage, at last, it was all displeasing to the Lord. He had pleased himself, but displeased God. Note, God sees and hates sin in his own people. Nay, the nearer any are to God in profession, the more displeasing to him their sins are; for in them there is more ingratitude, treachery, and reproach, than in the sins of others. Let none therefore encourage themselves in sin by the example of David; for they that sin as he did, will fall under the displeasure of God as he did. Let us therefore stand in awe, and sin not; not sin after the similitude of his transgression.

CHAP. XII.

The foregoing chapter gave us the account of David's sin, this of his repentance; though he fell, he was not utterly cast down, but by the grace of God, recovered himself, and found mercy with God. Here is, I. His conviction, by a message Nathan brought him from God, which was a parable that obliged him to condemn himself, v. 1. . 6. And the interpretation of the parable, in which Nathan charged him with the sin, (v. 7. . 9.) and pronounced sentence upon him, v. 10. . 12. II. His repentance and remission, with a reserve of judgment, v. 13, 14. III. The sickness and death of the child, and his behaviour, while it was sick, and when it was dead; (v. 15. . 23.) in both which, David gave evidences of his repentance. IV. The birth of Solomon, and God's gracious message concerning him, in which God gave an evidence of his reconciliation to David, v. 24, 25. V. The taking of Rabbah, (v. 26. . 31.) which is mentioned as a further instance, that God did not deal with David according to his sins.

1. AND the LORD sent Nathan unto David. And he came unto him, and said unto him, There were two men in one city; the one rich, and the other poor. 2. The rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds: 3. But the poor man had no thing save one little ewe lamb, which he had bought and nourished up; and it grew up together with him, and with his children: it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter. 4. And there came a traveller unto the rich man; and he spared to take of his own flock, and of his own herd, to dress for the wayfaring man that was come unto him; but took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the man that was come to him. 5. And David's anger was greatly kindled against the man; and he said to Nathan, As the LORD liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die: 6. And he shall restore the lamb fourfold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity. 7. And Nathan said to David, Thou art the man. Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, I anointed thee king over Israel, and I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul: 8. And I gave thee thy master's house, and thy master's wives into thy bosom, and gave thee the house of Israel and of Judah; and if that had been too little, I would, moreover, have given unto thee such and such things. 9. Wherefore hast thou despised the commandment of the LORD, to do evil in his sight? Thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon. 10. Now therefore, the sword shall never depart from thine house; because thou hast despised me, and hast taken the wife of Uriah the Hittite to be thy wife. 11. Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of this sun. 12. For thou didst it secretly: but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun. 13. And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the LORD. And Nathan said unto David, The LORD also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die. 14. Howbeit, because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the LORD to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die.

It seems to have been a great while after David had been guilty of adultery with Bath-sheba, before he was brought to repentance for it. For, when Nathan was sent to him, the child was born, v. 14. So that it was about nine months that David lay under the guilt of that sin, and, for aught that appears, unrepented of. What shall we think of David's state all this while? Can we imagine his heart never smote him for it? Or that he never repented it in secret before God? I would willingly hope that he did, and that Nathan was sent to him, immediately upon the birth of the child, when the thing by that means came to be publicly known and talked of, to draw from him an open confession of the sin, to the glory of God, the admonition of others, and that he might receive, by Nathan, absolution with certain limitations. But during these nine months, we may well suppose his comforts and the exercises of his graces suspended, and his communion with God interrupted; during all that time, for certain, he penned no Psalms, his harp was out of tune, and his soul like a tree in winter, that has life in the root only; therefore, after Nathan had been with him, he prays, Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and open thou my lips, Ps. 51. 12, 15. Let us observe,

I. The messenger God sent to him. We were told, by the last words of the foregoing chapter, that the thing David had done, displeased the Lord, upon which, one would think, it should have followed that the Lord sent enemies to invade him, terrors to take hold of him, and the messenger of death to arrest him. No, he sent a prophet to him, Nathan, his faithful friend and confidant, to instruct and counsel him, v. 1. David did not send for Nathan, (though he had never had so much occasion as he had now for his counsellor,) but God sent Nathan to David. Note, Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. He went on fearwardly in the way of his heart, and, if left to himself, would wander endlessly, but (saith God) I have seen his ways, and will heal him, Isa. 57. 17, 18. He sends after us before we seek after him, else we should certainly be lost. Nathan was the prophet by whom God had sent him notice of his kind intentions toward him, (ch. 7. 4.) and now, by the same hand, he sends him this message of wrath. God's word in the mouth of his ministers must be received, whether it speak terror or comfort. Nathan was obedient to the heavenly vision, and went on God's errand to David. He did not say, "David has sinned, I will not come near him;" no, Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother, 2 Thess. 3. 15. He did not say, "David is a king, I dare not reprove him;" no, if God send him, he sets his face like a flint, Isa. 50. 7.

II. The message Nathan delivered to him, in order to his conviction.

1. He fetched a compass with a parable, which seemed to David as a complaint made to him, by Nathan against one of his subjects that had wronged his poor neighbour, in order to his righting the injured, and punishing the injurious. Nathan, it is likely, used to come to him upon such errands, which made this the less suspected; it becomes those who have interest in princes, and have free access to them, to intercede for those that are wronged, that they may have right done them.

(1.) Nathan represented to David a notorious injury, which a rich man had done to an honest neighbour that was not able to contend with him. The rich man hath many flocks and herds, (v. 2.) the poor man had one only, so unequally is the world divided; and yet infinite wisdom, righteousness, and goodness make the distribution, that the rich may learn charity, and the poor contentment. This poor man had but one lamb, a ewe-lamb, a little ewe-lamb, having not wherewithal to buy or keep more. But it was a cade-lamb, (as we will call it) it grew up with his children, (v. 3.) he was fond of it, and it was familiar with him at all times. The rich man having occasion for a lamb to entertain a friend with, took the poor man's lamb from him by violence, and made use of that; (v. 4.) either out of covetousness, because he grudged to make use of his own, or rather out of luxury, because he fancied the lamb that was thus tenderly kept, and ate and drank like a child; must needs be more delicate food than any of his own, and have a better relish.

(2.) In this, he showed him the evil of the sin he had been guilty of, in defiling Bath-sheba. He had many wives and concubines, whom he kept at a distance, as rich men keep their flocks in their fields; had he had but one, and had she been dear to him, as the ewe-lamb was to its owner, had she been dear to him, as the loving hind and the pleasant roe; her breasts would have satisfied him at all times, and he would have looked no further, Prov. 5. 19. Marriage is a remedy against fornication, but marrying many is not; for when once the law of unity is transgressed, the indulged lust will hardly stint itself. Uriah, like the poor man, had only one wife, who was to him as his own soul, and always lay in his own bosom, for he had no other, he desired no other to lie there. The traveller or wayfaring man was, as Bishop Patrick explains it from the Jewish writers, evil imagination, disposition, or desire, which came into David's heart, which he might have satisfied with some of his own, yet nothing would serve but Uriah's darling. They observe that this evil disposition is called a traveller, for in the beginning it is only so, but, in time, it becomes a guest, and in conclusion, is master of the house. For he that is called a traveller, in the beginning of the verse, is called a man, (ish, a husband,) in the close of it. Yet some observe, that in David's breast, lust was but as a wayfaring man that tarries only for a night, 't did not constantly dwell and rule there.

(3.) By this parable, he drew from David a sentence against himself. For David, supposing it to be a case in fact, and not doubting the truth of it, when he had it from Nathan himself, gave judgment immediately against the offender, and confirmed it with an oath, v. 5, 6. [1.] That, for his injustice in taking away the lamb, he should restore four-fold, according to the law, (Exod. 22. 1.) Four sheep for a sheep. [2.] That for his tyranny and cruelty, and the pleasure he took in abusing a poor man, he should be put to death. If a poor man steal from a rich man, to satisfy his soul when he is hungry, he shall make restitution, though it cost him all the substance of his house, Prov. 6. 30, 31. and Solomon there compares the sin of adultery with that, v. 32. But if a rich man steal for stealing sake, not for want but wantonness, merely that he may be imperious and vexatious, he deserves to die for it; for to him restitution is no punishment, or next to none. If the sentence he thought too severe, it must be imputed to the present roughness of David's temper, being under guilt, and not having himself as yet received mercy.

2. He closed in with him, at length, in the application of the parable. In beginning with a parable, he showed his prudence; and great need is there of prudence in giving reproofs; it is well-managed if, as here, the offender can be brought, ere he is aware, to convict and condemn himself; but here, in his application, he shows his faithfulness, and deals as plainly and roundly with king David himself, as if he had been a common person. In plain terms, "Thou art the man, who hast done this wrong, and a much greater, to thy neighbour; and therefore, by thine own sentence, thou deservest to die, and shalt be judged out of thine own mouth. Did he deserve to die, who took his neighbour's lamb, and dost not thou, who hast taken thy neighbour's wife? Though he took the lamb, he did not cause the owner thereof to lose his life, as thou hast done, and therefore much more art thou worthy to die."

Now he speaks immediately from God, and, in his name, begins with, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, a name sacred and venerable to David, and which commanded his attention; Nathan now speaks, not as a petitioner for a poor man, but as an ambassador from the great God, with whom is no respect of persons.

(1.) God, by Nathan, reminds David of the great things he had done and designed for him, anointing him to be king, and preserving him to the kingdom; (v. 7.) giving him power over the house and household of his predecessor, and of others that had been his masters, Nabal for one: he had given him the house of Israel and Judah; the wealth of the kingdom was at his service; every body was willing to oblige him; and ready to bestow any thing upon him, to make him easy: I would have given thee such and such things, v. 8. See how liberal God is in his gifts; we are not straitened in him. Where he has given much, yet he gives more. And God's bounty to us is a great aggravation of our discontent, and desire of forbidden fruit. It is ungrateful to covet what God has prohibited, while we have liberty to pray for what God has promised, and that is enough.

(2.) He charges him with a high contempt of the divine authority, in the sins he had been guilty of. Wherefore hast thou (presuming upon thy royal dignity and power) despised the commandment of the Lord? v. 9. This is the spring, and this is the malignity, of sin, that it is making light of the divine law, and the Law-maker; as if the obligation of it were weak, the precepts of it trifling, and the threats not at all formidable. Though no man ever wrote more honourably of the law of God than David did, yet, in this instance, he is justly charged with a contempt of it. His adultery with Bath-sheba, which began the mischief, is not mentioned, perhaps, because he was already convinced of that, but, [1.] The murder of Uriah is twice mentioned. Thou hast killed Uriah with the sword; though not hy sword, yet the sword of the children of Ammon, by ordering him to be set in the forefront of the battle. They that contrive wickedness and command it, are as truly guilty of it as those that execute it. It is repeated, with an aggravation, Thou hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon, those uncircumcised enemies of God and Israel. [2.] The marrying of Bath-sheba is likewise twice mentioned, because he thought there was no harm in that; (v. 9.) Thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife; and again, v. 10. To marry her whom he had before defiled, and whose husband he had slain, was an affront upon the ordinance of marriage, making that not only to palliate, but in a manner to consecrate, such villanies. In all this, he despised the word of the Lord, so it is in the Hebrew, not only his commandment in general, which forbade such things, but the particular word of promise, which God had, by Nathan, sent to him some time before, that he would build him a house; which sacred promise, if he had had a due value and veneration for, he would not thus have polluted his house with lust and blood.

(3.) He threatens an entail of judgments upon his family for this sin; (v. 10.) "The sword shall never depart from thy house, not in thy time, nor afterwards but, for the most part, thou and thy posterity shall be engaged in war." Or, it points at the slaughters that should be among his children, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah, all falling by the sword. God had promised that his mercy should not depart from him and his house, (ch. 7. 15.) yet here threatens that the sword should not depart. Can the mercy and the sword consist with each other? Yes, those may lie under great and long afflictions, who yet shall not be excluded from the grace of the covenant. The reason given is, Because thou hast despised me. Note, Those who despise the word and law of God, despise God himself, and shall be lightly esteemed.

It is particularly threatened, [1.] That his children should be his grief; I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house. Sin brings trouble into a family, and one sin is often made the punishment of another. [2.] That his wives should be his shame; that by an unparalleled piece of villany they should be publicly debauched before all Israel, v. 11, 12. It is not said it should be done by his own son, lest the accomplishment should have been hindered by the prediction being too plain; but it was done by Absalom, at the counsel of Ahithophel; (ch. 16. 21, 22.) He that defiled his neighbour's wife, should have his own defiled, for thus that sin used to be punished, as appears by Job's imprecation, (Job 31. 10.) Then let my wife grind unto another, and that threatening, Hos. 4. 14. The sin was secret, and industriously concealed, but the punishment should be open and industriously proclaimed, to the shame of David, whose sin in the matter of Uriah, though committed many years before, would then be called to mind, and commonly talked of upon that occasion. As face answers to face in a glass, so does the punishment often answer to the sin; here is blood for blood, and uncleanness for uncleanness. And thus God would show how much he hates sin, even in his own people, and that, wherever he finds it, he will not let it go unpunished.

3. David's penitent confession of his sin, hereupon. He says not a word to excuse himself or extenuate his sin, but freely owns it, I have sinned against the Lord, v. 13. It is probable that he said more to this purport; but this is enough to show that he was truly humbled by what Nathan said, and submitted himself to the conviction. He owns his guilt, I have sinned; and aggravates it. It was against the Lord: on this string he harps in the Psalm he penned on this occasion; (Ps. 51. 4.) Against thee, thee only, have I sinned.

4. His pardon declared, upon this penitent confession, but with a reserve of judgment. When David said, I have sinned, and Nathan perceived that he was a true penitent, (1.) He did, in God's name, assure him that his sin was forgiven, "The Lord also has put away thy sin out of the sight of his avenging eye; thou shalt not die," that is, "not die eternally, nor be for ever put away from God, as thou wouldest have been, if he had not put away the sin." The obligation to punishment is hereby cancelled and vacated. He shall not come into condemnation; that is the nature of forgiveness. "Thy iniquity shall not be thy everlasting ruin. The sword shall not depart from thy house, but," [1.] "It shall not cut thee off, thou shalt come to thy grave in peace." David deserved to die as an adulterer and murderer, but God would not cut him off, as he might justly have done. [2.] "Though thou shalt all thy days be chastened of the Lord, yet thou shalt not be condemned with the world." See how ready God is to forgive sin. To this instance, perhaps, David refers, Ps. 32. 5, I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest. Let not great sinners despair of finding mercy with God, if they truly repent; for who is a God like unto him, pardoning iniquity? (2.) Yet he pronounces a sentence of death upon the child, v. 14. Behold the sovereignty of God! The guilty parent lives, and the guiltless infant dies; but all souls are his, and he may, in what way he pleases, glorify himself in his creatures. [1.] David had, by his sin, wronged God in his honour; he had given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme. The wicked people of that generation, the infidels, idolaters, and profane, would triumph in David's fall, and speak ill of God and of his law, when they saw one guilty of such foul enormities, that professed such an honour both for him and it. "These are your professors! This is he that prays and sings psalms, and is so very devout! What good can there be in such exercises, if they will not restrain men from adultery and murder?" They would say, "Was not Saul rejected for a less matter? Why then must David live and reign still?" Not considering that God sees not as man sees, but searches the heart. To this day, there are those who reproach God, and are hardened in sin, through the example of David. Now, though it is true that none have any just reason to speak ill of God, or of his word and ways, for David's sake, and it is their sin that do so, yet he shall be reckoned with, that laid the stumbling-block in their way, and gave, though not cause, yet colour for the reproach. Note, There is this great evil in the scandalous sins of those that profess religion, and relation to God, that they furnish the enemies of God and religion with matter for reproach and blasphemy, Rom. 2. 24. [2.] God will therefore vindicate his honour, by showing his displeasure against David for this sin, and letting the world see that though he loves David, he hates his sin; and he chooses to do it by the death of the child. The landlord may restrain on any part of the premises where he pleases. Perhaps, the diseases and deaths of infants were not so common in those days as they are now, which might make this, as an unusual thing, the more evident token of God's displeasure; according to the word he had often said, that he would visit the sins of the fathers upon the children.

15. And Nathan departed unto his house. And the LORD struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick. 16. David therefore besought God for the child; and David fasted, and went in and lay all night upon the earth. 17. And the elders of his house arose, and went to him, to raise him up from the earth: but he would not, neither did he eat bread with them. 18. And it came to pass on the seventh day that the child died. And the servants of David feared to tell him that the child was dead: for they said, Behold, while the child was yet alive we spake unto him, and he would not hearken unto our voice; how will he then vex himself if we tell him that the child is dead? 19. But when David saw that his servants whispered, David perceived that the child was dead: therefore David said unto his servants, Is the child dead? And they said, He is dead. 20. Then David arose from the earth, and washed, and anointed himself, and changed his apparel, and came into the house of the LORD, and worshipped: then he came to his own house; and when he required, they set bread before him, and he did eat. 21. Then said his servants unto him, What thing is this that thou hast done? thou didst fast and weep for the child while it was alive; but when the child was dead, thou didst rise and eat bread. 22. And he said, While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept: for I said, Who can tell whether God will be gracious to me, that the child may live? 23. But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me. 24. And David comforted Bath-sheba his wife, and went in unto her, and lay with her: and she bare a son, and he called his name Solomon; and the LORD loved him. 25. And he sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet; and he called his name Jedidiah, because of the LORD.

Nathan having delivered his message, stayed not at court but went home, probably, to pray for David, to whom he had been preaching. God, in making use of him as an instrument to bring David to repentance, and as the herald both of mercy and judgment, put an honour upon the ministry, and magnified his word above all his name. David named one of his sons by Bath-sheba, Nathan, in honour of this prophet, (1 Chron. 3. 5.) and it was that son, of whom Christ, the great Prophet, lineally descended, Luke 3. 31. When Nathan retired, David, it is probable, retired likewise, and penned the 51st Psalm, in which (though he had been assured that his sin was pardoned) he prays earnestly for pardon, and greatly laments his sin; for then will true penitents be ashamed of what they have done, when God is pacified toward them, Ezek. 16. 63.

Here is,

I. The child's illness. The Lord struck it, and it was very sick, perhaps with convulsions, or some other dreadful distemper, v. 15. The diseases and death of infants, that have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, especially as they are sometimes sadly circumstanced, are sensible proofs of the original sin in which they are conceived.

II. David's humiliation under this token of God's displeasure, and the intercession he made with God for the life of the child; (v. 16, 17.) He fasted, and lay all night upon the earth, and would not suffer any of his attendants either to feed him, or help him up. This was an evidence of the truth of his repentance. For, 1. Hereby it appeared that he was willing to bear the shame of his sin, to have it ever before him, and to be continually upbraided with it; for this child would be a continual memorandum of it, both to himself and others, if he lived; and therefore, he was so far from desiring its death, as most, in such circumstances, do, that he prayed earnestly for its life. True penitents patiently hear the reproach of their youth and of their youthful lusts, Jer. 31. 19. 2. A very tender compassionate spirit appeared in this, and great humanity, above what is commonly found in men, especially men of war, toward little children, even their own; and this was another sign of a broken contrite spirit: they that are penitent, will be pitiful. 5. He discovered, in this, a great concern for another world, which is an evidence of repentance. Nathan had told him that certainly the child should die; yet, while it is in the reach of prayer, he earnestly intercedes with God for it, chiefly (as we may suppose) that its soul might be safe and happy in another world, and that his sin might not come against the child, and that it might not fare the worse for that in the future state.* 4. He discovered, in this, a holy dread of God and of his displeasure. He deprecated the death of the child, chiefly as it was a token of God's anger against him and his house, and was inflicted in performance of a threatening, therefore he prayed thus earnestly, that, if it were the will of God, the child might live, because that would be to him a token of God's being reconciled to him. Lord, chasten me not in thy hot displeasure, Ps. 6. 1.

III. The death of the child; it died on the seventh day, (v. 18.) when it was seven days old, and therefore not circumcised, which David might, perhaps, interpret as a further token of God's displeasure, that it died before it was brought under the seal of the covenant; yet he does not therefore doubt of its being happy, for the benefits of the covenant do not depend upon the seals. David's servants, judging of him by themselves, were afraid to tell him that the child was dead, concluding that then he would disquiet himself most of all; so that he knew not till he asked, v. 19.

IV. David's wonderful calmness, when he understood the child was dead. Observe,

1. What he did. (1.) He laid aside the expressions of his sorrow, washed and anointed himself, and called for clean linen, that he might decently appear before God in his house. (2.) He went up to the tabernacle, and worshipped like Job when he heard of the death of his children. He went to acknowledge the hand of God in the affliction, and to humble himself under it, and to submit to his holy will in it; to thank God that he himself was spared, and his sin pardoned; and to pray that God would not proceed in his controversy with him, nor stir up all his wrath. Is any afflicted? Let him pray. Weeping must never hinder worshipping. (3.) Then he went to his own house, and refreshed himself, as one who found benefit by his religion in the day of his affliction; for, having worshipped, he did eat, and his countenance was no more sad.

2. The reason he gave for what he did. His servants thought it strange that he should afflict himself so for the sickness of the child, and yet take the death of it so easily; and asked him the reason of it, v. 21. In answer to which, he gives this plain account of his conduct. (1.) That while the child was alive, he thought it his duty to importune the divine favour towards it, v. 22. Nathan had indeed said the child should die, but, for aught that he knew, the threatening might be conditional, as that concerning Hezekiah: upon his great humiliation and earnest prayer, he that had so often heard the voice of his weeping, might be pleased to reverse the sentence, and spare the child; Who can tell whether God will yet be gracious to me? God gives us leave to be earnest with him in prayer for particular blessings, from a confidence in his power and general mercy, though we have no particular promise to build upon: we cannot be sure, yet let us pray, for who can tell but God will be gracious to us, in this or that particular? When our relations and friends have fallen sick, the prayer of faith has prevailed much; while there is life, there is hope, and while there is hope, there is room for prayer. (2.) That, the child being dead, he thought it as much his duty to be satisfied in the divine disposal concerning it; (v. 23.) Now, wherefore should I fast? Two things checked his grief: [1.] I cannot bring him back again; and again, He shall not return to me. Those that are dead, are out of the reach of prayer; nor can our tears profit them; we can neither weep nor pray them back to this life. Wherefore then should we fast? To what purpose is this waste? Yet David fasted and wept for Jonathan when he was dead, in honour to him. [2.] I shall go to him; First, To him, to the grave. Note, The consideration of our own death should moderate our sorrow at the death of our relations. It is the common lot; instead of mourning for their death, we should think of our own; and whatever loss we have of them now, we shall die shortly, and go to them. Secondly, To him, to heaven, to a state of blessedness, which even the Old Testament saints had some expectation of. Godly parents have great reason to hope concerning their children that die in infancy, that it is well with their souls in the other world; for the promise is to us and to our seed, which shall be performed to those that do not put a bar in their own door, as infants do not. Favores sunt ampliandi—Favours received should produce the hope of more. God calls them his children, that are born unto him; and if they be his, he will save them. This may comfort us when our children are removed from us by death; they are better provided for, both in work and wealth, than they could be in this world. We shall be with them shortly, to part no more.

V. The birth of Solomon. Though David's marrying Bath-sheba had displeased the Lord, yet he was not therefore commanded to divorce her; so far from this, that God gave him that son by her; on whom the covenant of royalty should be entailed. Bath-sheba, no doubt, was greatly afflicted with the sense of her sin and the tokens of God's displeasure. But God having restored to David the joys of his salvation, he comforted her with the same comforts with which he himself was comforted of God, v. 24, He comforted Bath-sheba. And both he and she had reason to be comforted in the tokens of God's reconciliation to them.

1. Inasmuch as, by his providence, he gave them a son, not as the former, who was given in anger and taken away in wrath, but a child graciously given, and written among the living in Jerusalem. They called him Solomon, peaceful, because his birth was a token of God's being at peace with them, because of the prosperity which was entailed upon him, and because he was to be a type of Christ, the Prince of Peace. God had removed one son from them, but now gave them another, instead of him, like Seth, instead of Abel, Gen. 4. 25. Thus God often balances the griefs of his people with comforts, in the same thing wherein he hath afflicted them, setting the one over-against the other. David had very patiently submitted to the will of God in the death of the other child, and now God made up the loss of that, abundantly to his advantage, in the birth of this. The way to have our creature-comforts either continued or restored, or the loss of them made up some other way, is, cheerfully to resign them to God.

2. Inasmuch as, by his grace, he particularly owned and favoured that son; The Lord loved him, (v. 24.) and (v. 25.) ordered him, by the prophet Nathan, to be called Jedidiah, beloved of the Lord; though a seed of evil-doers, (for such David and Bath-sheba were,) yet so well ordered was the covenant, and the crown entailed by it, that it took away all attainders, and corruption of blood, signifying, that those who were by nature children of wrath and disobedience, should, by the covenant of grace, not only be reconciled, but made favourites. And in this name, he typified Jesus Christ, that blessed Jedidiah, the Son of God's love, concerning whom God declared again and again, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

26. And Joab fought against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and took the royal city. 27. And Joab sent messengers to David, and said, I have fought against Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters. 28. Now therefore gather the rest of the people together, and encamp against the city, and take it: lest I take the city, and it be called after my name. 29. And David gathered all the people together, and went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it. 30. And he took their king's crown from off his head, (the weight whereof was a talent of gold with the precious stones,) and it was set on David's head: and he brought forth the spoil of the city in great abundance. 31. And he brought forth the people that were therein, and put them under saws, and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln: and thus did he unto all the cities of the children of Ammon. So David and all the people returned unto Jerusalem.

We have here an account of the conquest of Rabbah, and other cities of the Ammonites. Though this comes in here, after the birth of David's child, yet it is most probable that it was effected a good while before, and soon after the death of Uriah, perhaps during the days of Bath-sheba's mourning for him.

Observe, 1. That God was very gracious in giving David this great success against his enemies, notwithstanding the sin he had been guilty of, (just at that time when he was engaged in this war,) and the wicked use he had made of the sword of the children of Ammon in the murder of Uriah. Justly might he have made that sword, from thenceforward, a plague to David and his kingdom; yet he breaks it, and makes David's sword victorious, even before he repented; that this goodness of God might lead him to repentance. Good reason had David to own, that God dealt not with him according to his sins, Ps. 103. 10.

2. That Joab acted very honestly and honourably; for when he had taken the city of waters, the royal city, where the palace was, and from which the rest of the city was supplied with water, and which, therefore, upon the cutting off of that, would be obliged speedily to surrender, he sent to David to come in person to complete this great action, that he might have the praise of it, v. 26. . 28. Herein, he showed himself a faithful servant, that sought his master's honour, and his own only in subordination to his, and left an example to the servants of the Lord Jesus, in every thing they do, to consult his honour: Not unto us, but unto thy name, give glory.

3. That David was both too haughty, and too severe, upon this occasion, and neither so humble nor so tender as he should have been. (1.) He seems to have been too fond of the crown of the king of Ammon, v. 30. because it was of extraordinary value, by reason of the precious stones with which it was set. David will have it set upon his head, though it would have been better to have cast it at God's feet, and, at this time, to have put his own mouth in the dust, under guilt. The heart that is truly humbled for sin, is dead to worldly glory, and looks upon it with a holy contempt. (2.) He seems to have been too harsh with his prisoners of war. (v. 31.) taking the city by storm, after it had obstinately held out against a long and expensive siege; if he had put all to the sword in the heat of battle, whom he found in arms, it had been severe enough; but to kill them afterward, in cold blood, and by cruel tortures, with saws and harrows, tearing them to pieces, did not become him, who, when he entered upon the government, promised to sing of mercy as well as judgment, Ps. 101. 1. Had he made examples of those only, who had abused his ambassadors, advised or assisted in it, that being a violation of the law of nations, it might be looked upon as a piece of necessary justice for terror to other nations; but to be thus severe with all the cities of the children of Ammon, (that is, the garrisons or soldiers of the cities,) was extremely rigorous, and a sign that David's heart was not yet made soft by repentance, else the bowels of his compassion would not have been thus shut up; a sign that he had not yet found mercy, else he would have been more ready to show mercy.

CHAP. XIII.

The righteous God had lately told David, by Nathan the prophet, that, to chastise him for his sin, in the matter of Uriah, he would raise up evil against him, out of his own house, ch. 12. 11. And here, in the very next chapter, we find the evil beginning to rise; from henceforward, he was followed with one trouble after another, which made the latter part of his reign less glorious and pleasant than the former part. Thus God chastened him with the rod of men, yet assured him that his loving-kindness he would not utterly take away. Adultery and murder were David's sins, and those sins, among his children, (Amnon defiling his sister Tamar, and Absalom murdering his brother Amnon,) were the beginnings of his punishment, and the more grievous, because he had reason to fear that his bad example might help to bring them to these wickednesses. In this chapter, we have, 1. Amnon ravishing Tamar; assisted in his plot to do it by Jonadab his kinsman, and villainously executing it, v. 1. . 20. 2. Absalom murdering Amnon for it, v. 21. . 39. Both, great griefs to David, and the more, because he was unwittingly made accessory to both, by sending Tamar to Amnon, and Amnon to Absalom.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that Absalom, the son of David, had a fair sister, whose name was Tamar; and Amnon the son of David loved her. 2. And Amnon was so vexed, that he fell sick for his sister Tamar; for she was a virgin: and Amnon thought it hard for him to do any thing to her. 3. But Amnon had a friend, whose name was Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother: and Jonadab was a very subtle man. 4. And he said unto him, Why art thou, being the king's son, lean from day to day? wilt thou not tell me? And Amnon said unto him, I love Tamar, my brother Absalom's sister. 5. And Jonadab said unto him, Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick: and when thy father cometh to see thee, say unto him, I pray thee, let my sister Tamar come and give me meat, and dress the meat in my sight, that I may see it, and eat it at her hand. 6. So Amnon lay down, and made himself sick: and when the king was come to see him, Amnon said unto the king, I pray thee, let Tamar my sister come and make me a couple of cakes in my sight, that I may eat at her hand. 7. Then David sent home to Tamar, saying, Go now to thy brother Amnon's house, and dress him meat. 8. So Tamar went to her brother Amnon's house; and he was laid down. And she took flour, and kneaded it, and made cakes in his sight, and did bake the cakes. 9. And she took a pan, and poured them out before him; but he refused to eat. And Amnon said, Have out all men from me: and they went out every man from him. 10. And Amnon said unto Tamar, Bring the meat into the chamber, that I may eat of thine hand. And Tamar took the cakes which she had made, and brought them into the chamber to Amnon her brother. 11. And when she had brought them unto him to eat, he took hold of her, and said unto her, Come, lie with me, my sister. 12. And she answered him, Nay, my brother, do not force me; for no such thing ought to be done in Israel: do not thou this folly. 13. And I, whither shall I cause my shame to go? and as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel. Now therefore, I pray thee, speak unto the king; for he will not withhold me from thee. 14. Howbeit, he would not hearken unto her voice; but, being stronger than she, forced her, and lay with her. 15. Then Amnon hated her exceedingly; so that the hatred wherewith he hated her was greater than the love wherewith he had loved her: and Amnon said unto her, Arise, begone. 16. And she said unto him, there is no cause: this evil in sending me away is greater than the other that thou didst unto me. But he would not hearken unto her. 17. Then he called his servant that ministered unto him, and said, Put now this woman out from me, and bolt the door after her. 18. And she had a garment of divers colours upon her: for with such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled. Then his servant brought her out, and bolted the door after her. 19. And Tamar put ashes on her head, and rent her garment of divers colours that was on her, and laid her hand on her head, and went on crying. 20. And Absalom her brother said unto her, Hath Amnon thy brother been with thee? but hold now thy peace, my sister: he is thy brother; regard not this thing. So Tamar remained desolate in her brother Absalom's house.

We have here a particular account of the abominable wickedness of Amnon, in ravishing his sister; a subject not fit to be enlarged upon, nor indeed to be mentioned without blushing, that every man should be so vile, especially that a son of David should be so. Amnon's character, we have reason to think, was bad in other things; if he had not forsaken God, he had never been given up to these vile affections. Godly parents have often been afflicted with wicked children; grace does not run in the blood, but corruption does. We do not find that David's children imitated him in his devotion; but his false steps they trod in, and in those did much worse, and repented not. Parents know not how fatal the consequences may be, if, in any instance, they give their children bad examples. Observe the steps of Amnon's sin.

I. The Devil, as an unclean spirit, put it into his heart to lust after his sister Tamar. Beauty is a snare to many, it was so to her, she was fair, and therefore Amnon coveted her, v. 1. They that are peculiarly handsome, have no reason, on that account, to be proud, but great reason to stand upon their watch. Amnon's lust was, 1. Unnatural in itself; to lust after his sister, which even natural conscience startles at, and cannot think of without horror. Such a spirit of contradiction there is in man's corrupt nature, that still it desires forbidden fruit, and the more strongly it is forbidden, the more greedily it is desired. Can he entertain the thought of betraying that virtue and honour, of which, as a brother, he ought to have been the protector? But what wickedness so vile, as not to find admittance into an unsanctified unguarded heart, left to itself? 2. It was very uneasy to him. He was so vexed that he could not gain an opportunity to solicit her chastity, (for innocent converse with her was not denied him,) that he fell sick, v. 2. Fleshly lusts are their own punishment, and not only war against the soul, but against the body too, and are the rotteness of the bones. See what a hard master sinners serve, and how heavy his yoke is.

II. The Devil, as a subtle servant, put it into his head how to compass this wicked design. Amnon had a friend, (so he called him, but he was really an enemy to him,) a kinsman that had in him more of David's blood (for he was his nephew) than of David's spirit, for he was a subtle man, cunning to carry on any bad design, especially an intrigue of this nature, v. 3.

1. He takes notice that Amnon looked ill, and being a subtle man, concludes that he was love-sick, (v. 4.) and asks him, "Why art thou, being the king's son, lean from day to day?" Why dost thou pine, being the king's eldest son, and heir to the crown? Being the king's son," (1.) "Thou hast the pleasure of the court to divert thee; take those pleasures then, and with them drive away the sorrow, whatever it is." Content and comfort are not always to be found in royal palaces. With much more reason may we ask dejected and disconsolate saints, why they that are the children of the king of kings, and heirs of the crown of life, are thus lean from day to day. (2.) "Thou hast the power of a prince to command what thou wantest and wishest for; use that power therefore, and gratify thyself. Pine not away for that which, lawful or unlawful, thou, being the king's son, mayest have. Quicquid libet licet—Your will is law." Thus Jezebel to Ahab in a like case, (1 Kings 21. 7.) Dost not thou govern Israel? The abuse of power is the most dangerous temptation of the great.

2. Amnon having the impudence to own his wicked lust, miscalling it love, (I love Tamar,) Jonadab put him in a way to compass his design, v. 5. Had he been what he pretended. (Amnon's friend,) he would have startled at the mention of such horrid wickedness, would have had before him the evil of it, what an offence it was to God, and what a wrong to his own soul, to entertain such a vile thought; of what fatal consequence it would be to him to cherish and prosecute it; he would have used his subtlety to divert Amnon from it, by recommending some other person to him, whom he might lawfully marry. But he seems not at all surprised at it; objects not either the unlawfulness or the difficulty, the reproach, or so much as his father's displeasure; but puts him in the way to get Tamar to his bed-side, and then he might do as he pleased. Note, The case of those is very miserable, whose friends, instead of admonishing and reproving them, flatter them and forward them in their sinful ways, and are their counsellors and contrivers to do wickedly. Amnon is already sick, but goes about; he must take upon him to be so ill, (and his thin looks will give colour enough to the pretence,) as not to be able to get up, and to have no appetite to any thing but just that which pleases his fancy. Dainty meat is abhorred; (Job 33. 20.) the best dish from the king's table cannot please him; but if he can eat any thing, it must be from his sister Tamar's fair hand. This is what he is advised to.

3. Amnon follows these directions, and thus gets Tamar within his reach. He made himself sick, v. 6. Thus he lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den, to catch the poor, and to draw them into his net, Ps. 10. 8. 10. David was always fond of his children, and concerned if any thing ailed them; he no sooner hears that Amnon is sick, than he comes himself to visit him. Let parents learn hence to be tender of their children, and compassionate toward them. The sick child commonly the mother comforteth, (Isa. 66. 13.) but let not the father be unconcerned. We may suppose that when David came to see his sick son, he gave him good counsel to make a right use of his affliction, and prayed with him, which did not alter his wicked purpose. At parting, the indulgent father asks, "Is there any thing thou hast a mind to, that I can procure for thee?" "Yes, Sir," says the dissembling son, "my stomach is weak, and I know not of any thing I can eat, unless it be a cake of my sister Tamar's making, and I cannot be satisfied that it is so, unless I see her make it, and it will do me the more good, if I eat it at her hand." David saw no reason to suspect any mischief intended, God hid his heart from understanding in this matter; he therefore immediately orders Tamar to go and attend her sick brother, v. 7. He does it very innocently, but afterward, no doubt, reflected upon it with great regret. Tamar as innocently goes to her brother's chamber, neither of them dreading any abuse; why should she from a brother, a sick brother? Not disdaining, in obedience to her father, and love to her brother, (though but her half-brother,) to be his nurse, v. 8, 9. Though she was a king's daughter, a great beauty, (v. 1.) and well-dressed, (v. 18.) yet she did not think it below her to knead cakes and bake them, nor had she done it now, if she had not been used to it. Good housewifery is not a thing below the greatest ladies, nor ought they to think it a disparagement to them. The virtuous woman, whose husband sits among the elders, yet works willingly with her hands, Prov. 31. 13. Modern ages have not been destitute of such instances, nor is it so unfashionable as some would make it. Preparing for the sick should be more the care and delight of the ladies, than preparing for the nice; charity more than curiosity.

4. Having got her to him, he contrives to have her alone; for the adulterer (much more, so vile an adulterer as this) is in care that no eye see him, Job 24. 15. The meat is ready, but he cannot eat while he is looked at by those about him; they must all be turned out, v. 9. The sick must be humoured, and think they have a privilege to command. Tamar is willing to humour him; her chaste and virtuous soul has not the least thought of that which his polluted breast is full of; and therefore she makes no scruple of being alone with him in the inner chamber, v. 10. And now the mask is thrown off, the meat is thrown by, and the wicked wretch calls her sister, and yet impudently courts her to come and lie with him, v. 11. It was a base affront to her virtue, to think it possible to persuade her to consent to such wickedness, when he knew her behaviour to be always exemplary, modest, and virtuous. But it is common for those that live in uncleanness, to think others such as themselves, at least tender to their sparks.

III. The Devil, as a strong tempter, deafens his ear to all the reasonings with which she resisted his assaults, and would have persuaded him to desist. We may well imagine what a surprise and terror it was to the young lady, to be thus attacked, how she blushed, and how she trembled; yet, in this great confusion, nothing could be said more pertinently, or with greater strength of argument, than what she said to him.

1. She calls him brother, reminding him of the nearness of the relationship, which made it unlawful for him to marry her, much more to debauch her. It was expressly forbidden, (Lev. 18. 9.) under a severe penalty, Lev. 20. 17. Great care must be taken, lest the love that should be among relations, degenerate into lust.

2. She entreats him not to force her, which intimates that she would never consent to it in any degree; and what satisfaction could he take in offering violence?

3. She lays before him the great wickedness of it. It is folly; all sin is so, especially uncleanness: it is wickedness of the worst kind. Such abominations ought not to be committed in Israel, among the professing people of God, that have better statutes than the heathen have. We are Israelites; if we do such things, we are more inexcusable than others, and our condemnation will be more intolerable, for we reproach the Lord, and that worthy name by which we are called.

4. She represents to him the shame of it, which perhaps might influence him more than the sin of it. "For my part, whither shall I cause my shame to go? If it should be concealed, yet I shall blush to think of it as long as I live; and if ever it be known, how shall I be able to look any of my friends in the face? For thy part, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel," that is, "Thou shalt be looked upon as an atrocious debauchee, the worst of men; thou wilt lose thine interest in the esteem of all that are wise and good, and so wilt be set aside as unfit to rule, though the first-born; for Israel will never submit to the government of such a fool." Prospect of shame, especially everlasting shame, should deter us from sin.

5. To divert him from his wicked purpose at this time, and (if possible) to get clear of him, she intimates to him, that, probably, the king, rather than he should die for love of her, would dispense with the divine law, and let him marry her; not as if she thought he had such a dispensing power, or would pretend to it; she was confident that, upon notice given to the king by himself, of this wicked desire, which he would scarcely have believed from any one else, he would take an effectual course to protect her from him.

But all her arts and all her arguments availed not. His proud spirit cannot bear a denial; but her comfort, and honour, and all that was dear to her, must be sacrificed to his brutish and outrageous lust, v. 14. It is to be feared that Amnon, though young, had long lived a lewd life, which his father either knew not, or punished not; for a man could not, of a sudden, arrive at such a pitch of wickedness as this. But is this his love to Tamar? Is this the recompense he gives her for her readiness to attend him in his sickness? Will he deal with his sister as with a harlot? Base villain! God deliver all that are modest and virtuous from such wicked and unreasonable men.

IV. The Devil, as a tormentor and betrayer, immediately turns his love of her into hatred; (v. 15.) He hated her with great hatred, greatly, so it is in the margin, and grew as outrageous in his malice, as he had been in his lust; he basely turned her out of doors by force; nay, as if he now disdained to touch her with his own hands, he ordered his servant to pull her out, and bolt the door after her, v. 17. Now, 1. The innocent injured lady had reason to resent this as a great affront, and in some respects, (as she says, v. 16.) worse than the former; for nothing could have been done more barbarous, or more disgraceful to her. Had he taken care to conceal what was done, her honour had been lost to herself only. Had he gone down on his knees, and begged her pardon, it might have been some little reparation. Had he given her time to compose herself after the horrid confusion she was put into, she might have kept her countenance when she went out, and so have kept her counsel. But to dismiss her thus hurried, thus rudely, as if she had done some wicked thing, obliged her, in her own defence, to proclaim the wrong that had been done her. 2. We may learn from it, both the malignity of sin, unbridled passions are as bad as unbridled appetites, and the mischievous consequences of sin, at last, it bites like a serpent; for here we find, (1.) That sins, sweet in the commission, afterward become odious and painful, and the sinner's own conscience makes them so to himself. Amnon hated Tamar, because she would not consent to his wickedness, and so take part of the blame upon herself, but, to the last, resisted it, and reasoned against it, and so threw it up on him. Had he hated the sin, and loathed himself for it, we might have hoped he was penitent: Godly sorrow worketh indignation; (2 Cor. 7. 11.) but to hate the person he had abused, showed that his conscience was terrified, but his heart not at all humbled. See what deceitful pleasures those of the flesh are, how soon they piss away, and turn into loathing; see Ezek. 23. 17. (2.) That sins, secret in the commission, afterward become open and public, and the sinners themselves often make them so. Their own tongues fall upon them. The Jewish doctors say, that, upon the occasion of this wickedness of Amnon, a law was made, that a young man and a young woman should never be alone together; for, said they, if the king's daughter be so used, what will become of the children of private men?

We must now leave the criminal to the terrors of his own guilty conscience, and inquire what becomes of the poor victim.

[1.] She bitterly lamented the injury she had received; as it was a stain to her honour, though no real blemish to her virtue. She tore her fine clothes in token of her grief, and put ashes upon her head, to deform herself, loathing her own beauty and ornaments, because they had occasioned Amnon's unlawful love; and she went on crying for another's sin, v. 19.

[2.] She retired to her brother Absalom's house, because he was her own brother, and there she lived in solitude and sorrow, in token of her modesty, and detestation of uncleanness. Absalom spoke kindly to her, bid her pass by the injury; for the present, designing himself to revenge it, v. 20. It should seem, by Absalom's question, (Has Amnon been with thee?) that Amnon was notorious for such lewd practices, so that it was dangerous for a modest woman to be with him; this Absalom might know, and yet Tamar be wholly ignorant of it.

21. But when king David heard of all these things, he was very wroth. 22. And Absalom spake unto his brother Amnon neither good nor bad: for Absalom hated Amnon, because he had forced his sister Tamar. 23. And it came to pass, after two full years, that Absalom had sheep-shearers in Baal-hazor, which is beside Ephraim: and Absalom invited all the king's sons. 24. And Absalom came to the king, and said, Behold now, thy servant hath sheep-shearers; let the king, I beseech thee, and his servants, go with thy servant. 25. And the king said to Absalom, Nay, my son, let us not all now go, lest we be chargeable unto thee. And he pressed him: howbeit he would not go, but blessed him. 26. Then said Absalom, If not, I pray thee, let my brother Amnon go with us. And the king said unto him, Why should he go with thee? 27. But Absalom pressed him, that he let Amnon and all the king's sons go with him. 28. Now Absalom had commanded his servants, saying, Mark ye now when Amnon's heart is merry with wine; and when I say unto you, Smite Amnon; then kill him, fear not: have not I commanded you? be courageous, and be valiant. 29. And the servants of Absalom did unto Amnon as Absalom had commanded. Then all the king's sons arose, and every man gat him up upon his mule and fled.

What Solomon says of the beginning of strife, is as true of the beginning of all sin; it is as the letting forth of water; when once the flood-gates are plucked up, an inundation follows; one mischief begets another, and it is hard to say, what shall be in the end thereof.

I. We are here told, how David resented the tidings of Amnon's sin; he was very wroth, v. 21. So he had reason to be, that his own son should do such a wicked thing, and draw him to be accessory to it. It would be a reproach to him, for not giving him a better education; it would be a blot upon his family, the ruin of his daughter, a bad example to his kingdom, and a wrong to his son's soul. But was it enough for him to be angry? He ought to have punished his son for it, and to have put him to open shame; both as a father, and as a king, he had power to do it. But the Septuagint here adds these words: But he saddened not the spirit of his son Amnon, because he loved him, because he was his first-born. He fell into Eli's error, whose sons made themselves vile, and he frowned not on them. If Amnon was dear to him, his punishing of him would have been so much the greater punishment to himself for his own uncleanness. But he cannot bear the shame those must submit to, who correct that in others, which they are conscious of in themselves, and therefore his anger must serve instead of his justice; this hardens sinners, Eccl. 8. 11.

II. How Absalom resented it. He resolves already to do the part of a judge in Israel; and since his father will not punish Amnon, he will, from a principle, not of justice, or zeal for virtue, but of revenge, because he reckons himself affronted in the abuse done to his sister. Their mother was daughter to a heathen prince, (ch. 3. 3.) which perhaps they were upbraided with sometimes by their brethren, as children of a stranger; as such a one Absalom thought his sister was now treated; and if Amnon thought her fit to be made his harlot, he would think him fit to be made his slave; this enraged him, and nothing less than the blood of Amnon will quench his rage. Here we have,

1. The design conceived. Absalom hated Amnon, (v. 22.) and he that hateth his brother, is a murderer already, and, like Cain, is of that wicked one, 1 John 3. 12-15. Absalom's hatred of his brother's crime had been commendable, and he might justly have prosecuted him for it by a due course of law, for example to others, and the making of some compensation to his injured sister; but to hate his person, and design his death by assassination, was to put a great affront upon God, by offering to repair the breach of his seventh commandment by the violation of his sixth, as if they were not all alike sacred; But he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill, James 2. 11.

2. The design concealed. He said nothing to Amnon of this matter, either good or bad, appeared as if he did not know it, and maintained toward him his usual civility, only waiting for a fair opportunity to do him a mischief. That malice is the worst, (1.) Which is hidden close, and has no vent given to it. If Absalom had reasoned the matter with Amnon, he might have convinced him of his sin, and brought him to repentance; but saying nothing, Amnon's heart was hardened, and his own more and more embittered against him; therefore rebuking our neighbour is opposed to hating him in our hearts, Lev. 19. 17. Let passion have vent, and it will spend itself. (2.) Which is gilded over with a show of friendship; so Absalom's was, his words smoother than butter, but war in his heart. See Prov. 26. 26. (3.) Which is harboured long; two full years Absalom nursed this root of bitterness, v. 23. It may be, at first, he did not intend to kill his brother, (for if he had, he might have had as fair an opportunity to do it as he had at last,) he only waited for an occasion to disgrace him, or do him some other mischief; but, in time, his hatred ripened to this, that he would be no less than the death of him. If the sun going down once upon the wrath, gives such a place to the Devil as is intimated, Eph. 4. 26, 27. what would the sun-sets of two full years do?

3. The design laid. (1.) Absalom has a feast at his house in the country, as Nabal had, on occasion of his sheep-shearing, v. 23. Attentive as Absalom was to his person, (ch. 14. 26.) and as high as he looked, he knew the state of his flocks, and looked well to his herds. Those that have no other care about their estates in the country, than how to spend them in the town, take a ready way to see the end of them. When Absalom had sheep-shearers, he would himself be with them. (2.) To this feast he invites the king, his father, and all the princes of the blood, v. 24. Not only that he might have this opportunity to pay his respects to them, but that he might make himself the more respected among his neighbours. Those that are akin to great folks, are apt to value themselves too much on their kindred. (3.) The king would not go himself, because he would not put him to the expense of his entertainment, v. 25. It seems, Absalom had an estate in his own hands, on which he lived like himself; the king had given it him, but would have him to be a good husband of it: in both these, he is an example to parents, when their children are grown up, to give them a competency to live upon, according to their rank, and then to take care that they do not live above it, especially that they be no way accessory to their doing so. It is prudent for young house-keepers to begin as they can hold out, and not to spend the wool upon the shearing of it. (4.) Absalom got leave for Amnon, and all the rest of the king's sons, to come and grace his table in the country, v. 26, 27. Absalom had so effectually concealed his enmity to Amnon, that David saw no reason to suspect any design upon him in that particular invitation, "Let my brother Amnon go;" but this would make the stroke more cutting to David, that he was himself drawn in to consent to that which gave the opportunity for it, as before, v. 7. It seems, David's sons, though grown up, continued to pay that deference to their father, as not to go such a small journey as this, without his leave. Thus ought children, even when they are become men and women, to honour their parents, advise with them, and do nothing material without their consent, much less against their mind.

4. The design executed, v. 28, 29. (1.) Absalom's entertainment was very plentiful; for he resolves that they shall all be merry with wine; at least, concludes that Amnon will be so, for he knew that he was apt to drink to excess. But, (2.) The orders he gave to his servants concerning Amnon, that they should mingle his blood with his wine, were very barbarous. Had he challenged him, and, in reliance upon the goodness of his cause, and the justice of God, fought him himself, though that had been bad enough, yet it had been more honourable and excusable; (our ancient law, in some cases, allowed trial by battle;) but to murder him, as he did, was to copy Cain's example, only that the reason made a difference; Abel was slain for his righteousness, Amnon for his wickedness. Observe the aggravations of this sin: [1.] He would have Amnon slain, when his heart was merry with wine, and he was, consequently, least apprehensive of danger, least able to resist it, and also least fit to go out of the world; as if his malice aimed to destroy both soul and body, not giving him time to say, Lord have mercy upon me. What a dreadful surprise has death been to many, whose hearts have been overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness! [2.] His servants must be employed to do it, and so involved in the guilt. He was to give the word of command, Smite Amnon; and then they, in obedience to him, and, upon presumption that his authority would bear them out, must kill him. What an impious defiance does he bid to the divine law, when, though the command of God is express, Thou shalt not kill, he bids them kill Amnon, with this warrant, "Have not I commanded you?" That is enough; Be courageous, and fear neither God nor man." Those servants are ill-taught, (and have wicked masters,) who obey, in contradiction to God. Those are too obsequious, that will damn their souls to please their masters, whose big words cannot secure them from God's wrath. Masters must always command their servants, as those that know they have also a Master in heaven. [3.] He did it in the presence of all the king's sons, of whom it is said, (ch. 8. 18.) that they were chief rulers; so that it was an affront to public justice, which they had the administration of, and to the king his father whom they represented, and a contempt of that sword which should have been a terror to his evil deeds; while his evil deeds, on the contrary, were a terror to him that bare it. [4.] There is reason to suspect that Absalom did this, not only to revenge his sister's quarrel, but to make way for himself to the throne; which he was ambitious of, and which he would stand fair for, if Amnon the eldest son was taken off.

When the word of command was given, Absalom's servants failed not to execute it, being buoyed up with an opinion, that their master, being now next heir to the crown, (for Chileab was dead, as Bishop Patrick thinks,) would save them from harm. Now the threatened sword is drawn in David's house, which should not depart from it. First, His eldest son falls by it, himself being, by his wickedness, the cause of it, and his father, by his connivance, accessory to it. Secondly, All his sons flee from it, and come home in terror, not knowing how far their brother Absalom's bloody design might extend. See what mischief sin makes in families.

30. And it came to pass, while they were in the way, that tidings came to David, saying, Absalom hath slain all the king's sons, and there is not one of them left. 31. Then the king arose, and tare his garments, and lay on the earth; and all his servants stood by with their clothes rent. 32. And Jonadab the son of Shimeah, David's brother, answered and said, Let not my lord suppose that they have slain all the young men the king's sons; for Amnon only is dead: for by the appointment of Absalom this hath been determined from the day that he forced his sister Tamar. 33. Now therefore let not my lord the king take the thing to his heart, to think that all the king's sons are dead; for Amnon only is dead. 34. But Absalom fled. And the young man that kept the watch lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there came much people by the way of the hill side behind him. 35. And Jonadab said unto the king, Behold, the king's sons come: as thy servant said, so it is. 36. And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of speaking, that, behold, the king's sons came, and lifted up their voice, and wept: and the king also and all his servants wept very sore. 37. But Absalom fled, and went to Talmai, the son of Ammihud, king of Geshur. And David mourned for his son every day. 38. So Absalom fled, and went to Geshur, and was there three years. 39. And the soul of king David longed to go forth unto Absalom: for he was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead.

Here is,

I. The fright that David was put into by a false report brought to Jerusalem, that Absalom had slain all the king's sons, v. 30. It is common for fame to make bad worse; and the first news of such a thing as this, represents it more dreadful than afterward it proves. Let us not therefore be afraid of evil tidings, while they want confirmation, but when we hear the worst, hope the best, at least, hope better. However, this false news gave as much affliction to David, for the present, as if it had been true; he tare his garments, and lay on the earth, while, as yet, it was only a flying story, v. 31. It was well that David had grace; he had need enough of it, for he had strong passions.

II. The rectifying of the mistake, two ways. 1.

By the sly suggestions of Jonadab, David's nephew, who could tell him, Amnon only is dead, and not all the king's sons; (v. 32, 33.) and could tell him too that it was done by the appointment of Absalom, and designed from the day he forced his sister Tamar. What a wicked man was he, if he knew all this, or had any cause to suspect it, that he did not make David acquainted with it sooner, that means might have been used to make up the quarrel, (such was Jonadab's duty had he acted as an honest man,) or, at least, that David might not have thrown Amnon into the mouth of danger, by letting him go to Absalom's house. If we do not our utmost to prevent mischief, we make ourselves accessory to it. If we say, Behold, we know it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart, consider whether we did or no? See Prov. 24. 11, 12. It is well, if Jonadab was not as guilty of Amnon's death, as he was of his sin; such friends do they prove who are hearkened to as counsellors to do wickedly: he that would not be so kind as to prevent Amnon's sin, neither would he be so kind as to prevent his ruin, when, it should seem, he might have done both. 2. By the safe return of all the king's sons, except Amnon. They, and their attendants, were speedily discovered by the watch, (v. 34, 35.) and soon arrived, to show themselves alive, but to bring the certain sad news that Absalom had murdered their brother Amnon. The grief David had been in for that which was not, made him the better able to bear that which was, by giving him a sensible occasion, when he was undeceived, to thank God, that all his sons were not dead; yet, that Amnon was dead, and slain by his own brother, in such a treacherous barbarous manner, was enough to put the king and court, the king and kingdom, into real mourning. Sorrow is never more reasonable, than when there is sin in the case.

III. Absalom's flight from justice. Absalom immediately fled, v. 34. He was now as much afraid of the king's sons, as they were of him; they fled from his malice, he from their justice; no part of the land of Israel could shelter him, the cities of refuge gave no protection to a wilful murderer; though David had let Amnon's incest go unpunished, Absalom could not promise himself his pardon for this murder; so express was the law in this case, and so well known David's justice, and his dread of blood-guiltiness. He therefore made the best of his way to his mother's relations, and was entertained by his grandfather, Talmai, king of Geshur, (v. 37.) and there he was protected three years; (v. 38.) David not demanding him, and Talmai not thinking himself obliged to send him back, unless he were demanded.

IV. David's uneasiness for his absence. He mourned for Amnon a good while, (v. 37.) but he being past recall, time wore off that grief; he was comforted concerning Amnon: it also wore off too much his detestation of Absalom's sin; instead of loathing him, as a murderer, he longs to go forth to him, v. 39. At first, he could not find in his heart to do justice on him, now he can almost find in his heart to take him into his favour again. This was David's infirmity; something God saw in his heart that made a difference, else we should have thought that he, as much as Eli, honoured his sons more than God.

CHAP. XIV.

How Absalom threw himself out of his royal father's protection and favour, we read in the foregoing chapter, which left him an exile, outlawed, and proscribed; in this chapter, we have the arts that were used to bring him and his father together again, and how, at last, it was done; which is here recorded, to show the folly of David, in sparing him, and indulging him in his wickedness, for which he was, soon after, severely corrected by his unnatural rebellion. I. Joab, by bringing a feigned issue (as the lawyers speak) to be tried before him, in the case of a poor widow of Tekoah, gains from him a judgment in general, That the case might be so, as that the putting of a murderer to death ought to be dispensed with, v. 1. . 20. II. Upon the application of this, he gains from him an order to bring Absalom back to Jerusalem, while yet he was forbidden the court, v. 21. . 24. III. After an account of Absalom, his person, and family, we are told how, at length, he was introduced by Joab into the king's presence, and the king was thoroughly reconciled to him, v. 25. . 33.

1. NOW Joab the son of Zeruiah perceived that the king's heart was toward Absalom. 2. And Joab sent to Tekoah, and fetched thence a wise woman, and said unto her, I pray thee, feign thyself to be a mourner, and put on now mourning apparel, and anoint not thyself with oil, but be as a woman that had a long time mourned for the dead; 3. And come to the king, and speak on this manner unto him. So Joab put the words in her mouth. 4. And when the woman of Tekoah spake to the king, she fell on her face to the ground, and did obeisance, and said, Help, O king. 5. And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, I am indeed a widow woman, and my husband is dead. 6. And thy handmaid had two sons, and they two strove together in the field, and there was none to part them, but the one smote the other, and slew him. 7. And, behold, the whole family is risen against thine handmaid, and they said, Deliver him that smote his brother, that we may kill him, for the life of his brother whom he slew; and we will destroy the heir also: and so they shall quench my coal which is left, and shall not leave to my husband neither name nor remainder upon the earth. 8. And the king said unto the woman, Go to thine house, and I will give charge concerning thee. 9. And the woman of Tekoah said unto the king, My lord, O king, the iniquity be on me, and on my father's house; and the king and his throne be guiltless. 10. And the king said, Whosoever saith aught unto thee, bring him to me, and he shall not touch thee any more. 11. Then said she, I pray thee, let the king remember the LORD thy God, that thou wouldest not suffer the revengers of blood to destroy any more, lest they destroy my son. And he said, As the LORD liveth, there shall not one hair of thy son fall to the earth. 12. Then the woman said, Let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak one word unto my lord the king. And he said, Say on. 13. And the woman said, Wherefore then hast thou thought such a thing against the people of God? for the king doth speak this thing as one which is faulty, in that the king doth not fetch home again his banished. 14. For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again: neither doth God respect any person; yet doth he devise means that his banished be not expelled from him. 15. Now therefore that I am come to speak of this thing unto my lord the king, it is because the people have made me afraid: and thy handmaid said, I will now speak unto the king; it may be that the king will perform the request of his handmaid. 16. For the king will hear, to deliver his handmaid out of the hand of the man that would destroy me and my son together out of the inheritance of God. 17. Then thine handmaid said, The word of my lord the king shall now be comfortable: for as an angel of God, so is my lord the king, to discern good and bad; therefore the LORD thy God will be with thee. 18. Then the king answered and said unto the woman, Hide not from me, I pray thee, the thing that I shall ask thee. And the woman said, Let my lord the king now speak. 19. And the king said, Is not the hand of Joab with thee in all this? And the woman answered and said, As thy soul liveth, my lord the king, none can turn to the right hand or to the left from aught that my lord the king hath spoken: for thy servant Joab, he bade me, and he put all these words in the mouth of thine handmaid: 20. To fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing; and my lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth.

Here is,

I. Joab's design to get Absalom recalled out of banishment, his crime pardoned, and his attainder reversed, v. 1. Joab made himself very busy in this affair, 1. As a courtier, that was studious, by all ways possible, to ingratiate himself with his prince, and improve his interest in his favour; he perceived that the king's heart was toward Absalom, and that, the heat of his displeasure being over, he still retained his old affection for him, and only wanted a friend to court him to be reconciled, and to contrive for him how he might do it, without impeaching the honour of his justice. Joab, finding how David stood affected, undertook this good office. 2. As a friend to Absalom, whom, perhaps, he had a particular kindness for, at least looked upon as the rising sun, to whom it was his interest to recommend himself. He plainly foresaw that his father would, at length, be reconciled to him, and therefore thought he should make both his friends, if he were instrumental to bring it about. 3. As a statesman, and one concerned for the public welfare. He knew how much Absalom was the darling of the people, and if David should die while he was in banishment, it might occasion a civil war between those that were for him and those that were against him; for it is probable that though all Israel loved his person, yet they were much divided upon his case. 4. As one who was himself a delinquent, by the murder of Abner; he was conscious to himself of the guilt of blood, and that he was himself obnoxious to public justice, and therefore, whatever favour he could procure to be shown to Absalom, would corroborate his reprieve.

II. His contrivance to do it, by laying somewhat of a parallel case before the king, which was done so dexterously by the person he employed, that the king took it for a real case, and gave judgment upon it, as he had done upon Nathan's parable; and the judgment being in favour of the criminal, the manager might, by that, discover his sentiments so far, as to venture upon the application of it, and to show that it was the case of his own family, which, it is probable, she was instructed not to proceed to, if the king's judgment upon her case had been severe.

1. The person he employed, is not named, but is said to be a woman of Tekoah, one whom he knew to be fit for such an undertaking: and it was requisite that the scene should be laid at a distance, that David might not think it strange that he had not heard of it before. It is said, She was a wise woman, one that had a quicker wit, and a readier tongue, than most of her neighbours, v. 2. The truth of the story would be the less suspected, when it came, as was supposed, from the person's own mouth.

2. The character she put on, was, that of a disconsolate widow, v. 2. Joab knew such a one would have an easy access to the king, who was always ready to comfort the mourners, especially the mourning widows, having himself mentioned it among the titles of God's honour, that he is a Judge of the widows, Ps. 68. 5. God's ear, no doubt, is more open to the cries of the afflicted, and his heart too, than that of the most merciful princes on earth could be.

3. It was a case of compassion which she had to represent to the king, and a case in which she could have no relief but from the chancery in the royal breast; the law (and, consequently, the judgment of all the inferior courts) being against her. She tells the king that she had buried her husband; (v. 5.) that she had two sons that were the support and comfort of her widowed state; that these two (as young men are apt to do) fell out and fought, and one of them unhappily killed the other; (v. 6.) that, for her part, she was desirous to protect the manslayer, for, as Rebekah argued concerning her two sons, Why should she be deprived of them both in one day? Gen. 27. 46. But though she, who was nearest of kin to the slain, was willing to let fall the demands of an avenger of blood, yet the other relations insisted upon it, that the surviving brother should be put to death according to law, not out of any affection, either to justice or to the memory of the slain brother, but that, by destroying the heir, (which they had the impudence to own was the thing they aimed at,) the inheritance might be their's: and thus they would cut off (1.) Her comfort; "They shall quench my coal, deprive me of the only support of my old age, and put a period to all my joy in this world, which is reduced to this one coal." (2.) Her husband's memory; "His family will be quite extinct, and they will leave him neither name nor remainder," v. 7.

4. The king promised her his favour, and a protection for her son. Observe how she grew upon the king's compassionate concessions. (1.) Upon the representation of her case, he promised to consider of it, and to give orders about it, v. 8. This was encouraging; that he did not dismiss her petition with "Curat lex—Let the law take its course; blood calls for blood, and let it have what it calls for;" but he will take time to inquire whether the allegations of her petition be true. (2.) The woman is not content with this, but begs that he would immediately give judgment in her favour; and, if the matter of fact were not as she represented it, and consequently a wrong judgment given upon it, let her bear the blame, and free the king and his throne from guilt, v. 9. Yet her saying this would not acquit the king, if he should pass sentence without taking due cognizance of the case. (3.) Being thus pressed, he makes a further promise, that she should not be injured or insulted by her adversaries, but he would protect her from all molestation, v. 10. Magistrates ought to be the patrons of oppressed widows. (4.) Yet this does not content her, unless she can get her son's pardon, and protection for him too. Parents are not easy, unless their children be safe, safe for both worlds, v. 11. "Let not the avenger of blood destroy my son, for I am undone if I lose him; as good take my life as his. Therefore let the king remember the Lord thy God;" that is; [1.] "Let him confirm this merciful sentence with an oath, making mention of the Lord our God, by way of appeal to him, that the sentence may be indisputable, and irreversible; and then I shall be easy." See Heb. 6. 17, 18. [2.] "Let him consider what good reason there is for this merciful sentence, and then he himself will be confirmed in it. Remember how gracious and merciful the Lord thy God is, how he bears long with sinners, and does not deal with them according to their deserts, but is ready to forgive. Remember how the Lord thy God spared Cain, who slew his brother, and protected him from the avengers of blood, Gen. 4. 15. Remember how the Lord thy God forgave thee the blood of Uriah, and let the king, that has found mercy, show mercy." Note, Nothing is more proper, or more powerful, to engage us to every duty, especially to all acts of mercy and kindness, than to remember the Lord our God. (5.) This importunate widow, by pressing the matter thus close, obtains, at last, a full pardon for her son, ratified with an oath as she desired; As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of thy son fall to the earth; that is, "I will undertake he shall come to no damage upon this account." The Son of David has assured all that put themselves under his protection, that, though they should be put to death for his sake, not a hair of their head shall perish; (Luke 21. 16, 18.) though they should lose for him, they should not lose by him. Whether David did well, thus to undertake the protection of a murderer, whom the cities of refuge would not protect, I cannot say. But as the matter of fact appeared to him, there was not only great reason for compassion to the mother, but room enough for a favourable judgment concerning the son: he had slain his brother, but he hated him not in time past; it was upon a sudden provocation, and, for aught that appeared, it might be done in his own defence. He pleaded not this himself, but the judge must be of counsel for the prisoner; and therefore, Let mercy, at this time, rejoice against judgment.

5. The case being thus adjudged in favour of her son, it is now time to apply it to the king's son, Absalom. The mask here begins to be thrown off, and another scene opened; the king is surprised, but not at all displeased, to find his humble petitioner, of a sudden, become his reprover, his privy-counsellor, an advocate for the prince his son, and the mouth of the people, undertaking to represent to him their sentiments. She begs his pardon, and his patience, for what she had further to say, (v. 12.) and has leave to say it, the king being very well pleased with her wit and humour.

(1.) She supposes Absalom's case to be, in effect, the same with that which she had put as her son's; and therefore, if the king would protect her son, though he had slain his brother, much more ought he to protect his own, and to fetch home his banished, v. 13. Mutato nomine de te fabula narratur—Change but the names, to you the tale belongs. She names not Absalom, nor needed she to name him; David longed so much after him, and had him so much in his thoughts, that he was soon aware whom she meant by his banished. And in those two words, were two arguments which the king's tender spirit felt the force of: "He is banished, and has, for three years, undergone the disgrace and terror, and all the inconveniences, of banishment: sufficient to such a one is this punishment; but he is thy banished, thy own son, a piece of thyself, thy dear son, whom thou lovest."

It is true, Absalom's case differed very much from that which she had put. Absalom did not slay his brother upon a hasty passion, but maliciously, and upon an old grudge; not in the field, where there were no witnesses, but at table, before all his guests. Absalom was not an only son, as her's was; David had many more, and one lately born, more likely to be his successor than Absalom, for he was called Jedidiah, because God loved him. But David was himself too well affected to the cause, to be critical in his remarks upon the disparity of the cases, and was more desirous than she could be, to bring that favourable judgment to his own son, which he had given concerning her's.

(2.) She reasons upon it with the king, to persuade him to recall Absalom out of banishment, give him his pardon, and take him into his favour again.

[1.] She pleads the interest which the people of Israel had in him. "What is done against him, is done against the people of God, who have their eye upon him as heir of the crown, at least, have their eye upon the house of David in general, with which the covenant is made, and which therefore they cannot see the diminution and decay of, by the fall of so many of its branches in the flower of their age. Therefore the king speaks as one that is faulty, for he will provide that my husband's name and memory be not cut off, and yet takes no care, though his own be in danger, which is of more value and importance than ten thousand of our's."

[2.] She pleads man's mortality; (v. 14.) "We must needs die, it is appointed for us, we cannot avoid the thing itself, nor defer it till another time. We are all under a fatal necessity of dying; and when we are dead, we are past recall, as water spilt upon the ground; nay, even when we are alive, we are so, we have lost our immortality, past retrieve. Amnon must have died, some time, if Absalom had not killed him; and if Absalom be now put to death for killing him, that will not bring him to life again." This was poor reasoning, and would serve against the punishment of any murderer; but, it should seem. Amnon was a man little regarded by the people, and his death little lamented, and it was generally thought hard that so dear a life as Absalom's should go for one so little valued as Amnon's.

[3.] She pleads God's mercy and his clemency toward poor guilty sinners. "God does not take away the soul, or life, but devises means that his banished, his children that have offended him, and are obnoxious to his justice, as Absalom is to thine, be not for ever expelled from him," v. 14. Here are two great instances of the mercy of God to sinners, properly urged as reasons for showing mercy. First, The patience he exercises toward them. His law is broken, yet he does not immediately take away the life of those that break it; does not strike sinners dead, as justly he might, in the act of sin, but bears with them, and waits to be gracious. God's vengeance had suffered Absalom to live; why then should not David's justice suffer him? Secondly, The provision he had made for their restoration to his favour, that though by sin they had banished themselves from him, yet they might not be expelled, or cast off, for ever. Atonement might be made for sinners by sacrifice. Lepers, and others ceremonially unclean, were banished, but provision was made for their cleansing, that, though for a time excluded, they might not be finally expelled. The state of sinners is a state of banishment from God. Poor banished sinners are likely to be for ever expelled from God, if some course be not taken to prevent it: it is against the mind of God that they should be so, for he is not willing that any should perish: infinite wisdom has devised proper means to prevent it; so that it is sinners' own fault, if they be cast off. This instance of God's good will towards us all, should incline us to be merciful and compassionate one towards another, Matt. 18. 32, 33.

6. She concludes her address, with high compliments to the king, and strong expressions of her assurance that he would do what was just and kind, both in the one case and the other; (v. 15-17.) for, as if the case had been real, still she pleads for herself and her son, yet meaning Absalom.

(1.) She would not have troubled the king thus, but that the people made her afraid. Understanding it of her own case, all her neighbours made her apprehensive of the ruin she and her son were upon the brink of, from the avengers of blood, the terror of which made her thus bold in her applications to the king himself. Understanding it of Absalom's case, she gives the king to understand, what he did not know before, that the nation was disgusted at his severity towards Absalom, to that degree, that she was really afraid it would occasion a general mutiny, or insurrection, for the preventing of which great mischief, she ventured to speak to the king himself. The fright she was in must excuse her rudeness.

(2.) She applied herself to him with a great confidence in his wisdom and clemency. "I said, I will speak to the king myself, and ask nobody to speak for me; for the king will hear reason, even from so mean a creature as I am, will hear the cries of the oppressed, and will not suffer the poorest of his subjects to be destroyed out of the inheritance of God," that is, "driven out of the land of Israel, to seek for shelter among the uncircumcised, as Absalom is, whose case is so much the worse, that, being shut out of the inheritance of God, he wants God's law and ordinances, which might help to bring him to repentance, and is in danger of being infected with the idolatry of the heathen among whom he sojourns, and of bringing home the infection." To engage the king to grant her request, she expresses a confident hope, that his answer would be comfortable, and such as angels bring, (as Bishop Patrick explains it,) who are messengers of divine mercy. What this woman says, by way of compliment, the prophet says by way of promise, (Zech. 12. 8.) that when the weak shall be as David, the house of David shall be as the angel of the Lord. "And, in order to this, the Lord thy God shall be with thee, to assist thee in this and every judgment thou givest." Great expectations are great engagements, especially to persons of honour, to do their utmost not to disappoint those that depend upon them.

Lastly, The hand of Joab is suspected by the king, and acknowledged by the woman, to be in all this, v. 18-20.

(1.) The king soon suspected it. For he could not think that such a woman as this, would have appealed to him, in a matter of such moment, of her own head. And he knew none so likely to set her on as Joab, who was a politic man, and a friend of Absalom.

(2.) The woman very honestly owned it. "Thy servant Joab, he bade me. If it be well done, let him have the thanks; if ill, let him bear the blame." Though she found it very agreeable to the king, yet she would not take the praise of it to herself, but speaks the truth as it was, and gives us an example to do likewise, and never to tell a lie for the concealing of a well-managed scheme; Dare to be true, nothing can need a lie.

21. And the king said unto Joab, Behold now I have done this thing: go therefore, bring the young man Absalom again. 22. And Joab fell to the ground on his face, and bowed himself, and thanked the king: and Joab said, To-day thy servant knoweth that I have found grace in thy sight, my lord, O king, in that the king hath fulfilled the request of his servant. 23. So Joab arose, and went to Geshur, and brought Absalom to Jerusalem. 24. And the king said, Let him turn to his own house, and let him not see my face. So Absalom returned to his own house, and saw not the king's face. 25. But in all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for his beauty: from the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no blemish in him. 26. And when he polled his head, (for it was at every year's end that he polled it; because the hair was heavy on him, therefore he polled it,) he weighed the hair of his head at two hundred shekels, after the king's weight. 27. And unto Absalom there were born three sons, and one daughter, whose name was Tamar: she was a woman of a fair countenance.

Observe here,

I. Orders given for the bringing back of Absalom; the errand on which the woman came to David, was so agreeable, and her management of it so very ingenious and surprising, that he was brought into a peculiarly kind humour: Go, (says he to Joab,) bring the young man Absalom again, v. 21. He was himself inclined to favour him, yet, for the honour of his justice, he would not do it but upon intercession made for him, which may illustrate the methods of divine grace. It is true, God has thoughts of compassion toward poor sinners, not willing that any should perish, yet he is reconciled to them through a Mediator, who intercedes with him on their behalf, and to whom he has given these orders, Go, bring them again. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and he came to this land of our banishment, to bring us to God.

Joab, having received these orders, 1. Returns thanks to the king for doing him the honour to employ him in an affair so universally grateful, v. 22. Joab took it as a kindness to himself, and (some think) as an indication that he would never call him to an account for the murder he had been guilty of. But if he meant so, he was mistaken, as we shall find, 1 Kings 2. 5, 6. 2. Delays not to execute David's orders; he brought Absalom to Jerusalem, v. 23. I see not how David can be justified in suspending the execution of the ancient law, (Gen. 9. 6.) Whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, in which a righteous magistrate ought not to acknowledge even his brethren, or know his own children. God's laws were never designed to be like cobwebs which catch the little flies, but suffer the great ones to break through. God justly made Absalom a scourge to him, whom his foolish pity thus spared. But though he allowed him to return to his own house, he forbade him the court, and would not see him himself, v. 24. He put him under this interdict, (1.) For his own honour, that he might not seem to countenance so great a criminal, nor to forgive him too easily. (2.) For Absalom's greater humiliation. Perhaps he had heard something of his conduct, when Joab went to fetch him, which gave him too much reason to think that he was not truly penitent; he therefore put him under this mark of his displeasure, that he might be awakened to a sight of his sin, and to sorrow for it, and might make his peace with God; upon the first notice of which, no doubt, David would be forward to receive him again into his favour.

II. Occasion taken from hence to give an account of Absalom. Nothing is said of his wisdom and piety; though he was the son of such a devout father, we read nothing of his devotion; parents cannot give grace to their children, though they give them ever so good an education. All that is here said of him, is, 1. That he was a very handsome man; there was not his equal in all Israel for beauty, v. 25. A poor commendation for a man that had nothing else in him valuable. Handsome are they that handsome do. Many a polluted deformed soul dwells in a fair and comely body; witness Absalom's, that was polluted with blood, and deformed with unnatural disaffection to his father and prince. In his body there was no blemish, but in his mind nothing but wounds and bruises. Perhaps this was one reason why his father was so fond of him, and protected him from justice. Those have reason to fear affliction in their children, who are better pleased with their beauty than with their virtue. 2. That he had a very fine head of hair. Whether it was the length, or colour, or extraordinary softness of it, something there was, which made it very valuable, and very much an ornament to him, v. 26. This notice is taken of his hair, not as the hair of a Nazarite, (he was far from that strictness,) but as the hair of a beau. He let it grow, till it was a burthen to him, and was heavy on him, nor would he cut it, as long as ever he could bear it. As pride feels no cold, so it feels no heat; and that which feeds and gratifies it, is not complained of, though very uneasy. When he did poll it at certain times, for ostentation he had it weighed, that it might be seen how much it excelled other men's; and it weighed two hundred shekels, which some reckon to be three pounds and two ounces of our weight; and with the oil and powder, especially if it were powdered (as Josephus says the fashion then was) with gold-dust, Bishop Patrick thinks it is not at all incredible that it should weigh so much. This fine hair proved his halter, ch. 18. 9. 3. That his family began to be built up. It is probable that it was a good while before he had a child; and then it was, that, despairing of having one, he set up that pillar which is mentioned, ch. 18. 18. to bear up his name; but afterward he had three sons, and one daughter, v. 27. Or, perhaps, these sons, while he was hatching his rebellion, were all cut off by the righteous hand of God, and thereupon, he set up that monument.

28. So Absalom dwelt two full years in Jerusalem, and saw not the king's face. 29. Therefore Absalom sent for Joab, to have sent him to the king; but he would not come to him: and when he sent again the second time, he would not come. 30. Therefore he said unto his servants, See, Joab's field is near mine, and he hath barley there; go and set it on fire. And Absalom's servants set the field on fire. 31. Then Joab arose, and came to Absalom unto his house, and said unto him, Wherefore have thy servants set my field on fire? 32. And Absalom answered Joab, Behold, I sent unto thee, saying, Come hither, that I may send thee to the king, to say, Wherefore am I come from Geshur? it had been good for me to have been there still: now therefore let me see the king's face; and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill me. 33. So Joab came to the king, and told him: and when he had called for Absalom, he came to the king, and bowed himself on his face to the ground before the king: and the king kissed Absalom.

Three years, Absalom had been an exile with his father-in-law, and now, two years, a prisoner at large in his own house, and, in both, better dealt with than he deserved; yet his spirit was still unhumiliated, his pride unmortified, and, instead of being thankful that his life is spared, he thinks himself sorely wronged that he is not restored to all his places at court. Had he truly repented of his sin, his distance from the gaieties of the court, and his solitude and retirement in his own house, especially being in Jerusalem the holy city, would have been very agreeable to him. If a murderer must live, yet let him be for ever a recluse. But Absalom cannot bear this just and gentle mortification; he longs to see the king's face, pretending it was because he loved him, but really because he wanted an opportunity to supplant him. He cannot do his father mischief, till he is reconciled to him; this therefore is the first branch of his plot; this snake cannot sting again, till he be warmed in his father's bosom. He gained this point, not by pretended submissions and promises of reformation, but (would you think of it?) by insults and injuries.

1. By his insolent carriage toward Joab, he brought him to mediate for him. Once and again, he sent to Joab to come and speak with him, for he durst not go to him; but Joab would not come, (v. 29.) probably, because Absalom had not owned the kindness he had done him, in bringing him to Jerusalem, so gratefully as he thought he should have done; proud men take every service done them for a debt. One would have thought that a person in Absalom's circumstances would have sent to Joab a kindly message, and offered him a large gratuity; courtiers expect it: instead of this, he bids his servants set Joab's corn-fields on fire; (v. 30.) as spiteful a thing as he could do. Samson could not think of a greater injury to do the Philistines than this. Strange, that Absalom should think, by doing Joab a mischief, to prevail with him to do him a kindness; or to recommend himself to the favour of his prince or people, by showing himself so very malicious and ill-natured, and such an enemy to the public good, for the fire might spread to the corn of others. Yet by this means he brings Joab to him, v. 31. Thus God, by afflictions, brings those to him, that kept at a distance from him. Absalom was obliged by the law to make restitution, (Exod. 22. 6.) yet we do not find that either he offered it, or that Joab demanded it. Joab (it might be) thought he could not justify his refusal to go and speak with him; and therefore Absalom thought he could justify his taking this way to fetch him. And now Joab (perhaps frightened at the surprising boldness and fury of Absalom, and apprehensive that he had made an interest in the people strong enough to bear him out in doing the most daring things, else he would never have done this,) not only puts up with this injury, but goes on his errand to the king. See what some men can do, by threats, and carrying things with a high hand.

2. By his insolent message (for I can call it no better) to the king, he recovered his place at court, to see the king's face, that is, to become a privy counsellor, Esth. 1. 14. (1.) His message was haughty and imperious, and very unbecoming either a son or a subject, v. 32. He undervalued the favour that had been showed him, in recalling him from banishment, and restoring him to his own house and that in Jerusalem; Wherefore am I come from Geshur? He denies his own crime, though most notorious, and will not own that there was any iniquity in him, insinuating that therefore he had been wronged in the rebuke he had been under. He defies the king's justice, "Let him kill me, if he can find in his heart;" knowing he loved him too well to do it. (2.) Yet with this message he carried his point, v. 33. David's strong affection for him, construed all this to be the language of a great respect to his father, and an earnest desire of his favour, when, alas, it was nothing like it. See how easily wise and good men may be imposed upon by their own children that design ill, especially when they are blindly fond of them. Absalom, by the posture of his body, testified his submission to his father, He bowed himself on his face to the ground; and David, with a kiss, sealed his pardon. Dd the bowels of a father prevail to reconcile him to an impenitent son, and shall penitent sinners question the compassion of him who is the Father of mercy? If Ephraim bemoan himself, God soon bemoans him, with all the kind expressions of a fatherly tenderness; He is a dear son, and a pleasant child, Jer. 31. 20.

CHAP. XV.

Absalom's name signifies the peace of his father, yet he proves his greatest trouble; so often are we disappointed in our expectations from the creature. The sword, entailed upon David's house, had hitherto been among his children, but now it begins to be drawn against himself, with this aggravation, that he may thank himself for it, for had he done justice upon the murderer, he had prevented the traitor. The story of Absalom's rebellion begins with this chapter, but we must go over three or four more before we see the end of it. In this chapter, we have, I. The arts Absalom used to insinuate himself into the people's affection, v. 1. .6. II. His open avowal of his pretensions to the crown at Hebron, whither he went under colour of a vow, and the strong party that appeared for him there, v. 7. .12. III. The notice brought of this to David, and his flight from Jerusalem, thereupon, v. 13. .18. In his flight we are told, 1. What passed between him and Ittai, v. 19. .22. 2. The concern of the country for him, v. 23. 3. His conference with Zadok, v. 24. .29. 4. His tears and prayers upon this occasion, v. 30, 31. 5. Matters concerted by him with Hushai, v. 32. .37. Now the word of God was fulfilled, that he would raise up evil against him out of his own house, ch. 12. 10.

1. AND it came to pass, after this, that Absalom prepared him chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him. 2. And Absalom rose up early, and stood beside the way of the gate: and it was so, that when any man that had a controversy came to the king for judgment, then Absalom called unto him, and said, Of what city art thou? And he said, Thy servant is of one of the tribes of Israel. 3. And Absalom said unto him, See, thy matters are good and right; but there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. 4. Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice! 5. And it was so, that when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and took him, and kissed him. 6. And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment. So Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel.

Absalom is no sooner restored to his place at court, than he aims to be in the throne. He that was unhumiliated under his troubles, became insufferably proud when they were over; and he cannot be content with the honour of being the king's son, and the prospect of being his successor, but he must be king now. His mother was a king's daughter; on that, perhaps, he valued himself, and despised his father, who was but the son of Jesse. She was the daughter of a heathen king, which made him the less concerned for the peace of Israel. David, in this unhappy issue of that marriage, smarted for his being unequally yoked with an unbeliever.

When Absalom was restored to the king's favour, if he had had any sense of gratitude, he would have studied how to oblige his father, and make him easy; but, on the contrary, he meditates how to undermine him, by stealing the hearts of the people from him. Two things recommend a man to popular esteem; greatness, and goodness.

I. Absalom looks great, v. 1. He had learned of the king of Geshur, what was not allowed to the kings of Israel, to multiply horses; which make him look desirable, while his father, on his mule, looks despicable. The people desired a king like the nations; and such a one Absalom will be, appearing in pomp and magnificence, above what had been seen in Jerusalem. Samuel had foretold that this would be the manner of the king; He shall have chariots and horsemen, and some shall run before his chariots, (1 Sam. 8. 11.) and this is Absalom's manner. Fifty footmen (in rich liveries we may suppose) running before him, to give notice of his approach, would highly gratify his pride and the people's foolish fancy. David thinks that it is designed only to grace his court, and connives at it. Those parents know not what they do, who indulge a proud humour in their children; for I have seen more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever.

II. Absalom will seem very good too, but with a very bad design. Had he proved himself a good son, and a good subject, and set himself to serve his father's interest, he had done his present duty, and showed himself worthy of future honours, after his father's death. Those that know how to obey well, know how to rule. But to show how good a judge, and how good a king, he will be, is but to deceive himself and others. These are good indeed, that are good in their own place, not that pretend how good they will be in other people's places. But this is all the goodness we find in Absalom.

1. He wishes that he were a judge in Israel, v. 4. He had all the pomp and all the pleasure he could wish; yet this will not content him, unless he have power too; O that I were a judge in Israel! He that should himself have been judged to death for murder, has the impudence to aim at being a judge of others. We read not of Absalom's wisdom, virtue, or learning in the laws, nor had he given any proofs of his love to justice, but the contrary; yet he wishes he were a judge. Note, These are commonly most ambitious of preferment, that are least fit for it; the best qualified are the most modest and self-diffident, while it is no better than the spirit of an Absalom, that says, O that I were a judge in Israel!

2. He takes a very bad course for the accomplishing of his wish. Had he humbly petitioned his father to employ him in the administration of justice, and studied to qualify himself for it, (according to the rule, Exod. 18. 21.) no doubt, he had been sure of the next judge's place that fell; but this is too mean a post for his proud spirit. It is below him to be subordinate, though to the king his father; he must be supreme, or nothing. He wants to be such a judge, that every man who has any cause, shall come to him: in all causes, and over all persons, he must preside; little thinking what a fatigue this would be, to have every man come to him. Moses himself could not bear it. Those know not what power is, that grasp at so much, so very much.

To gain the power he aims at, he endeavours to instil into the people's minds,

(1.) A bad opinion of the present administration, as if the affairs of the kingdom were altogether neglected, and no care taken about them. He got round him all he could, that had business at the council-board, inquired what their business was; and, [1.] Upon a slight and general inquiry into their cause, he pronounced it good; Thy matters are right. A fit man indeed to be a judge, who would give judgment upon hearing one side only! For he has a bad cause indeed, that cannot put a good colour upon it, when he himself has the telling of the story. But, [2.] He told them that it was to no purpose to appeal to the throne, There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. The king is himself old, and past business; or so taken up with his devotions, that he never minds business; (his sons were so addicted to their pleasures, that, though they had the name of chief rulers, they took no care of the affairs committed to them;) he further seems to insinuate, what a great loss there was of him, while he was banished and confined, and how much the public suffered by it; what his father said truly in Saul's reign, (Ps. 75. 3.) he says falsely, The land and all the inhabitants of it are dissolved, all will go to wreck and ruin, unless I bear up the pillars of it. Every appellant shall be made to believe that he will never have justice done him, unless Absalom be viceroy, or lord-justice. It is the way of turbulent factious aspiring men, to reproach the government they are under, presumptuous are they, self-willed, and not afraid to speak evil of dignities, 2 Pet. 2. 10. Even David himself, the best of kings, and his administration, could not escape the worst of censures. They that aim to usurp, cry out of grievances, and pretend to design nothing but the redress of them, as Absalom here.

2. A good opinion of his own fitness to rule. That the people might say, "O that Absalom were a judge!" (and they are apt enough to desire changes,) he recommends himself to them, (1.) As very diligent; he rose up early, and appeared in public before the rest of the king's sons were stirring, and he stood beside the way of the gate, where the courts of judgment sat, as one mightily concerned to see justice done, and public business despatched. (2.) As very inquisitive and prying, and desirous to be acquainted with every one's case.

He would know of what city every one was, that came for judgment, that he might inform himself concerning every part of the kingdom, and the state of it, v. 2. (3.) As very familiar and humble. If any Israelite offered to do obeisance to him, he took him, and embraced him as a friend. No man's conduct could be more condescending, while his heart was as proud as Lucifer's. Ambitious projects are often carried on by a show of humility, Col. 2. 23. He knew what a grace it puts upon greatness, to be affable and courteous, and how much it wins upon common people: had he been sincere in it, it had been his praise, but to fawn upon the people, that he might betray them, was abominable hypocrisy. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, to draw them into his net, Ps. 10. 9, 10.

7. And it came to pass after forty years, that Absalom said unto the king, I pray thee, let me go and pay my vow which I have vowed unto the LORD in Hebron. 8. For thy servant vowed a vow while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, If the LORD shall bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then I will serve the LORD. 9. And the king said unto him, Go in peace. So he arose, and went to Hebron. 10. But Absalom sent spies throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, As soon as ye hear the sound of the trumpet, then ye shall say, Absalom reigneth in Hebron. 11. And with Absalom went two hundred men out of Jerusalem, that were called; and they went in their simplicity, and they knew not any thing. 12. And Absalom sent for Ahithophel the Gilonite, David's counsellor, from his city, even from Giloh, while he offered sacrifices. And the conspiracy was strong; for the people increased continually with Absalom.

We have here the breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, which he had long been contriving. It is said to be after forty years, v. 7. But whence that is to be dated, we are not told, not from David's beginning his reign, for then it would fall in the last year of his life, which is not probable, but either from his first anointing by Samuel seven years before, or rather, (I think,) from the people's desiring a king, and the first change of the government into a monarchy; which might be about ten years before David began to reign; it is fitly dated from thence, to show that the same restless spirit was still working, and still they were given to change: as fond now of a new man, as then of a new model. So it fell about the thirtieth year of David's reign, Absalom's plot being now ripe for execution.

I. The place he chose for the rendezvous of his party, was Hebron; the place where he was born, and where his father began his reign, and continued it several years, which would give some advantage to his pretensions. Every one knew Hebron to be a royal city; and it lay in the heart of Judah's lot, in which tribe, probably, he thought his interest strong.

II. The pretence he had both to go thither, and to invite his friends to him there, was, to offer a sacrifice to God, in performance of a vow he had made during his banishment, v. 7, 8. We have cause enough to suspect that he had not made any such vow, it does not appear that he was so religiously inclined; but he that struck not at murder and treason, would not make conscience of a lie to serve his purpose. If he said he had made such a vow, nobody could disprove him. Under this pretence,

1. He got leave of his father to go to Hebron. He would be well pleased to hear that his son, in his exile, was so desirous to return to Jerusalem, not only his father's city, but the city of the living God; that he looked up to God, to bring him back; that he had vowed, if he were brought back, to serve the Lord, whose service he had hitherto neglected; and that now, being brought back, he remembered his vow, and resolved to perform it. If he think fit to do it in Hebron, rather than in Zion or Gibeon, the good king is so well pleased with the thing itself, that he will not object against his choice of the place. See how willing tender parents are to believe the best concerning their children, and, upon the least indication of good, to hope, even concerning those that have been untoward, that they will repent and reform. But how easy is it for children to take advantage of their good parents' credulity, and to impose upon them with the show of religion, while still they are what they were! David was overjoyed to hear that Absalom was inclined to serve the Lord, and therefore readily gave him leave to go to Hebron, and to go thither with solemnity.

2. He got a good number of sober substantial citizens to go along with him, v. 11. There went two hundred men, probably, of the principal men of Jerusalem, whom he invited to join with him in his feast upon his sacrifice; and they went in their simplicity, not in the least suspecting that Absalom had any bad design in his journey. He knew that it was to no purpose to tempt them into his plot, they were inviolably firm to David; but he drew them in to accompany him, that the common people might think that they were in his interest, and that David was deserted by some of his best friends. Note, It is no new thing for very good men, and very good things, to be made use of by designing men, to put a colour upon bad practices. When religion is made a stalking-horse, and sacrifice a shoeing-horn, to sedition and usurpation, it is not to be wondered at, if some that were well-affected to religion, as these followers of Absalom here, are imposed upon by the fallacy, and drawn in to give countenance to that, with their names, which in their heart they abhor, not having known the depths of Satan.

III. The project he laid, was, to get himself proclaimed king throughout all the tribes of Israel, upon a signal given, v. 10. Spies were sent abroad, to be ready in every country to receive the notice with satisfaction and acclamations of joy, and to make the people believe that the news was both very true and very good, and that they were all concerned to take up arms for their new king. Upon the sudden spreading of this proclamation, Absalom reigns in Hebron, some would conclude that David was dead, others that he had resigned; and thus they that were in the secret, would draw in many to appear for Absalom, and come in to his assistance, who, if they had rightly understood the matter, would have abhorred the thought of it, but, being drawn in, would adhere to him. See what artifices ambitious men use for the compassing of their ends; and in matters of state, as well as in matters of religion, let us not be forward to believe every spirit, but try the spirits.

IV. The person he especially courted and relied upon in this affair, was, Ahithophel, a politic thinking man, and one that had a clear head, and a great compass of thought, that had been David's coun-seller, his guide and his acquaintance, (Ps. 55. 13.) his familiar friend, in whom he trusted, which did eat of his bread, Ps. 41. 9. But, upon some disgust of David's against him, or his against David, he was banished, or retired from public business, and lived privately in the country. How should a man of such good principles as David, and such corrupt principles as Ahithophel, long agree? A fitter tool Absalom could not find in all the kingdom, than one that was so great a statesman, and yet was disaffected to the present ministry. While Absalom was offering his sacrifices, in performance of his pretended vow, he sent for this man. So much was his heart on the projects of his ambition, that he could not stay to make an end of his devotion; which showed what his eye was upon, in all, and that it was but for a pretence that he made long offerings.

V. The party that joined with him, proved, at last, very considerable. The people increased continually with Absalom, which made the conspiracy strong and formidable. Every one whom he had complimented and caressed, (pronouncing his matters right and good, especially, if, afterward, the cause went against him,) not only came himself, but made all the interest he could for him, so that he wanted not for numbers. The majority is no certain rule to judge of equity by. All the world wondered after the beast. Whether Absalom formed this design merely in the height of his ambition and fondness to rule, or whether there was not in it also malice against his father, and revenge for his banishment and confinement, though it was so much less than he deserved, does not appear. But, generally, that which aims at the crown, aims at the head that wears it.

12. And there came a messenger to David, saying, The hearts of the men of Israel are after Absalom. 14. And David said unto all his servants that were with him at Jerusalem, Arise, and let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom: make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly, and bring evil upon us, and smite the city with the edge of the sword. 15. And the king's servants said unto the king, Behold, thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my lord the king shall appoint. 16. And the king went forth, and all his household after him: and the king left ten women, which were concubines, to keep the house. 17. And the king went forth, and all the people after him, and tarried in a place that was far off. 18. And all his servants passed on beside him; and all the Cherethites, and all the Pelethites, and all the Gittites, six hundred men which came after him from Gath, passed on before the king. 19. Then said the king to Ittai the Gittite, Wherefore goest thou also with us? return to thy place, and abide with the king; for thou art a stranger, and also an exile. 20. Whereas thou camest but yesterday, should I this day make thee go up and down with us? Seeing I go whither I may, return thou, and take back thy brethren: mercy and truth be with thee. 21. And Ittai answered the king, and said, As the LORD liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be. 22. And David said to Ittai, Go, and pass over. And Ittai the Gittite passed over, and all his men, and all the little ones that were with him. 23. And all the country wept with a loud voice, and all the people passed over: the king also himself passed over the brook Kidron, and all the people passed over toward the way of the wilderness.

Here is,

I. The notice brought to David of Absalom's rebellion, v. 13. The matter was bad enough, and yet it seems to have been made worse to him (as such things commonly are) than really it was; for he was told, that the hearts of the men of Israel (that is, the generality of them, at least, the leading men) were after Absalom. But David was the more apt to believe it, because now he could call to mind the arts Absalom had used to inveigle them, and perhaps reflected upon it with regret, that he had not done more to counterwork him, and secure his own interest, which he had been too confident of. Note, It is the wisdom of princes, to make sure of the hearts of their subjects; for if they have them, they have their purses, and arms, and all, at their service.

II. The alarm this gave to David, and the resolutions he came to, thereupon. We may well imagine him in a manner thunder-struck, when he heard that the son he loved so dearly, and had been so indulgent to, was so unnaturally, and ungratefully, in arms against him. Well might he say with Cæsar, Kai oû τέκνον—What, thou my son? Let not parents raise their hopes too high from their children, lest they be disappointed. David did not call a council, but, consulting only with God and his own heart, determined immediately to quit Jerusalem, v. 14. He took up this strange resolve, so disagreeable to his character as a man of courage, either, 1. As a penitent, submitting to the rod, and laying down under God's correcting hand. Conscience now reminded him of his sin in the matter of Uriah, and the sentence he was under for it, which was, that evil should raise against him out of his own house. "Now," thinks he, "the word of God begins to be fulfilled, and it is not for me to contend with it, or fight against it: God is righteous, and I submit." Before unrighteous Absalom, he could justify himself, and stand it out; but before the righteous God, he must condemn himself, and yield to his judgments. Thus he accepts the punishment of his iniquity. Or, 2. As a politician. Jerusalem was a great city, but not tenable; it should seem, by David's prayer, (Ps. 51. 18.) that the walls of it were not built up, much less was it regularly fortified; it was too large to be garrisoned by so small a force as David had now with him; he had reason to fear that the generality of the inhabitants were too well-affected to Absalom, to be true to him; should he fortify himself there, he might lose the country, in which, especially among those that lay furthestmost from Absalom's tampering, he hoped to have the most friends. And he had such a kindness for Jerusalem, that he was loath to make that the seat of war, and expose it to the calamities of a siege; he will rather quit it tamely to the rebels. Note, Good men, when they suffer themselves, care not how few are involved with them in suffering.

III. His hasty flight from Jerusalem. His servants agreed to the measures he took, faithfully adhered to him, (v. 15.) and assured him of their inviolable allegiance. Whereupon, 1. He went out of Jerusalem himself on foot, while his son Absalom had chariots and horses. It is not always the best man, nor the best cause, that makes the best figure. See here, not only the servant, but the traitor, on horseback, while the prince, the rightful prince, walks as a servant upon the earth, Eccl. 10. 7. Thus he chose to do, to abase himself so much the more under God's hand, and in condescension to his friends and followers, with whom he would walk, in token that he would live and die with them. 2. He took his household with him, his wives and children, that he might protect them in this day of danger, and that they might be a comfort to him in this day of grief. Masters of families, in their greatest frights, must not neglect their households. Ten women, that were concubines, he left behind, to keep the house, thinking that the weakness of their sex would secure them from murder, and their age and relation to him, would secure them from rape; but God overruled this for the fulfilling of his word. 3. He took his life-guard with him, or band of pensioners; the Cherethites and Pelethites, who were under the command of Benaiah; and the Gittites, who were under the command of Ittai, v. 18. These Gittites seem to have been, by birth, Philistines of Gath, who came, a regiment of them, 600 in all, to enter themselves in David's service, having known him in Gath, and being greatly in love with him for his virtue and piety, and having embraced the Jews' religion. David made them of his garde du corps—his body-guard, and they adhered to him in his distress. "The son of David found not so great faith in Israel as in a Roman centurion, and a woman of Canaan. 4. As many as would, of the people of Jerusalem, he took with him, and made a halt at some distance from the city, to draw them up, v. 17. He compelled none; they whose hearts were with Absalom, to Absalom let them go, and so shall their doom be, they will soon have enough of him. Christ enlists none but volunteers.

IV. His discourse with Ittai the Gittite, who commanded the Philistine proselytes. 1. David dissuaded him from going along, with him, v. 19. 20. Though he and his men might be greatly serviceable to him, yet, (1.) He would try whether he were hearty for him, and not inclined to Absalom: he therefore bids him return to his post in Jerusalem, and serve the new king. If he were no more than a soldier of fortune, (as we say,) he would be for that side which would pay and prefer him best; and to that side let him go. (2.) If he were faithful to David, yet he would not have him exposed to the fatigues and perils he now counted upon. David's tender spirit cannot bear to think that a stranger and an exile, a proselyte and a new convert, who ought, by all means possible, to be encouraged and made easy, should at his first coming, meet with such hard usage. "Should I make thee go up and down with us? No, return with thy brethren." Generous souls are more concerned at the shares others have in their troubles, than at their own. Ittai shall therefore be dismissed with a blessing, Mercy and truth be with thee, that is, God's mercy and truth, mercy according to promise, the promise made to those who renounce other gods, and put themselves under the wings of the divine Majesty. This is a very proper pious farewell, when we part with a friend, "Mercy and truth be with thee, and then thou art safe, and mayest be easy wherever thou art." David's dependence was upon the mercy and truth of God, for comfort and happiness, both for himself and his friends; see Ps. 61. 7.

2. Ittai bravely resolves not to leave him, v. 21. Where David is, whether in life or death, safe or in peril, there will this faithful friend of his be; and he confirms his resolution with an oath, that he might not be tempted to break it: such a value has he for David, not for the sake of his wealth and greatness, (for then he would have deserted him, now that he saw him thus reduced,) but for the sake of his wisdom and goodness, which were still the same, that, whatever comes of it, he will never leave him. Note, That is a friend indeed, who loves at all times, and will adhere to us in adversity. Thus should we cleave to the Son of David, with full purpose of heart, that neither life nor death shall separate us from his love.

V. The common people's sympathy with David in his affliction. When he and his attendants passed over the brook Kidron, (the very same brook that Christ passed over, when he entered upon his sufferings, John 18. 1.) toward the way of the wilderness, which lay between Jerusalem and Jericho, all the country wept with a loud voice, v. 23. Cause enough there was for weeping, 1. To see a prince thus reduced; one that had lived so great forced from his palace, and in fear of his life, with a small retinue, seeking shelter in a desert; the city of David, which he himself won, built, and fortified, made an unsafe abode for David himself: it would move the compassion even of strangers, to see a man fallen thus low from such a height, and this by the wickedness of his own son; a piteous case it was. Parents that are abused and ruined by their own children, merit the tender sympathy of their friends, as much as any of the sons or daughters of affliction. Especially, 2. To see their own prince thus wronged, who had been so great a blessing to their land, and had not done any thing to forfeit the affections of his people; to see him in this distress, and themselves unable to help him, might well draw floods of tears from their eyes.

24. And, lo, Zadok also, and all the Levites were with him, bearing the ark of the covenant of God: and they set down the ark of God; and Abiathar went up, until all the people had done passing out of the city. 25. And the king said unto Zadok, Carry back the ark of God into the city: if I shall find favour in the eyes of the LORD, he will bring me again, and show me both it and his habitation. 26. But if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him. 27. The king said also unto Zadok the priest, Art not thou a seer? return into the city in peace, and your two sons with you, Ahimaaz thy son, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar. 28. See, I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness, until there come word from you to certify me. 29. Zadok therefore and Abiathar carried the ark of God again to Jerusalem; and they tarried there. 30. And David went up by the ascent of mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered; and he went barefoot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went up.

Here is,

I. The fidelity of the priests and Levites, and their firm adherence to David and his interest. They knew David's great affection to them and their office, notwithstanding his failings; the method Absalom took to gain people's affections, made no impression upon them; he had little religion in him, and therefore they steadily adhered to David; Zadok and Abiathar, and all the Levites, if he go, will accompany him, and take the ark with them, that, by it, they might ask counsel of God for him, v. 24. Note, They that are friends to the ark in their prosperity, shall find it a friend to them in their adversity. Formerly, David would not rest, till he had found a resting place for the ark; and now, if the priests may have their mind, the ark shall not rest, till David returns to his rest.

II. David's dismissal of them back into the city, v. 25, 26. Abiathar was High Priest, (1 Kings 2. 35.) but Zadok was his assistant, and attended the ark most closely, while Abiathar was active in public business, v. 24. Therefore David directs his speech to Zadok, and an excellent speech it is, and shows him to be in a very good frame under his affliction, and that still he holds fast his integrity.

1. He is very solicitous for the safety of the ark; "By all means carry that back into the city, let not that be unsettled and exposed with me, lodge that again in the tent pitched for it; surely Absalom, bad as he is, will do that no harm." David's heart, like Eli's, trembled for the ark of God. Note, It argues a good principle, to be more concerned for the church's prosperity, than for our own; to prefer Jerusalem before our chief joy; (Ps. 137. 6.) the success of the gospel, and the flourishing of the church, above our own wealth, credit, ease, and safety, even when they are most in hazard.

2. He is very desirous to return to the enjoyment of the privileges of God's house. He will reckon it the greatest instance of God's favour to him, if he may but once more be brought back to see it, and his habitation; this will be more his joy than to be brought back to his own palace and throne again. Note, Gracious persons measure their comforts and conveniences in this world, by the opportunity they give them of communion with God. Hezekiah wishes for the recovery of his health, for this reason, that he might go up to the house of the Lord, Isa. 38. 22.

4. He is very submissive to the holy will of God, concerning the issue of his present dark dispensation. He hopes the best, (v. 25.) and hopes for it from the favour of God, which he looks upon to be the fountain of all good; "If God favour me so far, I shall be settled again as formerly;" but he provides for the worst; "If he deny me this favour, if he thus say, I have no delight in thee, I know I deserve the continuance of his displeasure, his holy will be done;" see him here waiting to receive the event; "Behold, here am I, as a servant expecting orders;" and see him willing to refer himself to God concerning it, "Let him do to me as seemeth good to him, I have nothing to object, all is well that God does." Observe with what satisfaction and holy complacency he speaks of the divine disposal: not only, "He can do what he will," subscribing to his power, (Job 9. 12.) or, "He may do what he will," subscribing to his sovereignty, (Job 33. 13.) or, "He will do what he will," subscribing to his unchangeableness, (Job 23. 13, 15.) but, Let him do what he will, subscribing to his wisdom and goodness. Note, It is our interest, as well as duty, cheerfully to acquiesce in the will of God, whatever befalls us. That we may not complain of what is, let us see God's hand in all events; and that we may not be afraid of what shall be, let us see all events in God's hand.

III. The confidence David put in the priests, to serve his interest to the utmost of their power, in his absence. He calls Zadok a seer, (v. 27.) that is, a wise man, a man that can see into business, and discern time and judgment; "Thou hast thine eyes in thy head, (Eccl. 2. 14.) and therefore art capable of doing me service, especially, by sending me intelligence of the enemies' motions and resolutions." One friend that is a seer, in such an exigence as this, was worth twenty that were not so quick-sighted. For the settling of a private correspondence with the priests in his absence, he appoints, 1. Whom they should send to him, their two sons Ahimaaz and Jonathan, whose coat, it might be hoped, would be their protection, and of whose prudence and faithfulness, probably, he had had experience. 2. Whether they should send. He would encamp in the plain of the wilderness, till he heard from them, (v. 28.) and then would move according to the information and advice they should send him. Hereupon, they returned to the city, to wait the event; it was pity that any disturbance should be given to a state so happy as this was, when the prince and the priests had such an entire affection for, and confidence in each other.

IV. The melancholy posture that David and his men put themselves into, when, at the beginning of their march, they went up the mount of Olives, v. 30. 1. David himself, as a deep mourner, covered his head and face for shame and blushing, went barefoot, as a prisoner or a slave, and for mortification, and went weeping. Did it become a man of his reputation for courage and greatness of spirit, thus to cry like a child, only for fear of an enemy at a distance, against whom he might easily have made head, and perhaps with one bold stroke have routed him? Yes, it did not ill become him, considering how much there was in this trouble, (1.) Of the unkindness of his son. He could not but weep, to think that one who came out of his bowels, and had so often lain in his arms, would thus lift up the heel against him. God himself is said to be grieved with the rebellions of his own children, (Ps. 95. 10.) and even broken with their whorish heart, Ezek. 6. 9. (2.) There was much of the displeasure of his God in it; this infused the wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery, Lam. 3. 19. His sin was ever before him, (Ps. 51. 3.) but never so plain, nor ever appearing so black, as now. He never wept thus when Saul hunted him, but a wounded conscience makes troubles lie heavy, Ps. 38. 4. 2. When David wept, all his company wept likewise, being much affected with his grief, and willing to share in it. It is our duty to weep with those that weep, especially our superiors, and those that are better than we; for, if this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? We must weep with those that weep for sin. When Hezekiah humbled himself for his sin, all Jerusalem joined with him, 2. Chron. 32. 26. To prevent suffering with sinners, let us sorrow with them.

31. And one told David, saying, Ahithophel is among the conspirators with Absalom. And David said, O LORD, I pray thee, to turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness. 32. And it came to pass, that when David was come to the top of the mount, where he worshipped God, behold, Hushai the Archite came to meet him, with his coat rent, and earth upon his head: 33. Unto whom David said, If thou passest on with me, then thou shalt be a burden unto me: 34. But if thou return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king; as I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also be thy servant: then mayest thou for me defeat the counsel of Ahithophel. 35. And hast thou not there with thee Zadok and Abiathar the priests? therefore it shall be, that what thing soever thou shalt hear out of the king's house, thou shalt tell it to Zadok and Abiathar the priests. 36. Behold, they have there with them their two sons, Ahimaaz, Zadok's son, and Jonathan, Abiathar's son; and by them ye shall send unto me every thing that ye can hear. 37. So Hushai, David's friend, came into the city, and Absalom came into Jerusalem.

Nothing, it seems, appeared to David more threatening in Absalom's plot, than that Ahithophel was in it; for one good head, in such a design, is worth a thousand good hands. Absalom was himself no politician, but he had got one entirely in his interest that was, and would be the more dangerous, because he had been, all along, acquainted with David's counsels and affairs: if therefore he can be baffled, Absalom is as good as routed, and the head of the conspiracy cut off. This David endeavours to do.

1. By prayer. When he heard that Ahithophel was in the plot, he lifted up his heart to God, in this short prayer, Lord, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness, v. 31. He had not opportunity for a long prayer, but he was none of those that thought he should be heard for his much speaking. It was a fervent prayer, "Lord, I pray thee, do this." God is well pleased with the importunity of those that come to him with their petitions. David was particular in this prayer; he names the person whose counsels he prays against. God gives us leave, in prayer, to be humbly and reverently free with him, and to mention the particular care, and fear, and grief, that lies heavy upon us. He prays not against Ahithophel's person, but against his counsel, that God would turn it into foolishness; that though he was a wise man, he might, at this time, give foolish counsel; or, if he gave wise counsel, that it might be rejected as foolish: or, if it were followed, that, by some providence or other, it might be defeated, and not attain the end. David prayed this, in a firm belief that God has all hearts in his hand, and tongues too; that, when he pleases, he can take away the understandings of the aged, and make the judges fools, (Job 12. 17. Isa. 3. 2, 3.) and in hope that God would own and plead his just and injured cause. Note, We may pray in faith, and should pray with fervency, that God will turn that counsel into foolishness, which is taken against his people.

2. By policy. We must second our prayer with our endeavours, else we tempt God. It is good service to counterminde the policy of the church's enemies. When David came to the top of the mount, he worshipped God, v. 32. Note, Weeping must not hinder worshipping, but quicken it rather. Now he penned the third Psalm, as appears by the title; and some think that his singing it, was the worship he now paid to God. Just now Providence brought Hushai to him; while he was yet speaking, God heard, and sent him the person that should be instrumental to befool Ahithophel. He came to condole with David on his present trouble, with his rent, and earth upon his head; but David, having a great deal of confidence in his conduct and faithfulness, resolved to employ him in the nature of a spy upon Absalom: he would not take him with him, (v. 33.) for he had now more need of soldiers than counsellors, but sent him back to Jerusalem, to wait for Absalom's arrival, as a deserter from David, and to offer him his service, v. 34. Thus he might insinuate himself into his counsels, and defeat Ahithophel, either by dissuading Absalom from following his advice, or by discovering it to David, that he might know where to stand upon his guard. How this gross dissimulation, which David put Hushai upon, can be justified as a stratagem in war, I do not see. The best that can be made of it is, that Absalom, if he rebel against his father, must stand upon his guard against all mankind, and if he will be deceived, let him be deceived. David recommends him to Zadok and Abiathar, as persons proper to be consulted with, (v. 35.) and to their two sons, as trusty men to be sent on errands to David, v. 36. Hushai, thus instructed, came to Jerusalem, (v. 37.) whither also Absalom soon after came with his forces. How soon do royal palaces and royal cities change their masters! But we look for a kingdom which cannot be thus shaken, and in the possession of which we cannot be disturbed.

CHAP. XVI.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, we left David flying from Jerusalem, and Absalom entering into it; in this chapter, I. We are to follow David in his melancholy flight; and there we find him, 1. Cheated by Ziba, v. 1.. 4. 2. Cursed by Shimei, which he bears with wonderful patience, v. 5.. 14. II. We are to meet Absalom in his triumphant entry; and there we find him, 1. Cheated by Hushai, v. 15.. 19. 2. Counsellor by Ahithophel to go in unto his father's concubines, v. 20.. 23.

1. AND when David was a little past the top of the hill, behold, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and a hundred bunches of raisins, and a hundred of summer fruits, and a bottle of wine. 2. And the king said unto Ziba, What meanest thou by these? And Ziba said, The asses be for the king's household to ride on; and the bread and summer fruit for the young men to eat; and the wine, that such as be faint in the wilderness may drink. 3. And the king said, And where is thy master's son? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem: for he said, To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father. 4. Then said the king to Ziba, Behold, thine are all that pertained unto Mephibosheth. And Ziba said, I humbly beseech thee that I may find grace in thy sight, my lord, O king.

We read before how kind David was to Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, how he prudently entrusted his servant Ziba with the management of his estate, while he generously entertained him at his own table, ch. 9. 10. This matter was well settled; but, it seems, Ziba is not content to be manager, he longs to be master, of Mephibosheth's estate. Now he thinks is his time to make himself so; if he can procure a grant of it from the crown, he hopes, whether David or Absalom get the better, it is all one to him, he shall secure his prey, which he promises himself by fishing in troubled waters. In order hereunto,

1. He makes David a handsome present of provisions, which was the more welcome, because it came seasonably; (v. 1.) and with this he designed to incline him to himself; for a man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men, Prov. 18. 16. Nay, whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth, Prov. 17. 8. David inferred from this, that Ziba was a very discreet and generous man, and well affected to him, when, in all, he designed nothing but to make his own market, and to get Mephibosheth's estate settled upon him. Shall the prospect of advantage in this world, make men generous to the rich; and shall not the belief of an abundant recompense in the resurrection of the just, make us charitable to the poor? Luke 14. 14. Ziba was very considerate in the present that he brought to David; it was what would do him some good in his present distress, v. 2. Observe, The wine is intended for those that were faint, not for the king's own drinking, or the courtiers; it seems, they did not commonly use it, but it was for cordials for them that were ready to perish, Prov. 31. 6. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy princes use wine for strength, as David did, and not for drunkenness, as Absalom did, ch. 13. 28. See Eccl. 10. 17. Whatever Ziba intended in this present, God's providence sent it in to David for his support very graciously. God makes use of bad men for good purposes to his people, and sends them meat by ravens.

2. Having by his present insinuated himself into David's affection, and gained credit with him, the next thing he has to do for the compassing of his end, is, to incense him against Mephibosheth, which he does by a false accusation, representing him as ungratefully designing to raise himself by the present broils, and to recover the crown to his own head, now that David and his son were contending for it. David inquires for him as one of his family, which gives Ziba occasion to tell this false story of him, v. 3. What immense damages do masters often sustain by the lying tongues of their servants! David knew Mephibosheth not to be an ambitious man, but easy in his place, and well affected to him and his government; nor could he be so weak as to expect with his lame legs to climb the ladder of preferment; yet he gives credit to the calumny, and, without further inquiry or consideration, convicts Mephibosheth of treason, seizes his lands as forfeited, and grants them to Ziba; Behold, thine are all that pertained to Mephibosheth; (v. 4.) a rash judgment, and which afterward he was ashamed of, when the truth came to light, ch. 19. 29. Princes cannot help it, but they will be sometimes (as our law speaks) deceived in their grants; but they ought to use all means possible to discover the truth, and to guard against malicious designing men, who would impose upon them, as Ziba did upon David, who, having by his wiles gained his point, triumphed over the king's credulity, congratulated himself on his own success, and parted, with a great compliment upon the king, that he valued his favour more than Mephibosheth's estate, "Let me find grace in thy sight, O king, and I have enough." Great men ought always to be jealous of flatterers, and remember that nature has given them two ears, that they may hear both sides.

5. And when king David came to Bahurim, behold, thence came out a man of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gera: he came forth, and cursed still as he came. 6. And he cast stones at David, and at all the servants of king David: and all the people and all the mighty men were on his right hand and on his left. 7. And thus said Shimei when he cursed, Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial: 8. The LORD hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul, in whose stead thou hast reigned; and the LORD hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son: and, behold, thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody man. 9. Then said Abishai the son of Zeruiah unto the king, Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king? let me go over, I pray thee, and take off his head. 10. And the king said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? So let him curse, because the LORD hath said unto him, Curse David. Who shall then say, Wherefore hast thou done so? 11. And David said to Abishai, and to all his servants, Behold, my son, which came forth of my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more now may this Benjamite do it? Let him alone, and let him curse: for the LORD hath bidden him. 12. It may be that the LORD will look on mine affliction, and that the LORD will requite me good for his cursing this day. 13. And as David and his men went by the way, Shimei went along on the hill's side over against him, and cursed as he went, and threw stones at him, and cast dust. 14. And the king, and all the people that were with him, came weary, and refreshed themselves there.

We here find how David bore Shimei's curses much better than he had borne Ziba's flatteries; by those he was brought to pass a wrong judgment on another, by these to pass a right judgment on himself; the world's smiles are more dangerous than its frowns. Observe here,

1. How insolent and furious Shimei was, and how his malice took occasion from David's present distress, to be so much the more outrageous. David, in his flight, was come to Bahurim, a city of Benjamin, in or near which, this Shimei lived, who, being of the house of Saul, (with the fall of which all his hopes of preferment fell,) had an implacable enmity to David, unjustly looking upon him as the ruin of Saul and his family, only because, by the divine appointment, he succeeded it. While David was in prosperity and power, Shimei hated him as much as he did now, but durst not then say any thing against him; (God knows what is in the hearts of those that are disaffected to him and his government, earthly princes do not); but now he came forth, and cursed David with all the bad words and wishes he could invent, v. 5. He took this opportunity to give vent to his malice, 1. Because now he thought he might do it safely; yet, if David had thought proper to resent the provocation, it had cost Shimei his life. 2. Because now it would be most grievous to David, would add affliction to his grief, and pour vinegar into his wounds. He complains of them as most barbarous, who talk to the grief of those whom God has wounded, Ps. 69. 26. So Shimei did, loading him with curses, which no generous eye could look upon without compassion. 3. Because now he thought that Providence justified his reproaches, and that David's present afflictions proved him to be as bad a man as he was willing to represent him. Job's friends condemned him upon this false principle. They that are under the rebukes of a gracious God, must not think it strange if these bring upon them the reproaches of evil men. If once it be said, God hath forsaken him, presently it follows, Persecute and take him, Ps. 71. 11. But it is the character of a base spirit thus to trample upon those that are down, and insult over them.

See, (1.) What this wretched man did: He cast stones at David, (v. 6.) as if his king had been a dog, or the worst of criminals, whom all Israel must stone with stones till he die. Perhaps he kept at such a distance, that the stones he threw, could not reach David, nor any of his attendants, yet he showed what he would have done, if it had been in his power. He cast dust, (v. 13.) which, probably, would blow into his own eyes, like the curses he threw, which, being causeless, would return upon his own head. Thus, while his malice made him odious, the impotency of it made him ridiculous and contemptible. They that fight against God, though they hate him, cannot hurt him. If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? Job 35. 6. It was an aggravation of his wickedness, that David was attended with his mighty men on his right hand and on his left, so that he was not in so forlorn a condition as he thought; (persecuted, but not forsaken;) and that he continued to do it, and did it the more passionately, for David's bearing it patiently.

(2.) What he said. With the stones he shot his arrows, even bitter words, (v. 7, 8.) in contempt of that law, Thou shalt not curse the gods, Exod. 22. 28. David was a man of honour and conscience, and in great reputation for every thing that is just and good; what could this foul mouth say against him? Why truly, what was done long since to the house of Saul, is the only thing which he can recall, and with which he upbraids him, because that was the thing that he himself was a loser by. See how apt we are to judge of men and their character, by what they are to us; and to conclude that those are certainly evil men, that have ever so justly been, or that we ever so unjustly think have been, instruments of evil to us. So partial are we to ourselves, that no rule can be more fallacious than this. No man could be more innocent of the blood of the house of Saul than David was. Once and again he spared Saul's life, while Saul sought his. When Saul and his sons were slain by the Philistines, David and his men were many miles off; and, when they heard it, lamented it. From the murder of Abner and Ish-bosheth he had sufficiently cleared himself; and yet all the blood of the house of Saul must be laid at his door: innocence is no fence against malice and falsehood; nor are we to think it strange, if we be charged with that which we have been most careful to keep ourselves from. It is well for us, that men are not to be our judges, but He, whose judgment is according to truth.

The blood of the house of Saul is here most unjustly charged upon him, [1.] As that which gave him his character, and denominated him a bloody man, and a man of Belial, v. 7. And if a man of blood, no doubt, a man of Belial, that is, a child of the Devil, (who is called Belial, 2 Cor. 6. 15.) and who was a murderer from the beginning. Bloody men are the worst of men. [2.] As that which brought the present trouble upon him; "Now that thou art dethroned, and driven out to the wilderness, the Lord has returned upon thee the blood of the house of Saul." See how forward malicious men are to press God's judgments into the service of their own passion and revenge. If any, who, they think, has wronged them, come into trouble, that must be made the cause of the trouble. But we must take heed, lest we wrong God by making his providence thus to patronize our foolish and unjust resentments. As the wrath of man works not the righteousness of God, so the righteousness of God serves not the wrath of man. [3.] As that which would now be his utter ruin; for he endeavours to make him despair of ever recovering his throne again, (now they said, There is no help for him in God, Ps. 3. 2.) The Lord hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom, (not Mephibosheth, the house of Saul never dreamed of making him king, as Ziba suggested,) and thou art taken in thy mischief; that is, "the mischief that will be thy destruction, and all, because thou art a bloody man." Thus Shimei cursed.

II. See how patient and submissive David was, under this abuse. The sons of Zeruiah, Abishai particularly, were forward to maintain David's honour with their swords; they resented the affront keenly, as well they might; Why should this dead dog be suffered to curse the king? v. 9. If David will but give them leave, they will put these lying cursing lips to silence, and take off his head; for his throwing stones at the king was an overt-act, which abundantly proved that he compassed and imagined his death. But the king would by no means suffer it, What have I to do with you? So let him curse. Thus Christ rebuked the disciples, who, in zeal for his honour, would have fire from heaven on the town that affronted him, Luke 9. 55. Let us see with what considerations David quieted himself.

1. The chief thing that silenced him, was, that he had deserved it: this is not mentioned indeed; for a man may truly repent, and yet needs not, upon all occasions, proclaim his penitent reflections. Shimei unjustly upbraided him with the blood of Saul; from that his conscience acquitted him, but, at the same time, charged him with the blood of Uriah: "The reproach is too true," (thinks David,) "though false as he means it." Note, A humble tender spirit will turn reproaches into reproofs, and so get good by them, instead of being provoked by them.

2. He observes the hand of God in it; The Lord hath said unto him, Curse David; (v. 10.) and again, So let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him, v. 11. As it was Shimei's sin, it was not from God, but from the Devil, and his own wicked heart, nor did God's hand in it excuse or extenuate it, much less justify it, any more than it did their sin, who put Christ to death, Acts 2. 24.—4. 28. But as it was David's affliction, it was from the Lord, one of the evils which he raised up against him. David looked above the instrument of his trouble to the supreme director, as Job, when the plunderers had stripped him, acknowledges, The Lord hath taken away. Nothing more proper to quiet a gracious soul under affliction, than an eye to the hand of God in it: I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it. The scourge of the tongue is God's rod.

3. He quiets himself under the lesser affliction, with the consideration of the greater; (v. 11.) My son seeks my life, much more may this Benjamite. Note, Tribulation works patience in those that are sanctified. The more we bear, the better able we should be to bear still more; what tries our patience, should improve it. The more we are inured to trouble, the less we should be surprised at it, and not think it strange. Marvel not that enemies are injurious, when even friends are unkind; nor that friends are unkind, when even children are undutiful.

4. He comforts himself with hopes that God would, some way or other, bring good to him out of his affliction, would balance the trouble itself, and recompense his patience under it; "The Lord will requite me good for his cursings." If God bid Shimei grieve me, it is that he himself may the more sensibly comfort me; surely he has mercy in store for me, which he is preparing me for by this trial." We may depend upon God as our Paymaster, not only for our services, but for our sufferings. Let them curse, but bless thou. David, at length, is housed at Bahurim, (v. 14.) where he meets with refreshment, and is hidden from this strife of tongues.

15. And Absalom, and all the people, the men of Israel, came to Jerusalem, and Ahithophel with him. 16. And it came to pass, when Hushai the Archite, David's friend, was come unto Absalom, that Hushai said unto Absalom, God save the king, God save the king. 17. And Absalom said to Hushai, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? why wentest thou not with thy friend? 18. And Hushai said unto Absalom, Nay; but whom the Lord, and this people, and all the men of Israel, choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide. 19. And again, whom should I serve? should I not serve in the presence of his son? As I have served in thy father's presence, so will I be in thy presence. 20. Then said Absalom to Ahithophel, Give counsel among you what we shall do. 21. And Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Go in unto thy father's concubines, which he hath left to keep the house; and all Israel shall hear that thou art abhorred of thy father: then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. 22. So they spread Absalom a tent upon the top of the house; and Absalom went in unto his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel. 23. And the counsel of Ahithophel, which he counselled in those days, was as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God: so was all the counsel of Ahithophel, both with David and with Absalom.

Absalom had notice sent him speedily by some of his friends at Jerusalem, that David was withdrawn, and with what a small retinue he was gone; so that the coasts were clear, Absalom might take possession of Jerusalem when he pleased. The gates were open, and there were none to oppose him. Accordingly, he came without delay, (v. 15.) extremely elevated, no doubt, with this success at first, and that that, in which, when he formed his design, probably, he apprehended the greatest difficulty, was so easily and effectually done. Now that he is master of Jerusalem, he concludes all his own, the country will follow of course. God suffers wicked men to prosper a while in their wicked plots, even beyond their expectation, that their disappointment may be the more grievous and disgraceful.

The most celebrated politicians of that age, were, Ahithophel and Hushai; the former Absalom brings with him to Jerusalem, (v. 15.) the other meets him there; (v. 16.) so that he cannot but think himself sure of success, when he has both these to be his counsellors; on them he relies, and consults not the ark, though he had that with them. But miserable counsellors were they both; for,

I. Hushai would never counsel him to do wisely; he was really his enemy, and designed to betray him, while he pretended to be in his interest; so that he could not have a more dangerous man about him. 1. Hushai complimented him upon his accession to the throne, as if he were abundantly satisfied in his title, and well pleased that he was come to the possession, v. 16. What arts of dissimulation are those tempted to use, who govern themselves by fleshly wisdom; and how happy are they, who have not known these depths of Satan, but have their conversation in the world with simplicity and godly sincerity! 2. Absalom is surprised to find him for him, who was known to be David's intimate friend and confidant. He asks him, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? (v. 17.) pleasing himself with this thought, that all would be his, since Hushai was. He doubts not of his sincerity, but easily believes what he wishes to be true, that David's best friends were so in love with him, as to take the first opportunity to declare for him, though the pride of his heart deceived him, Obad. 3. 3. Hushai still makes him believe he is hearty for him. For though David is his friend, yet he is for the king in possession, v. 18. Whom the people chose, and Providence smiles upon, he will be faithful to; and he is for the king in succession, (v. 19.) the rising sun. It was true, he loved his father; but he had had his day, and it was over; and why should he not love his successor as well? Thus he pretends to give reasons for a resolution he abhorred the thought of.

II. Ahithophel did counsel him to do wickedly, and so did as effectually betray him, as he did, who was designedly false to him. For they that advise men to sin, certainly advise them to their hurt; and that government which is founded in sin, is founded in the sand. It seems, Ahithophel was noted as a deep politician; his counsel was as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God, v. 23. Such reputation was he in for subtilty and sagacity in public affairs, such reaches had he beyond other privy-counsellors, such reasons would he give for his advice, and such success, generally, his projects had, that all people, good and bad, both David and Absalom, had a profound regard to his sentiments, too much by far, when they regarded him as an oracle of God: shall the prudence of any mortal compare with Him who is only wise? Let us observe from this account of Ahithophel's fame for policy, 1. That many excel in worldly wisdom, who are utterly destitute of heavenly grace, because those who set up oracles for themselves, are apt to despise the oracles of God. God has chosen the foolish things of the world, and the greatest statesmen are seldom the greatest saints. 2. That frequently the great politicians act most foolishly for themselves. Ahithophel is cried up for an oracle, and yet very unwisely takes part with Absalom, who was not only a usurper, but a rash youth, never likely to come to good; whose fall, and the fall of all that adhered to him, any one, with the tenth part of the policy that Ahithophel pretended to, might foresee. Well, after all, honesty is the best policy, and will be found so in the long run.

Observe, (1.) The wicked counsel Ahithophel gave to Absalom: finding that David had left his concubines to keep the house, he advises him to lie with them, (v. 21.) a very wicked thing; the divine law had made it a capital crime, Lev. 20. 11. The apostle speaks of it as a piece of villany, not so much as named among the Gentiles, 1 Cor. 5. 1. Reuben lost his birth-right for it. But Ahithophel advised to it as a political thing, because it would give assurance to all Israel, [1.] That he was in good earnest in his pretensions; no doubt, he resolved to make himself master of all that belonged to his predecessor, when he began with his concubines. [2.]

That he was resolved never to make peace with his father upon any terms; for, by this, he would render himself so odious to his father, that he would never be reconciled to him, which, perhaps, the people were jealous of, and that they must be sacrificed to the reconciliation. Having drawn the sword, he did, by this provocation, throw away the scabbard, which would strengthen the hands of his party, and keep them tight to him. This was his cursed policy, which bespoke him rather an oracle of the Devil, than of God.

(2.) Absalom's compliance with this counsel. It entirely suited his lewd and wicked mind, and he delayed not to put it in execution, v. 22. When an unnatural rebellion was the opera, what fitter prologue could there be to it than such unnatural lust? Thus was his wickedness all of a piece, and such as a conscience, not quite seared, could not entertain the thoughts of without the utmost horror. Nay, the client outdoes what his counsel advises: Ahithophel bid him do it, that all Israel might hear of it; but as if that were not enough, so perfectly lost is he to all honour and virtue, he will do it, and all Israel shall see it. A tent is, accordingly, spread on the top of the house for the purpose; so impudently did he declare his sin as Sodom. Yet, in this, the word of God was fulfilled in the letter of it: God had threatened, by Nathan, that, for his defiling of Bath-sheba, he should have his own wives publicly debauched; (ch. 12. 11, 12.) and some think that Ahithophel, in advising it, designed to be revenged on David for the injury done to Bath-sheba, who was his grand-daughter: for she was the daughter of Eliam, (ch. 11. 3.) who was the son of Ahithophel, ch. 23. 34. Job speaks of a circumstance like this, as the just punishment of adultery, (ch. 31. 9, 10.) and the prophet, Hos. 4. 13, 14. What to think of these concubines, who submitted to this wickedness, it were easy to say; but how unrighteous soever Absalom and they are, we must say, The Lord is righteous: nor shall any word of his fall to the ground.

CHAP. XVII.

The contest between David and Absalom is now drawing towards a crisis. It must be determined by the sword, and preparation is made, accordingly, in this chapter. I. Absalom calls a council of war, in which Ahithophel urges to despatch, (v. 1. 4.) but Hushai recommends deliberation, (v. 5. 13.) and Hushai's counsel is agreed to, (v. 14.) for vexation at which, Ahithophel hangs himself, v. 23. II. Secret intelligence is sent to David, (but with much difficulty,) of their proceedings, v. 15. 21. III. David marches to the other side Jordan, (v. 22. 24.) and there his camp is victualled by some of his friends in that country, v. 27. 29. IV. Absalom and his forces march after him into the land of Gilead on the other side Jordan, v. 25, 26. There we shall, in the next chapter, find the cause decided by a battle: hitherto, every thing has looked black upon poor David, but now the day of his deliverance begins to dawn.

1. MOREOVER, Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Let me now choose out twelve thousand men, and I will arise and pursue after David this night: 2. And I will come upon him while he is weary and weak-handed, and will make him afraid: and all the people that are with him shall flee; and I will smite the king only. 3. And I will bring back all the people unto thee: the man whom thou seekest is as if all returned: so all the people shall be in peace. 4. And the saying pleased Absalom well, and all the elders of Israel. 5. Then said Absalom, Call now Hushai the Archite also, and let us hear likewise what he saith. 6. And when Hushai was come to Absalom, Absalom spake unto him, saying, Ahithophel hath spoken after this manner: shall we do after his saying? if not, speak thou. 7. And Hushai said unto Absalom, The counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not good at this time. 8. For, said Hushai, thou knowest thy father and his men, that they be mighty men, and they be chafed in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field: and thy father is a man of war, and will not lodge with the people. 9. Behold, he is hid now in some pit, or in some other place: and it will come to pass, when some of them be overthrown at the first, that whosoever heareth it will say, There is a slaughter among the people that follow Absalom. 10. And he also that is valiant, whose heart is as the heart of a lion, shall utterly melt: for all Israel knoweth that thy father is a mighty man, and they which be with him are valiant men. 11. Therefore I counsel, that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee, from Dan even to Beersheba, as the sand that is by the sea for multitude, and that thou go to battle in thine own person. 12. So shall we come upon him in some place where he shall be found, and we will light upon him as the dew falleth on the ground: and of him and of all the men that are with him there shall not be left so much as one. 13. Moreover, if he be gotten into a city, then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river, until there be not one small stone found there. 14. And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, The counsel of Hushai the Archite is better than the counsel of Ahithophel. For the LORD had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that the LORD might bring evil upon Absalom.

Absalom is in peaceable possession of Jerusalem, the palace-royal is his own, and the thrones of judgment, even the thrones of the house of David. His good father reigned in Hebron, and only over the tribe of Judah, above seven years, and was not hasty to destroy his rival: his government was built upon a divine promise, which he was sure of the performance of in due time, and therefore he waited patiently in the mean time. But the young man, Absalom, not only hastens from Hebron to Jerusalem, but is impatient there, till he has destroyed his father; cannot be content with his throne till he has his life; for his government is founded in iniquity, and therefore feels itself tottering, and thinks itself obliged to do every thing with violence. That so profligate a wretch as Absalom should aim at the throne of so good a father, is not so strange; (there are here and there monsters in nature;) but that the body of the people of Israel, to whom David had been so great a blessing in all respects, should join with him in it, is very amazing. But their fathers often mutinied against Moses. The best of parents, and the best of princes, will not think it strange, if they be made uneasy by those who should be their support and joy, when they consider what sons and what subjects David himself had.

David, and all that adhered to him, must be cut off. That is resolved, for aught that appears, nemine contradicente—unanimously. None dares mention his personal merits, and great services done to his country, in opposition to this resolve, nor so much as ask, "Why, what evil has he done, to forfeit his crown, much less his head?" None dares propose that his banishment suffice, for the present, or that agents be sent to treat with him to resign the crown, which, having so tamely quitted the city, they might think he would easily be persuaded to do. It was not long since Absalom himself fled for a crime, and David contented himself with his being an exile, though he deserved death, nay, he mourned and longed for him; but so perfectly void of all natural affection is this ungrateful Absalom, that he perfectly thirsts after his own father's blood. It is past dispute, David must be destroyed, all the question is, how it may be done.

I. Ahithophel advises that he be pursued immediately, this very night, with a flying army, which he himself undertakes the command of, that the king only be smitten and his forces dispersed, and then the people that were now for him, would fall in with Absalom, of course, and there would not be such a long war as had been between the house of Saul and David, v. 1. 3, The man whom thou seekest, is as if all returned. By this, it appears that Absalom had declared his design to be upon David's life, and Ahithophel concurs with him in it; Smite the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered, and be an easy prey to the wolf. Thus he contrives to include the war in a little compass, by fighting neither with small nor great, but the king of Israel only, and to conclude it in a little time, by falling upon him immediately. Nothing could have been more fatal to David, than the taking of these measures. It was too true, that he was weary and weak-handed; that a little thing would make him afraid, else he had not fled from his house, upon the first alarm of Absalom's rebellion. It was probable enough that, upon a fierce attack, especially in the night, the small force he had, would be put into confusion and disorder, and it would be an easy thing to smite the king only, and then the business was done, the whole nation would be reduced, of course, and all the people, says he, shall be in peace. See how a general ruin is called, by usurpers, a general peace; but thus the Devil's palace is in peace, while he, as a strong man armed, keeps it. Compare with this the plot of Caiaphas (that second Ahithophel) against the Son of David, to crush his interest by destroying him; Let that one man die for the people, John 11. 50. Kill the heir, and the inheritance shall be our's. Matth. 21. 38. But the counsel of them both was turned into foolishness. Yet the children of light may, in their generation, learn wisdom from the children of this world. What our hand finds to do, let us do quickly, and with all our might. It is prudence to be vigorous and expeditious, and not to lose time. Particularly in our spiritual warfare, if Satan flee from us, let us follow our blow.

They that have quarrelled with crowned heads, have generally observed the decorum of declaring only against their evil counsellors, and calling them to an account, the king himself can do no wrong, it is they that do it; but Absalom's bare-faced villany strikes at the king directly, nay, at the king only; for, (would you think it?) this saying, I will smite the king only, pleased Absalom well; (v. 4.) nor had he so much sense of honour and virtue left him, as to pretend to startle at it, or even to be reluctant in this barbarous and monstrous resolution. What good can stand before the heat of a furious ambition?

II. Hushai advises that they be not too hasty in pursuing David, but take time to draw up all their force against him, and to overpower him with numbers, as Ahithophel had advised to take him by surprise. Now Hushai, in giving this counsel, really intended to serve David and his interest; that he might have time to send him notice of his proceedings, and that David might gain time to gather an army, and to remove into those countries beyond Jordan, which, lying more remote, Absalom, probably, had got least interest in. Nothing would be of greater advantage to David in this juncture, than time to turn himself in; that he may have that, Hushai counsels Absalom to do nothing rashly, but to proceed with caution, and secure his success by securing his strength.

Now, 1. Absalom gave Hushai a fair invitation to advise him. All the elders of Israel approved of Ahithophel's counsel, yet God overruled the heart of Absalom not to proceed upon it, till he had advised with Hushai, (v. 5.) Let us hear what he saith. Herein he thought he did wisely, (two heads are better than one,) but God taketh the wise in their own craftiness. See Mr. Poole's note on this.

2. Hushai gave good reasons for what he said.

(1.) He argued against Ahithophel's counsel, and undertook to show the danger of following his advice. It is with modesty, and all possible deference to his settled reputation, that he begs leave to differ from him, v. 7. The counsel of Ahithophel is usually the best, and such as may be relied on; but, with submission to that noble peer, he is of opinion that his counsel is not good at this time, for it was by no means safe to venture so great a cause as that in which they were now engaged, upon so small a number, and such a hasty sally, as Ahithophel advised; remembering the defeat of Israel before Ai, Josh. 7. 4. It has often proved of bad consequence to despise an enemy. See how plausibly Hushai reasons: [1.] He insists much upon it, that David was a great soldier, a man of great conduct, courage, and experience; all knew and owned this, even Absalom himself: Thy father is a man of war, (v. 8.) a mighty man, (v. 10.) and not so weary and weak-handed as Ahithophel imagines. He, retiring from Jerusalem must be imputed, not to his cowardice, but to his prudence. [2.] His attendants, though few, were mighty men, (v. 8.) valiant men, (v. 10.) men of celebrated bravery, and versed in all the arts of war. Ahithophel, who perhaps had worn the gown more than the sword, would find himself an unequal match for them. One of them would chase a thousand. [3.] They were all exasperated against Absalom, who was the author of all this mischief, were chafed in their minds, and would fight with the utmost fury; so that, what with their courage, and what with their rage, there would be no standing before them, especially for such raw soldiers as Absalom's generally were. Thus does he represent them as formidable as Ahithophel had made them despicable. [4.] He suggests that, probably, David and some of his men would lie in ambush, in some pit, or other close place, and fall upon Absalom's soldiers before they were aware, the terror of which would put them to flight; and the defeat, though but of a small party, would dispirit all the rest, especially their own consciences, at the same time accusing them of treason against one that, they were sure, was not only God's anointed, but a man after his own heart, v. 9. "It will soon be given out, that there is a slaughter among Absalom's men, and then they will all make the best of their way, and the heart of Ahithophel himself, though now it seems like the heart of a lion, will utterly melt away. In short, he will not find it so easy a matter to deal with David and his men as he thinks it is; and if he be foiled, we are all routed."

(2.) He offered his own advice; and gave his reasons; and,

[1.] He counselled that which he knew would gratify Absalom's proud vain-glorious humour, though it would not be really serviceable to his interest. First, He advises that all Israel should be gathered together, that is, the militia of all the tribes; his taking it for granted that they were all for him, and giving him an opportunity to see them altogether under his command, would gratify him as much as any thing. Secondly, He advises that Absalom go to battle in his own person, as if he looked upon him to be a better soldier than Ahithophel, more fit to give command, and have the honour of the victory, insinuating that Ahithophel had put a slight upon him, in offering to go without him: see how easy it is to betray proud men, by applauding them, and feeding their pride.

[2.] He counselled that which seemed to secure the success, at last, infallibly, without running any hazard. For if they could raise such vast numbers as they promised themselves, wherever they found him, they should not fail to crush him. First, If in the field, they should fall upon him, as the dew that covers the face of the ground, and cut off all his men with him, v. 12. Perhaps, Absalom was better pleased with the design of cutting off all the men that were with him, having a particular antipathy to some of David's friends, than with Ahithophel's project of smiting the king only. Thus Hushai gained his point by humouring his revenge, as well as his pride. Secondly, If in a city, they need not fear conquering him, for they should have hands enough, if occasion were, to draw the city itself into its river with ropes, v. 13. This strange suggestion, how impracticable soever, being new, served for an amusement, and recommended itself by pleasing the fancy, for they would all smile at the humour of it.

By all these arts, Hushai gained not only Absalom's approbation of his advice, but the unanimous concurrence of this great council of war; they all agreed that the counsel of Hushai was better than the counsel of Ahithophel, v. 14. See here, First, How much the policy of man can do: if Hushai had not been there, Ahithophel's counsel had certainly prevailed; and though all had given their opinion, nothing could be really more for Absalom's interest than that which he advised, yet Hushai, with his management, brings them all over to his side; and none of them are aware, that he says all this in favour of David and his interest, but all say as he says. See how the unthinking part are imposed upon by the designing part of mankind; what tools, what fools, great men make of one another by their intrigues; and what tricks there are often in courts, and councils, which they are happiest that are least conversant with. Secondly, See how much more the providence of God can do: Hushai managed the plot with dexterity, yet the success is ascribed to God, and his agency on the minds of those concerned; The Lord had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel. Be it observed, to the comfort of all that fear God, he turns all men's hearts as the rivers of waters, though they know not the thoughts of the Lord. He stands in the congregation of the mighty, has an overruling hand in all counsels, and a negative voice in all resolves, and laughs at men's projects against his anointed.

15. Then said Hushai unto Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, Thus and thus did Ahithophel counsel Absalom and the elders of Israel; and thus and thus have I counselled. 16. Now therefore send quickly, and tell David, saying, Lodge not this night in the plains of the wilderness, but speedily pass over; lest the king be swallowed up, and all the people that are with him. 17. Now Jonathan and Ahimaaz stayed by En-rogel, (for they might not be seen to come into the city;) and a wench went and told them; and they went and told king David. 18. Nevertheless a lad saw them, and told Absalom: but they went both of them away quickly, and came to a man's house in Bahurim, which had a well in his court, whither they went down. 19. And the woman took and spread a covering over the well's mouth, and spread ground corn thereon; and the thing was not known. 20. And when Absalom's servants came to the woman to the house, they said, Where is Ahimaaz and Jonathan? And the woman said unto them, They be gone over the brook of water. And when they had sought and could not find them, they returned to Jerusalem. 21. And it came to pass, after they were departed, that they came up out of the well, and went and told king David, and said unto David, Arise, and pass quickly over the water: for thus hath Ahithophel counselled against you.

We must now leave David's enemies pleasing themselves with thoughts of a sure victory, by following Hushai's counsel, and sending a summons, no doubt, to all the tribes of Israel, to come to the general rendezvous at a place appointed, pursuant to that counsel; and we next find David's friends consulting how to get him notice of all this, that he might steer his course accordingly. Hushai tells the priests what had passed in council, v. 15. But, it should seem, he was not sure, but that yet Ahithophel's counsel might be followed, and was therefore jealous, lest, if he made not the best of his way, the king would be swallowed up, and all the people that were with him, v. 16. Perhaps, as he was called in to give his advice, (v. 5.) so he was dismissed before they came to that resolve, (v. 14.) in favour of his advice. Or he feared they might afterward change their mind. However, it was good to provide against the worst, and therefore to hasten those valuable lives out of the reach of these destroyers.

Such strict guards did Absalom set upon all the avenues to Jerusalem, that they had much ado to get this necessary intelligence to David. 1. The young priests that were to be the messengers, were forced to retire secretly out of the city, by En-rogel; which signifies, as some say, the fountain of a spy. Surely it went ill with Jerusalem, when two such faithful priests as they were, might not be seen to come into the city. 2. Instructions were sent to them by a poor simple young woman, who, probably, went to that well under pretence of fetching water, v. 17. If she carried the message by word of mouth, there was danger of her making some mistake or blunder in it; but Providence can make an ignorant girl a trusty messenger, and serve its wise counsels by the foolish things of the world. 3. Yet, by the vigilance of Absalom's spies, they were discovered, and information brought to Absalom of their motions. A lad saw them, and told him, v. 18. 4. They being aware that they were discovered, sheltered themselves in a friend's house in Bahurim, where David had refreshed himself but just before, ch. 16. 14. There they were happily hid in a well, which now, in summer time, perhaps, was dry, v. 18. The woman of the house very ingeniously covered the mouth of the well with a cloth, on which she spread corn to dry, so that the pursuers were not aware that there was a well; else they had searched it, v. 19. Thus far, the woman did well; but we know not how to justify her further concealing them with a lie, v. 20. We must not do evil that good may come of it. However, hereby the messengers were protected, and the pursuers were defeated, and returned to Absalom without their prey. It was well that Absalom did not, hereupon, fall upon their two fathers, Zadok and Abiathar, as Saul on Ahimelech for his kindness to David; but God restrained him. Being thus preserved, they brought their intelligence very faithfully to David, (v. 21.) with this advice of his friends, that he should not delay to pass over Jordan, near to which, it seems, he now was. There, as some think, he penned the 42d and 43d Psalms, looking back upon Jerusalem from the land of Jordan, Ps. 42. 6.

22. Then David arose, and all the people that were with him, and they passed over Jordan: by the morning light there lacked not one of them that was not gone over Jordan. 23. And when Ahithophel saw that his counsel was not followed, he saddled his ass, and arose, and gat him home to his house, to his city, and put his household in order, and hanged himself, and died, and was buried in the sepulchre of his father. 24. Then David came to Mahanaim. And Absalom passed over Jordan, he and all the men of Israel with him. 25. And Absalom made Amasa captain of the host instead of Joab: which Amasa was a man's son whose name was Ithra, an Israelite, that went in to Abigail the daughter of Nahash, sister to Zeruiah, Joab's mother. 26. So Israel and Absalom pitched in the land of Gilead. 27. And it came to pass, when David was come to Mahanaim, that Shobi the son of Nahash of Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and Machir the son of Ammiel of Lo-debar, and Barzillai the Gileadite of Rogelim, 28. Brought beds, and basins, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse, 29. And honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David, and for the people that were with him, to eat: for they said, The people is hungry, and weary, and thirsty, in the wilderness.

Here is,

I. The transporting of David and his forces over Jordan, pursuant to the advice he had received from his friends at Jerusalem, v. 22. He, and all that were with him, went over in the night, whether in ferry boats, which, probably, always plied there, or through the fords, does not appear. But special notice may be taken of this, that there lacked not one of them; none deserted him, though his distress was great, none stayed behind sick or weary, nor were any lost or cast away in passing the river. Herein some make him a type of the Messiah, who said, in a difficult day, Of all that thou hast given me have I lost none. Being got over Jordan, he marched many miles forward to Mahanaim, a Levites' city in the tribe of Gad, in the utmost border of that tribe, and not far from Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites. This city, which Ishbosheth had made his royal city, (ch. 2. 8.) David now made his head-quarters, v. 24. And now he had time to raise an army wherewith to oppose the rebels, and give them a warm reception.

II. The death of Ahithophel, v. 23. He died by his own hands, felo de se—a suicide: he hanged himself for vexation that his counsel was not followed; for thereby, 1. He thought himself slighted, and an intolerable slur cast upon his reputation for wisdom. His judgment always used to sway at the council-board, but now another's opinion is thought wiser and better than his; his proud heart cannot bear the affront, it rises and swells, and the more he thinks of it, the more violent his resentments grow, till they bring him, at last, to this desperate resolve, not to live to see another preferred before him. All men think him a wise man, but he thinks himself the only wise man; and therefore, to be avenged upon mankind for not thinking so too, he will die, that wisdom may die with him. The world is not worthy of such an oracle as he is, and therefore he will make them know the want of him. See what real enemies they are to themselves, that think too well of themselves, and what mischiefs they run upon, that are impatient of contempt. That will break a proud man's heart, that will not break a humble man's sleep. 2. He thought himself endangered, and his life exposed. He concluded, that, because his counsel was not followed, Absalom's cause would certainly miscarry, and then, whoever would find David's mercy, he concluded, that he, who was the greatest criminal, and had particularly advised him to lie with his father's concubines, must be sacrificed to his justice; to prevent therefore the shame and terror of a public execution, he does justice upon himself, and after all his reputation for wisdom, by this, his last act, puts a far greater disgrace upon himself than Absalom's privy counsel had put upon him, and answers his name Ahithophel, which signifies, the brother of a fool. Nothing indicates so much folly as self-murder. Observe how deliberately he did it, and of malice prepense against himself; not in a heat, but he went home to his city, to his house, to do it; and, which is strange, took time to consider of it, and yet did it. And, to prove himself compos mentis—in his senses, when he did it, he first put his household in order, made his will as a man of sane memory and understanding, settled his estate, balanced his accounts; yet he that had sense and prudence enough to do this, had not consideration enough to revoke the sentence his pride and passion had passed upon his own neck, or so much as to suspend the execution of it till he saw the event of Absalom's rebellion. Now herein we may see, (1.) Contempt poured upon the wisdom of man; he that was more renowned for policy than any man, plays the fool with himself more abundantly. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, when he sees him that was so great an oracle, dying as a fool dies. (2.) Honour done to the justice of God. When the wicked are thus snares in the work of their own.

hands, and sunk in a pit of their own digging, the Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth, and we must say Higgaion, Selah; it is a thing to be marked and meditated upon, Ps. 7. 15, 16. (3.) Prayer answered, and an honest cause served even by its enemies. Now, as David had prayed, Ahithophel's counsel was turned into foolishness to himself. Dr. Lightfoot supposes that David penned the 55th Psalm, upon occasion of Ahithophel's being in the plot against him, and that he is the man complained of, (v. 13.) that had been his equal, his guide, and his acquaintance; and if so, this was an immediate answer to his prayer there, (v. 15.) Let death seize upon them, let them go down quick into hell. Ahithophel's death was an advantage to David's interest; for had he digested that affront, (as those must resolve often to do, that will live in this world,) and continued his post at Absalom's elbow, he might have given him counsel afterward, that might have been of pernicious consequence to David. It is well that that breath is stopped, and that head laid, from which nothing could be expected but mischief. It seems, it was not then usual to disgrace the dead bodies of self-murderers, for Ahithophel was buried, we may suppose, honourably buried, in the sepulchre of his father, though he deserved no better than the burial of an ass: see Eccl. 8. 10.

III. Absalom's pursuit of his father; he had now got all the men of Israel with him, as Hushai advised, and he himself at the head of them, passed over Jordan, v. 24. Not content that he had driven his good father to the utmost corner of his kingdom, he resolved to chase him out of the world. He pitched in the land of Gilead with all his forces, ready to give David battle, v. 26. Absalom made one Amasa his general, (v. 25.) whose father was, by birth, Jether, an Ishmaelite, (1 Chron. 2. 17.) but, by religion, Ithra, (as he is here called,) an Israelite; probably, he was not only proselyted, but, having married a near relation of David's, was, by some act of the state, naturalized, and is therefore called an Israelite. His wife, Amasa's mother, was Abigail, David's sister, whose other sister, Zeruiah, was Joab's mother, 1 Chron. 2. 16. So that Amasa was the same relation to David that Joab was. In honour to his family, even while he was in arms against his father, Absalom made him commander in chief of all his forces. Jesse is here called Nahash, for many had two names; or perhaps it was his wife's name.

IV. The friends David met with in this distant country. Even Shobi, a younger brother of the royal family of the Ammonites, was kind to him, v. 27. It is probable that he had detested the indignity which his brother Hanun had done to David's ambassadors, and, for that, had received favours from David, which he now returns. Those that think their prosperity most confirmed, know not but, some time or other, they may stand in need of the kindness of those that now lie at their mercy, and may be glad to be beholden to them; which is a reason, why we should, as we have opportunity, do good to all men, for he that watereth, shall be watered also himself, when there is occasion. Machir, the son of Ammiel, was he that maintained Mephibosheth, (ch. 9. 4.) till David eased him of that charge; and is now repaid for it by that generous man, who, it seems, was the common patron of distressed princes. Barzillai we shall hear of again. These, compassionating David and his men, now that they were weary with a long march, brought him furniture for his house, beds and basins; and provisions for his table, wheat and barley, &c. v. 28, 29. He did not put them under contribution, did not compel them to supply him, much less, plunder them; but, in token of their dutiful affection to him, their firm adherence to his government, and their sincere concern for him in his present straits, of their own good will they brought in plenty of all that which he had occasion for. Let us learn hence to be generous and open-handed, according as our ability is, to all in distress, especially great men, to whom it is most grievous, and good men, who deserve better treatment. Observe here, how God sometimes makes up to his people that comfort from strangers, which they are disappointed of in their own families.

CHAP. XVIII.

This chapter puts a period to Absalom's rebellion and life, and so makes way for David to his throne again, whither the next chapter brings him back in peace and triumph. We have here, I. David's preparations to engage the rebels, v. 1..5. II. The total defeat of Absalom's party, and their dispersion, v. 6..8. III. The death of Absalom, and his burial, v. 9..18. IV. The bringing of the tidings of it to David, who tarried at Mahanaim, v. 19..32. V. His bitter lamentations of Absalom, v. 33.

1. AND David numbered the people that were with him, and set captains of thousands and captains of hundreds over them. 2. And David sent forth a third part of the people under the hand of Joab, and a third part under the hand of Abishai the son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, and a third part under the hand of Ittai the Gittite. And the king said unto the people, I will surely go forth with you myself also. 3. But the people answered, Thou shalt not go forth: for if we flee away, they will not care for us; neither if half of us die will they care for us: but now thou art worth ten thousand of us: therefore now it is better that thou succour us out of the city. 4. And the king said unto them, What seemeth you best I will do. And the king stood by the gate side, and all the people came out by hundreds and by thousands. 5. And the king commanded Joab and Abishai and Ittai, saying, Deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with Absalom. And all the people heard when the king gave all the captains charge concerning Absalom. 6. So the people went out into the field against Israel: and the battle was in the wood of Ephraim; 7. Where the people of Israel were slain before the servants of David; and there was there a great slaughter that day of twenty thousand men. 8. For the battle was there scattered over the face of all the country: and the wood devoured more people that day than the sword devoured.

Which way David raised an army here, and what reinforcements were sent him, we are not told; many, it is likely, from all the coasts of Israel, at least, from the neighbouring tribes, came in to his assistance, so that, by degrees, he was able to make head against Absalom, as Ahithophel foresaw. Now here we have,

I. His army numbered and marshalled, v. 1, 2.

He had, no doubt, committed his cause to God by prayer, for that was his relief in all his afflictions; and then he took an account of his forces; Josephus says they were, in all, but about four thousand: these he divided into regiments, and companies, to each of which he appointed proper officers, and then disposed them, as is usual, into the right wing, the left wing, and the centre, two of which he committed to his two old experienced generals, Joab and Abishai, and the third to his new friend Ittai. Good order and good conduct may sometimes be as serviceable in an army, as great numbers. Wisdom teaches us to make the best of the strength we have, and let it reach to the utmost.

II. Himself over-persuaded not to go in person to the battle. He was Absalom's false friend, that persuaded him to go, and served his pride more than his prudence; David's true friends would not let him go, remembering what they had been told of Ahithophel's design to smite the king only. David showed his affection to them by being willing to venture with them; (v. 2.) and they showed their's to him by opposing it. We must never reckon it an affront to be gainsayed for our good, and by those that therein consult our interest. 1. They would by no means have him expose himself, for, (say they,) Thou art worth ten thousand of us. Thus ought good princes to be valued by their subjects, who, for their safety, must be willing to expose themselves. 2. They would not so far gratify the enemy, who would rejoice more in his fall, than in the defeat of the whole army. 3. He might be more serviceable to them by tarrying in the city, with a reserve of his forces there, whence he might send them recruits. That may be a post of real service, which yet is not a post of danger. The king acquiesced in their reasons, and changed his purpose; (v. 4.) What seemeth you best, I will do. It is no piece of wisdom to be stiff in our resolutions, but to be willing to hear reason, even from our inferiors, and to be overruled by their advice, when it appears to be for our own good. Whether the people's prudence had an eye to it or no, God's providence wisely ordered it, that David should not be in the field of battle: for then his tenderness had certainly interposed to save Absalom's life, whom God had determined to destroy.

III. The charge he gave concerning Absalom, v. 5. When the army was drawn out, rank and file, Josephus says, he encouraged them, and prayed for them, but withal bade them all take heed of doing Absalom any hurt. How does he render good for evil! Absalom would have David only smitten, David would have Absalom only spared. What foils are these to each other! Never was unnatural hatred to a father more strong than in Absalom; nor was ever natural affection to a child more strong than in David; each did his utmost, and showed what he could do; how bad it is possible for a child to be to the best of fathers; and how good it is possible for a father to be to the worst of children; as if it were designed to be a resemblance of man's wickedness toward God, and God's mercy toward man, of which it is hard to say, which is more amazing. "Deal gently," says David, "by all means, with the young man, even with Absalom, for my sake; he is a young man, rash and heady, and his age must excuse him; he is mine, whom I love; if ye love me, be not severe with him." This charge supposes David's strong expectation of success, having a good cause, and a good God: he doubts not but Absalom would lie at their mercy, and therefore bids them deal gently with him, spare his life, and reserve him for his judgment.

Bishop Hall thus descants on this; "What means this ill-placed love? This unjust mercy? Deal gently with a traitor? Of all traitors, with a son?

Of all sons, with an Absalom? That graceless darling of so good a father? And all this, for thy sake, whose crown, whose blood, he hunts after? For whose sake must he be pursued, if forborne for thine? Must the cause of the quarrel be the motive of mercy? Even in the holiest parents, nature may be guilty of an injurious tenderness, of a bloody indulgence. But was not this done in type of that unmeasurable mercy of the true King and Redeemer of Israel, who prayed for his persecutors, for his murderers; Father, forgive them. Deal gently with them for my sake." When God sends an affliction to correct his children, it is with this charge, "Deal gently with them for my sake;" for he knows our frame.

IV. A complete victory gained over Absalom's forces. The battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim, (v. 6.) so called from some memorable action of the Ephraimites there, though it lay in the tribe of Gad. David thought fit to meet the enemy with his forces at some distance, before they came up to Mahanaim, lest he should bring that city into trouble, which had so kindly sheltered him. The cause shall be decided by a pitched battle. Josephus represents the fight as very obstinate, but the rebels were at length totally routed, and 20,000 of them slain, v. 7. Now they smarted justly for their treason against their lawful prince, their uneasiness under so good a government, and their base ingratitude to so good a governor; and found what it was to take up arms for an usurper, who with his kisses and caresses, had wheedled them into their own ruin. Now where are the rewards, the preferments, the golden days, they promised themselves from him? Now they see what it is to take counsel against the Lord, and his anointed, and to think of breaking his bands asunder. And that they might see that God fought against them, 1. They are conquered by a few, an army, in all probability, much inferior to their's in number. 2. By that flight with which they hoped to save themselves, they destroyed themselves; the wood, which they sought to for shelter, devoured more than the sword: that they might see how, when they thought themselves safe from David's men, and said, Surely the bitterness of death is past, yet the justice of God pursued them, and suffered them not to live. What refuge can rebels find from divine vengeance? The pits and bogs, the stumps and thickets, and, as the Chaldee-paraphrast understands it, the wild beasts of the wood, were, probably, the death of multitudes of the dispersed distracted Israelites, beside the 20,000 that were slain with the sword. God herein fought for David, and yet fought against him; for all these that were slain were his own subjects, and the common interest of his kingdom was weakened by it. The Romans allowed no triumph for a victory in a civil war.

9. And Absalom met the servants of David. And Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away. 10. And a certain man saw it, and told Joab, and said, Behold, I saw Absalom hanged in an oak. 11. And Joab said unto the man that told him, And, behold, thou sawest him; and why didst thou not smite him there to the ground? and I would have given thee ten shekels of silver and a girdle. 12. And the man said unto

Joab, Though I should receive a thousand shekels of silver in mine hand, yet would I not put forth mine hand against the king's son: for in our hearing the king charged thee and Abishai and Ittai, saying, Beware that none touch the young man Absalom. 13. Otherwise I should have wrought falsehood against mine own life: for there is no matter hid from the king, and thou thyself wouldest have set thyself against me. 14. Then said Joab, I may not tarry thus with thee. And he took three darts in his hand, and thrust them through the heart of Absalom, while he was yet alive in the midst of the oak. 15. And ten young men that bare Joab's armour compassed about, and smote Absalom, and slew him. 16. And Joab blew the trumpet, and the people returned from pursuing after Israel: for Joab held back the people. 17. And they took Absalom, and cast him into a great pit in the wood, and laid a very great heap of stones upon him: and all Israel fled every one to his tent. 18. Now Absalom in his life-time had taken and reared up for himself a pillar, which is in the king's dale: for he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance: and he called the pillar after his own name: and it is called unto this day, Absalom's Place.

Here is Absalom quite at a loss; at his wit's end, first, and then at his life's end. He that began the fight, big with the expectation of triumphing over David himself, with whom, if he had had him in his power, he would not have dealt gently, is now in the greatest consternation, when he meets the servants of David, v. 9. Though they were forbidden to meddle with him, he durst not look them in the face; but, finding they were near him, he makes the best of his way, and so rides headlong upon his own destruction. Thus he that flies from the fear, shall fall into the pit, and he that getteth up out of the pit, shall be taken in the snare, Jer. 48. 44. David is inclined to spare him, but divine justice passes sentence upon him as a traitor, and sees it executed; that he hang by the neck, be caught alive, be embowelled, and his body disposed of disgracefully.

I. He is hanged by the neck. Riding furiously under the thick boughs of a great oak which hung low, and had been never cropped, either the twisted branches, or some one forked bough of the oak, caught hold of his head, either by his neck, or, as some think, by his long hair, which had been so much his pride, and was now justly made a halter for him, and there he hung, astonished, that he could not use his hands to help himself; or so entangled, that his hands could not help him, but the more he struggled the more he was embarrassed. This set him up for a fair mark to the servants of David, and he had the terror and shame of seeing himself thus exposed, while he could do nothing for his own relief, neither fight nor fly.

Observe concerning this, 1. That his mule went away from under him, as if glad to get clear of such a burthen, and resign it to the ignominious tree. Thus the whole creation groans under the burthen of man's corruption, but shall shortly be delivered from its load, Rom. 8. 21, 22. 2. That he hung between heaven and earth, as unworthy of either, as abandoned of both; earth would not keep him, heaven would not take him, hell therefore opens her mouth to receive him. 3. That this was a very surprising unusual thing; it was fit that it should be so, his crime being so monstrous: if, in his flight, his mule had thrown him, and left him half dead upon the ground, till the servants of David had come and despatched him, the same thing had been done as effectually; but that had been too common a fate for so uncommon a criminal; God will here, as in the case of those other rebels, Dathan and Abram, create a new thing, that it may be understood how much this man has provoked the Lord, Numb. 16. 29, 30. Absalom is here hung up, in terrorem—to frighten children from disobedience to their parents; see Prov. 30. 17.

II. He is caught alive by one of the servants of David, who went straight, and told Joab in what posture he found that arch rebel, v. 10. Thus was he set up for a spectacle, as well as a mark, that the righteous might see him, and laugh at him, (Ps. 52. 6.) while he has this further vexation in his breast, that of all the friends he had courted and confided in, and thought he had sure in his interest, though he hung long enough to have been relieved, yet he had none at hand to disentangle him. Joab chides the man for not despatching him, (v. 11.) telling him, if he had given that bold stroke, he would have rewarded him with ten half crowns, and a girdle, that is, a captain's commission, which, perhaps, was signified by the delivery of a belt or girdle; see Isa. 22. 21. But the man, though zealous enough against Absalom, justified himself in not doing it: "Despatch him!" says he, "not for all the world; it would have cost me my head: and thou thyself wast witness to the king's charge concerning him, (v. 12.) and, for all thy talk, wouldest have been my persecutor if I had done it," v. 13. Those that love the treason, hate the traitor. Joab could not deny this, nor blame the man for his caution, and therefore makes him no answer, but breaks off the discourse, under colour of haste; (v. 14.) I may not tarry thus with thee. Superiors should consider a reproof before they give it, lest they be ashamed of it afterward, and find themselves unable to make it good.

III. He is (as I may say) embowelled and quartered, as traitors are, so pitifully mangled is he as he hangs there, and receives his death in such a manner, as to see all its terrors, and feel all its pains. 1. Joab throws three darts into his body, which put him, no doubt, to exquisite torment, while he is yet alive in the midst of the oak, v. 14. I know not whether Joab can be justified in this direct disobedience to the command of his sovereign; was this to deal gently with the young man? Would David have suffered him to do it, if he had been upon the spot? Yet this may be said for him, that while he broke the order of a too indulgent father, he did real service both to his king and country, and would have endangered the welfare of both, if he had not done it. Salus populi suprema lex—The safety of the people is the supreme law. 2. Joab's young men, ten of them, smite him, before he is despatched, v. 15. They surrounded him, made a ring about him in triumph, and then smote him, and slew him. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord. Joab, hereupon, sounds a retreat; (v. 16.) the danger is over now that Absalom is slain; the people will soon return to their allegiance to David, and therefore no more blood shall be spilt; no prisoners are taken, to be tried as traitors, and made examples: let every man return to his tent; they are all the king's subjects, all his good subjects again.

IV. His body is disposed of disgracefully, v. 17,

18. They cast it into a great pit in the wood; they would not bring it to his father, (for that circumstance would but have added to his grief,) nor would they preserve it to be buried, according to his order, but threw it into the next pit with indignation. Now where is the beauty he had been so proud of, and for which he had been so much admired? Where are his aspiring projects, and the castles he had built in the air? His thoughts perish, and he with them. And, to signify how heavy his iniquity lay upon his bones, as the prophet speaks, (Ezek. 32. 27.) they raised a great heap of stones upon him, to be a monument of his villany, and to signify that he ought to have been stoned as a rebellious son, Deut. 21. 21. Travellers say, that the place is taken notice of to this day, and that it is common for passengers to throw a stone to this heap, with words to this purport; Cursed be the memory of rebellious Absalom, and cursed for ever be all wicked children that rise up in rebellion against their parents. To aggravate the ignominy of Absalom's burial, the historian takes notice of a pillar he had erected in the valley of Kidron, near Jerusalem, to be a monument for himself, and keep his name in remembrance, (v. 18.) at the foot of which, it is probable, he designed to be buried. What foolish insignificant projects do proud men fill their heads with! And what care do many people take about the disposal of their bodies, when they are dead, that have no care at all what shall become of their precious souls! Absalom had had three sons, (ch. 14. 27.) but, it seems, now he had none; God had taken them away by death; and justly is a rebellious son written childless; to make up the want, he erects this pillar for a memorial; yet, in this also, Providence crosses him, and a rude heap of stones shall be his monument instead of this marble pillar. Thus they that exalt themselves, shall be abased. His care was, to have his name kept in remembrance, and it is so, to his everlasting dishonour. He could not be content in the obscurity of the rest of David's sons, of whom nothing is recorded but their names, but would be famous, and is therefore justly made for ever infamous. The pillar shall bear his name, but not to his credit; it was designed for Absalom's glory, but proved Absalom's folly.

19. Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, Let me now run and bear the king tidings, how that the LORD hath avenged him of his enemies. 20. And Joab said unto him, Thou shalt not bear tidings this day, but thou shalt bear tidings another day; but this day thou shalt bear no tidings, because the king's son is dead. 21. Then said Joab to Cush, Go tell the king what thou hast seen. And Cush bowed himself unto Joab, and ran. 22. Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, yet again to Joab, But, howsoever, let me, I pray thee, also run after Cush. And Joab said, Wherefore wilt thou run, my son, seeing that thou hast no tidings ready? 23. But, howsoever, said he, let me run. And he said unto him, Run. Then Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain, and overran Cush. 24. And David sat between the two gates: and the watchman went up to the roof over the gate unto the wall, and lifted up his eyes, and looked, and, behold, a man running alone.

25. And the watchman cried, and told the king. And the king said, If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth. And he came apace, and drew near. 26. And the watchman saw another man running, and the watchman called unto the porter, and said, Behold, another man running alone. And the king said, He also bringeth tidings. 27. And the watchman said, Methinketh the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz the son of Zadok. And the king said, He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings. 28. And Ahimaaz called, and said unto the king, All is well. And he fell down to the earth upon his face before the king, and said, Blessed be the LORD thy God, which hath delivered up the men that lifted up their hand against my lord the king. 29. And the king said, Is the young man Absalom safe? And Ahimaaz answered, When Joab sent the king's servant, and me thy servant, I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was. 30. And the king said unto him, Turn aside, and stand here. And he turned aside, and stood still. 31. And, behold, Cush came; and Cush said, Tidings, my lord the king: for the LORD hath avenged thee this day of all them that rose up against thee. 32. And the king said unto Cush, Is the young man Absalom safe? And Cush answered, The enemies of my lord the king, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is. 33. And the king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; and as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

Absalom's business is done; we are now told, I. How David was informed of it. He stayed behind at the city of Mahanaim, some miles from the wood where the battle was, and in the utmost border of the land: Absalom's scattered forces all made homeward toward Jordan, which was the contrary way from Mahanaim, so that his watchmen could perceive nothing how the battle went, till an express came on purpose to bring advice of the issue, which the king sat in the gate expecting to hear, v. 24.

1. Cush was the man Joab ordered to carry the tidings, (v. 21.) an Ethiopian, so his name signifies, and some think that he was so by birth; a black that waited on Joab, probably one of the ten that had helped to despatch Absalom, (v. 15.) as some think, though it was dangerous for one of those to bring the news to David, lest his fate should be the same with their's that reported to him Saul's death, and Ish-bosheth's.

2. Ahimaaz, the young priest, (one of those who brought David intelligence of Absalom's motions, ch. 17. 17.) was very forward to be the messenger of these tidings, so transported was he with joy that this cloud was blown over; let him go tell the king, that the Lord hath avenged him of his enemies, v.

19. This he desired, not so much in hope of a reward, (he was above that,) as that he might have the pleasure and satisfaction of bringing the king, whom he loved, this good news. Joab knew David better than Ahimaaz did, and that the tidings of Absalom's death, which must conclude the story, would spoil the acceptableness of all the rest; and he loves Ahimaaz too well to let him be the messenger of those tidings, (v. 20.) they are fitter to be brought by a footman than by a priest. However, when Cushie was gone, Ahimaaz begged hard for leave to run after him, and with great importunity obtained it, v. 22, 23. One would wonder why he should be so very fond of this office, when another was employed in it. (1.) Perhaps it was to show his swiftness; observing how heavily Cushie ran, and that he took the worst way, though the nearest, he had a mind to show how fast he could run, and that he could go the furthest way about, and yet beat Cushie. No great praise for a priest to be swift of foot, yet perhaps Ahimaaz was proud of it. (2.) Perhaps it was in prudence and tenderness to the king, that he desired it. He knew he could get before Cushie, and therefore was willing to prepare the king, with an amusing story, for the plain truth Cushie was ordered to tell him. If bad news must come, it is best that it come gradually, and will be the better borne.

3. They are both discovered by the watchman on the gate of Mahanaim; Ahimaaz first, (v. 24.) for though Cushie had the lead, he soon overran him; but, presently after, Cushie appeared, v. 26. (1.) When the king hears of one running alone, he concludes he is an express; (v. 25.) If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth; for if they had been beaten, and were flying back from the enemy, there would have been many. (2.) When he hears it is Ahimaaz, he concludes he brings good news, v. 27. Ahimaaz, it seems, was so famous for running, that he was known by it at a distance; and so eminently good, that it was taken for granted, if he be the messenger, the news must needs be good: he is a good man, zealously affected to the king's interest, and would not bring bad news. It is a pity but the good tidings of the gospel should always be brought by good men; and how welcome should they be to us for their message-sake!

4. Ahimaaz is very forward to proclaim the victory; (v. 28.) cries at a distance, "Peace, there is peace;" peace after war, which is doubly welcome. All is well, my lord O king; the danger is over, and we may return, when the king pleases, to Jerusalem." And when he comes near, he tells him the news more particularly. They are all cut off, that lifted up their hand against the king; and, as becomes a priest, while he gives the king the joy of it, he gives God the glory of it, the God of peace and war, the God of salvation and victory; "Blessed be the Lord thy God, that has done this for thee, as thy God, pursuant to the promises made to uphold thy throne," ch. 7. 16. When he said this, he fell down upon his face, not only in reverence to the king, but in humble adoration of God, whose name he praises for this success. By directing David thus to give God thanks for his victory, he prepares him for the approaching news of its alloy. The more our hearts are fixed, and enlarged, in thanksgiving to God for our mercies, the better disposed we shall be to bear with patience the afflictions mixed with them. Poor David is so much a father, that he forgets he is a king, and therefore cannot rejoice in the news of a victory, till he know whether the young man Absalom be safe; for whom his heart seems to tremble, almost as Eli's, in a like case, for the ark of God. Ahimaaz soon discerns what Joab intimated to him, that the death of the king's son would make the tidings of the day very unwelcome, and therefore in his report leaves that matter doubtful; and though he gives occasion to suspect how it was, yet, that the thunderclap might not come too suddenly upon the poor perplexed king, he refers him to the next messenger, whom they saw coming, for a more particular account of it. "When Joab sent the king's servant, namely, Cushie, and me thy servant, to bring the news, I saw a great tumult, occasioned by something extraordinary, as you will hear by and by; but I have nothing to say about it, I have delivered that which was my message, Cushie is better able to inform you than I am. I will not be the messenger of evil tidings; nor will I pretend to know that which I cannot give a perfect account of." He is therefore bid to stand by till Cushie came; (v. 30.) and now, we may suppose, he gives the king a more particular account of the victory, which was the thing he came to bring the news of.

5. Cushie, the slow post, proves the sure one, and beside the confirmation of the news of the victory which Ahimaaz had brought, v. 31, The Lord has avenged thee of all them that rose up against thee, he satisfies the king's inquiry concerning Absalom, v. 32. Is he safe? says David; "Yes," says Cushie, "he is safe in his grave;" but he tells the news so properly, that, how unwelcome soever the message was, the messenger could have no blame. He does not tell him plainly that Absalom was hanged, and run through, and buried under a heap of stones; but only that his fate was what he desired might be the fate of all that were traitors against the king, his crown and dignity. "The enemies of my lord the king, whoever they are, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is; I need wish them no worse."

II. We are told how David received the intelligence; he forgets all the joy of his deliverance, and is quite overwhelmed with the sorrowful tidings of Absalom's death, v. 33. As soon as he perceived by Cushie's expression that Absalom was dead, he asked no more questions, but fell into a passion of weeping, retired from company, and abandoned himself to sorrow; as he was going up to his chamber, he was overheard to say, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom; alas, for thee! I lament thee: how art thou fallen! Would God I had died for thee, and that thou hadst remained alive this day;" so the Chaldee adds, O Absalom, my son, my son. I wish I could see reason to think that this arose from a concern about Absalom's everlasting state, and that he wished to have died for him, because he had good hopes of his own salvation, and of Absalom's repentance, if he had lived: it rather seems to have been spoken inconsiderately, and in a passion, and it was his infirmity. He is to be blamed, 1. For showing so great a fondness for a graceless, however handsome and witty, son, that was justly abandoned both of God and man. 2. For quarrelling, not only with Divine Providence, the disposals of which he ought silently to acquiesce in, but divine justice, the judgments of which he ought to adore and subscribe to: see how Bildad argues, (Job 8. 3, 4.) If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away in their transgression, thou shouldst submit, for doth God pervert judgment? See Lev. 10. 3. 3. For opposing the justice of the nation, which, as king, he was intrusted with the administration of, and which, with other public interests, he ought to prefer before any natural affection. 4. For despising the mercy of his deliverance, and the deliverance of his family and kingdom, from Absalom's wicked designs, as if this were no mercy, nor worth giving thanks for, because it cost the life of Absalom. 5. For indulging a strong passion, and speaking unadvisedly with his lips. He now forgot his own reasonings upon the death of another child, (Can I bring him back again?) and his own resolution to keep his mouth as with a bridle, when his heart was hot within him; as well as his own practice at other times, when he quieted himself as a child that was weaned from his mother. The best men are not always in a good frame; what we over-loved, we are apt to over-grieve for: in each affection, therefore, it is wisdom to have rule over our own spirits, and to keep a strict guard upon ourselves when that is removed from us, which was very dear to us. Losers think they may have leave to speak; but little said is soon amended. The penitent patient sufferer sitteth alone, and keepeth silence; (Lam. 3. 28.) or rather, with Job, says Blessed be the name of the Lord.

CHAP. XIX.

We left David's army in triumph, and yet David himself in tears: now here we have, I. His return to himself, by the persuasion of Joab, v. 1. . 8. II. His return to his kingdom from his present banishment. 1. The men of Israel were forward of themselves to bring him back, v. 9, 10. 2. The men of Judah were dealt with by David's agents to do it, (v. 11. . 14.) and did it, v. 15. III. At the king's coming over Jordan, Shimei's treason is pardoned, (v. 16. . 23.) Mephibosheth's failure is excused, (v. 24. . 30.) and Barzillai's kindness is thankfully owned, and recompensed to his son, v. 31. . 40. IV. The men of Israel quarrelled with the men of Judah for not calling them to the ceremony of the king's restoration, which occasioned a new rebellion in the next chapter, v. 41. . 43.

1. AND it was told Joab, Behold, the king weepeth and mourneth for Absalom. 2. And the victory that day was turned into mourning unto all the people: for the people heard say that day how the king was grieved for his son. 3. And the people gat them by stealth that day into the city, as people being ashamed steal away when they flee in battle. 4. But the king covered his face, and the king cried with a loud voice, O my son Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son! 5. And Joab came into the house to the king, and said, Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants, which this day have saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons, and of thy daughters, and the lives of thy wives, and the lives of thy concubines; 6. In that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest thy friends: for thou hast declared this day, that thou regardest neither princes nor servants: for this day I perceive, that if Absalom had lived, and all we had died this day, then it had pleased thee well. 7. Now therefore, arise, go forth, and speak comfortably unto thy servants: for I swear by the LORD, if thou go not forth, there will not tarry one with thee this night: and that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that befell thee from thy youth until now. 8. Then the king arose, and sat in the gate. And they told unto all the people, saying, Behold, the king doth sit in the gate. And all the people came before the king; for Israel had fled, every man to his tent.

Soon after the messengers had brought the news of the defeat and death of Absalom to the court of Mahanaim, Joab and his victorious army followed, to grace the king's triumphs, and receive his further orders. Now here we are told,

I. What a damp it was to them to find the king in tears for Absalom's death, which they construed as a token of his displeasure against them for what they had done, whereas they expected him to have met them with joy and thanks for their good services. It was told Joab, v. 1. The report of it ran through the army, (v. 2.) how the king was grieved for his son. The people will take particular notice what their princes say and do: the more eyes we have upon us, and the greater our influence is, the more need we have to speak and act wisely, and to govern our passions strictly.

When they came to the city, they found the king in close mourning, v. 4. He covered his face, and would not so much as look up, nor take any notice of the generals, when they attended him. It could not but surprise them to find, 1. How the king proclaimed his passion, which he ought to have been ashamed of, and which he should have striven to smother and conceal, if he had consulted either his reputation or courage, which was lessened by his mean submission to the tyranny of so absurd a passion, or his interest in the people, which would be prejudiced by his discountenancing what was done in zeal for his honour and the public safety. Yet see how he avows his grief, He cries with a loud voice, O my son Absalom. "My servants are all come home safe, but where is my son? He is dead; and, dying in sin, I fear, he is lost for ever: I cannot now say, I shall go to him, for my soul shall not be gathered with such sinners; what shall be done for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" 2. How he prolonged his passion, even till the army was come up to him, which must be some time after he received the first intelligence. If he had contented himself with giving vent to his passion for an hour or two, when he first heard the news, it had been excusable, but to continue it thus for so bad a son as Absalom, like Jacob for so good a son as Joseph, with a resolution to go to the grave mourning, and to stain his triumphs with his tears, was very unwise and very unworthy.

Now, see how ill this was taken by the people. They were loath to blame the king, for whatever he did used to please them, (ch. 3. 36.) but they took it as a great mortification to them. Their victory was turned into mourning, v. 2. They stole into the city as men ashamed, v. 3. In compliment to their sovereign, they would not rejoice in that which they perceived so afflictive to him, and yet they could not but be uneasy that they were thus obliged to conceal their joy. Superiors ought not to put such hardships as these on their inferiors.

II. How plainly and vehemently Joab reproved David, for this indiscreet management of himself in this critical juncture. David never more needed the hearts of his subjects than now, nor was ever more concerned to secure his interest in their affections; and therefore, whatever tended to disoblige them now, was the most impolitic thing he could do, and the greatest wrong imaginable to his friends that adhered to him. Joab therefore censures him, v. 5-7. where he speaks a great deal of reason, but not with the respect and deference which he owed to his prince. Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? A plain case may be fairly pleaded with those that are above us, and they may be reproved for what they do amiss, but it must not be done with rudeness and insolence.

David did indeed need to be roused and alarmed; and Joab thought it no time to dally with him. If superiors do that which is foolish, they must neither think it strange, nor take it ill, if their inferiors tell them of it, perhaps too bluntly. 1. Joab magnifies the services of David's soldiers; "This day they have saved thy life, and therefore deserve to be taken notice of, and have reason to resent it, if they be not." It is implied, that Absalom, whom he honoured with his tears, sought his ruin, and the ruin of his family, while those, whom by his tears he puts a slight upon, were such as preserved from ruin him and all that was dear to him. Great mischiefs have arisen to princes from their contempt of great merits. 2. He aggravates the discouragement David had given them; "Thou hast shamed their faces, for while they have shown such a value for thy life, thou hast shown no value for their's, but preferrest a spoiled wicked youth, a false traitor to his king and country, whom we are happily rid of, before all thy wise counsellors, brave commanders, and loyal subjects. What can be more absurd than to love thine enemies and hate thy friends?" 3. He advises him to present himself immediately at the head of his troops, to smile upon them, welcome them home, congratulate their successes, and return them thanks for their services. Even those that may be commanded, yet expect to be thanked, when they do well, and ought to be. 4. He threatens him with another rebellion if he would not do this, intimating, that rather than serve so ungrateful a prince, he himself would head a revolt from him, and then, (so confident is Joab of his own interest in the people,) "There will not tarry with thee one man. If I go, they all go. Thou hast now nothing to mourn for; but if thou persist in thy murmurs, I will bring upon thee" (as Josephus expresses it) "real and more bitter sorrow."

III. How prudently and mildly David took the reproof and counsel given him, v. 8. He shook off his grief, anointed his head, and washed his face, that he might not appear unto men to mourn, and then made his appearance in public in the gate, which was as the guild-hall of the city. Hither the people flocked to him to congratulate his and their safety, and all was well. Note, When we are convinced of a fault, we must amend, though we are told of it by our inferiors, and indecently, or in heat and passion.

9. And all the people were at strife throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, The king saved us out of the hand of our enemies, and he delivered us out of the hand of the Philistines; and now he is fled out of the land for Absalom. 10. And Absalom, whom we anointed over us, is dead in battle. Now, therefore, why speak ye not a word of bringing the king back? 11. And king David sent to Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, saying, Speak unto the elders of Judah, saying, Why are ye the last to bring the king back to his house? seeing the speech of all Israel is come to the king, even to his house. 12. Ye are my brethren, ye are my bones and my flesh: wherefore then are ye the last to bring back the king? 13. And say ye to Amasa, Art thou not of my bone, and of my flesh? God do so to me, and more also, if thou be not captain of the host before me continually in the room of Joab. 14. And he bowed the heart of all the men of Judah, even as the heart of one man; so that they sent this word unto the king, Return thou, and all thy servants. 15. So the king returned, and came to Jordan. And Judah came to Gilgal, to go to meet the king, to conduct the king over Jordan.

It is strange that David did not immediately, upon the defeat and dispersion of Absalom's forces, march with all expedition back to Jerusalem, to regain the possession of his capital city, while the rebels were all in confusion, and before they could rally again. What occasion was there to bring him back? Could not he himself go back with the victorious army he had with him in Gilead? He could, no doubt; but, 1. He would come back as a prince, with the consent and unanimous approbation of the people, and not as a conqueror forcing his way: he would restore their liberties, and not take occasion to seize them, or encroach upon them. 2. He would come back in peace and safety, and be sure that he should meet with no difficulty or opposition in his return; and therefore would be satisfied that the people were well affected to him before he would stir. 3. He would come back in honour, and like himself; and therefore would come back, not at the head of his forces, but in the arms of his subjects; for the prince that has wisdom and goodness enough to make himself his people's darling, without doubt, looks greater, and makes a much better figure, than the prince that has strength enough to make himself his people's terror.

It is resolved therefore that David must be brought back to Jerusalem his own city, and his own house there, with some ceremony, and here we have that matter concerted.

I. The men of Israel (that is, the ten tribes) were the first that talked of it, v. 9, 10. The people were at strife about it; it was the great subject of discourse and dispute throughout all the country. Some perhaps opposed it; "Let him either come back himself, or stay where he is;" others appeared zealous for it, and reasoned as follows here, to further the design; 1. That David had formerly helped them, had fought their battles, subdued their enemies, and done them much service, and therefore it was a shame that he should continue banished from their country, who had been so great a benefactor to it. Note, Good services done to the public, though they may be forgotten for a while, yet will be remembered again when men come to their right minds. 2. That Absalom had now disappointed them. "We were foolishly sick of the cedar, and chose the branch to reign over us; but we have had enough of him, he is consumed, and we narrowly escaped being consumed with him: let us therefore return to our allegiance, and think of bringing the king back." Perhaps this was all the strife among them, not a dispute whether the king should be brought back or no, (all agreed it was to be done,) but whose fault it was, that it was not done; as is usual in such cases, every one justified himself, and blamed his neighbour. The people laid the fault on the elders, and the elders on the people, and one tribe upon another. Mutual excitements to the doing of a good work are laudable, but not mutual accusations for the not doing of it; for usually when public services are neglected, all sides must share in the blame; each might do more than he does, in reformation of manners, healing of divisions, and the like.

II. The men of Judah, by David's contrivance, were the first that did it. It is strange that they, being David's own tribe, were not so forward as the rest. David had intelligence of the good disposition of all the rest toward him, but nothing from Judah, though he had always been particularly careful of them. But we do not always find the most kindness from those whom we have most reason to expect it. Yet David would not return till he knew the sense of his own tribe, (Judah was his law-giver, Ps. 60. 7.) that his way home might be the more clear.

1. He employs Zadok and Abiathar, the two chief priests, to treat with the elders of Judah, and to excite them to give the king an invitation back to his house, even to his house, which was the glory of their tribe, v. 11, 12. No men more proper to negotiate this affair than the two priests, who were firm to David's interest, were prudent men, and had great influence with the people. Perhaps the men of Judah were remiss and careless, and did it not, because nobody put them on to do it, and then it was proper to stir them up to do it. Many will follow, who, in a good work, will not lead: it is a pity that they should continue idle for want of being spoken to. Or, perhaps, they were so sensible of the greatness of the provocation they had given to David,* by joining with Absalom, that they were afraid to bring him back, despairing of his favour; he therefore warrants his agents to assure them of it, with this reason, "Ye are my brethren, my bone and my flesh, and therefore I cannot be severe with you." The Son of David has been pleased to call us brethren, his bone and his flesh, which encourages us to hope that we shall find favour with him. Or, perhaps, they were willing to see what the rest of the tribes would do, before they stirred, with which they are here upbraided; "The speech of all Israel is come to the king to invite him back, and shall Judah be the last, that should have been the first? Where is now the celebrated bravery of that royal tribe? Where its loyalty?" Note, We should be stirred up to that which is great and good, by the examples both of our ancestors and of our neighbours, and by the consideration of our rank. Let not the first in dignity be last in duty.

2. He particularly courts into his interest Amasa, who had been Absalom's general, but was his own nephew as well as Joab, v. 13. He owns him for his kinsman, and promises him that, if he would appear for him now, he would make him captain-general of all his forces in the room of Joab, would not only pardon him, (which, it may be, Amasa questioned,) but prefer him. Sometimes there is nothing lost in purchasing the friendship of one that has been an enemy. Amasa's interest might do David good service at this juncture. But if David did wisely for himself in designating Amasa for this post, (Joab being now grown intolerably haughty,) he did not do kindly by Amasa in letting his design be known, for it occasioned his death by Joab's hand, ch. 20. 10.

3. The point was hereby gained. He bowed the heart of the men of Judah to pass a vote, namine contradicente—unanimously, for the recall of the king, v. 14. God's providence, by the priests' persuasions and Amasa's interest, brought them to this resolve. David stirred not till he received this invitation, and then he came as far back as Jordan, at which river they were to meet him, v. 15. Our Lord Jesus will rule in those that invite him to the throne in their hearts, and not till he is invited. He first bows the heart, and makes it willing in the day of his power, and then rules in the midst of his enemies, Ps. 110. 2, 3.

16. And Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite, which was of Bahurim, hasted, and came down with the men of Judah to meet king David. 17. And there were a thousand men of Benjamin with him, and Ziba the servant of the house of Saul, and his fifteen sons and his twenty servants with him; and they went over Jordan before the king. 18. And there went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household, and to do what he thought good. And Shimei the son of Gera fell down before the king, as he was come over Jordan; 19. And said unto the king, Let not my lord impute iniquity unto me, neither do thou remember that which thy servant did perversely the day that my lord the king went out of Jerusalem, that the king should take it to his heart. 20. For thy servant doth know that I have sinned: therefore, behold, I am come the first this day of all the house of Joseph, to go down to meet my lord the king. 21. But Abishai the son of Zeruiah answered and said, Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he cursed the LORD's anointed? 22. And David said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah, that ye should this day be adversaries unto me? Shall there any man be put to death this day in Israel? For do not I know that I am this day king over Israel? 23. Therefore the king said unto Shimei, Thou shalt not die. And the king sware unto him.

Perhaps Jordan was never passed with so much solemnity, nor with so many remarkable occurrences, as it was now, since Israel passed it under Joshua. David, in his afflictive flight, remembered God particularly from the land of Jordan, (Ps. 42. 6.) and now that land, more than any other, was graced with the glories of his return. David's soldiers furnished themselves with accommodations for their passage over this river, but, for his own family, a ferry boat was sent on purpose, v. 18. A fleet of boats, say some; a bridge of boats was made, say others; the best convenience they had to serve him with.

Two remarkable persons met him on the banks of Jordan, who had abused him wretchedly when he was in his flight.

I. Ziba, who had abused him with his fair tongue, and, by accusing his master, had obtained from the king a grant of his estate, ch. 16. 4. A greater abuse he could not have done him, than, by imposing upon his credulity, to draw him in to do a thing so unkind to the son of his friend Jonathan. He comes now, with a retinue of sons and servants, to meet the king, (v. 17.) that he might obtain the king's favour, and so come off the better, when Mephibosheth would shortly undeceive him, and clear himself, v. 26.

II. Shimei, who had abused him with his foul tongue, rallied at him, and cursed him, ch. 16. 5. If David had been defeated, no doubt, he would have continued to trample upon him, and have gloried in what he had done; but now that he sees him coming home in triumph, and returning to his throne, he thinks it his interest to make his peace with him. Those who now slight and abuse the Son of David, would be glad to make their peace too, when he shall come in his glory; but it will be too late. Shimei, to recommend himself to the king, 1. Came with good company, with the men of Judah, as one in their interest. 2. He brought a regiment of the men of Benjamin with him, a thousand, of which, perhaps, he was chiliarch, or commander in chief, offering his own and their service to the king; or, perhaps, they were volunteers, whom by his interest he had got together to meet the king, which was the more obliging, because of all the tribes of Israel, there were none, except these and Judah, that appeared to pay him this respect. 3. What he did, he hastened to do; he lost no time; Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way.

Here is, (1.) The criminal's submission; (v. 18..20.) He fell down before the king, as a penitent, as a supplicant; and that he might be thought sincere, he did it publicly before all David's servants, and his friends the men of Judah, yea, and before his own thousand. The offence was public, therefore the submission ought to be so. He owns his crime, Thy servant doth know that I have sinned; he aggravates it, I did herversely; he begs the king's pardon, Let not the king impute iniquity to thy servant, that is, deal with me as I deserve: he intimates, that it was below the king's great and generous mind to take it to his heart; and pleads his early return to his allegiance, that he was the first of all the house of Joseph (that is, of Israel, who in the beginning of David's reign had distinguished themselves from Judah, by their adherence to Ishbosheth (ch. 2. 10.) that came to meet the king). He came first, that by his example of duty, the rest might be disposed, and by his experience of the king's clemency, the rest might be encouraged, to follow.

(2.) A motion made for judgment against him; (v. 21.) Shall not Shimei be put to death for a traitor? Let him, of all men, be made an example. Abishai moved it, who would have ventured his life to have been his death, then when he was cursing, ch. 16. 9. David did not think fit to have it done then, because his judicial power was cut short; but now that it was restored, why should not the law have its course? Abishai herein consulted what he supposed to be David's feelings more than his true interest. Princes have need to arm themselves against temptations to severity.

(3.) His discharge by the king's order, v. 22, 23. He rejected Abishai's motion with displeasure; What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? The less we have to do with those who are of an angry revengeful spirit, and who put us upon doing what is harsh and rigorous, the better. He looks upon these prosecutors as adversaries to him, though they pretended friendship and zeal for his honour. Those who advise us to what is wrong, are really Satan's adversaries to us. [1.] They were adversaries to his inclination, which was to clemency. He knew that he was this day king in Israel, restored to, and re-established in, his kingdom, and therefore his honour inclined him to forgive. It is the glory of kings to forgive those that humble and surrender themselves: Satis est prostrasse leoni—It suffices the lion, that he has laid his victim prostrate. His joy inclined him to forgive: the pleasantness of his spirit on this great occasion forbade the entrance of any thing that was sour and peevish: joyful days should be forgiving days. Yet this was not all; his experience of God's mercy in restoring him to his kingdom, his exclusion from which, he attributed to his sin, inclined him to show mercy to Shimei. They that are forgiven, must forgive. David had severely revenged the abuses done to his ambassadors by the Ammonites (ch. 12. 31.) but easily passes by the abuse done to himself by an Israelite. That was an affront to Israel in general, and touched the honour of his crown and kingdom; this was purely personal, and therefore (according to the usual disposition of good men) he could the more easily forgive it. [2.] They were adversaries to his interest: if he should put Shimei to death, who cursed him, they would expect the same fate, who had taken up arms, and actually levied war against him, which would drive them from him, while he was endeavouring to draw them to him. Acts of severity are seldom acts of policy: The throne is established by mercy. Shimei, hereupon, has his pardon signed and sealed with an oath; yet bound, no doubt, to his good behaviour, and liable to be prosecuted if he afterward misbehaved; and thus he was reserved to be, in due time, as much a monument of the justice of the government, as he was now of its clemency, and in both of its prudence.

24. And Mephibosheth the son of Saul came down to meet the king, and had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes, from the day the king departed until the day he came again in peace. 25. And it came to pass, when he was come to Jerusalem to meet the king, that the king said to him, Wherefore wentest not thou with me, Mephibosheth? 26. And he answered, My Lord, O king, my servant deceived me: for thy servant said, I will saddle me an ass, that I may ride thereon, and go to the king; because thy servant is lame. 27. And he hath slandered thy servant unto my lord the king; but my lord the king is as an angel of God: do, therefore, what is good in thine eyes. 28. For all of my father's house were but dead men before my lord the king: yet didst thou set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table. What right, therefore, have I yet to cry any more unto the king? 29. And the king said unto him, Why speakest thou any more of thy matters? I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land. 30. And Mephibosheth said unto the king, Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house.

The day of David's return was a day of bringing to remembrance, a day of account, in which what had past in his flight, was called over again; among other things, after Shimei's, comes Mephibosheth's case, to be inquired into, and he himself brings it on.

1. He went down in the crowd to meet the king, (v. 24.) and, as a proof of the sincerity of his joy in the king's return, we are here told what a true mourner he was for the king's banishment. During that melancholy time, when one of the greatest glories of Israel was departed, Mephibosheth continued in a very melancholy state. He was never trimmed, nor put on clean linen, but wholly neglected himself, as one abandoned to grief for the king's affliction, and the kingdom's misery. In times of public calamity, we ought to abridge ourselves of the delights of sense, in conformity to the season. There are times when God calls to weeping and mourning, and we must comply with the call.

2. When the king came to Jerusalem, (since he could not sooner have an opportunity,) he made his appearance before him, v. 25. And when the king asked him, why he, being one of his family, had stayed behind, and not accompanied him in his exile, he opened his case fully to the king. (1.) He complains of Ziba, his servant, who should have been his friend, but had been, two ways, his enemy: for, first, he had hindered him from going along with the king, by taking the ass himself, which he was ordered to make ready for his master, (v. 26.) basely taking advantage of his lameness, and his inability to help himself; and, secondly, he had accused him to David of a design to usurp the government, v. 27. How much mischief is it in the power of a wicked servant to do to the best master! (2.) He gratefully acknowledges the king's great kindness to himself, when he and all his father's house lay at the king's mercy, v. 28. When he might justly have been dealt with as a rebel, he was treated as a friend, as a child: Thou didst set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table. This shows that Ziba's suggestion was improbable: for could Mephibosheth be so foolish as to aim higher, when he lived so easily, so happily, as he did? And could he be so very disingenuous as to design any harm to David, of whose great kindness to him he was thus sensible? (3.) He refers himself to the king's pleasure, Do what is good in thine eyes, with me and my estate; depending on the king's wisdom, and his ability to discern between truth and falsehood; My lord the king is as an angel of God; and disclaiming all pretensions of his own merit; "So much kindness I have received above what I deserved, and what right have I to cry any more unto the king? Why should I trouble the king with my complaints, who have already been so troublesome to him? Why should I think any thing hard that is put upon me, who have hitherto been so kindly treated?" We were all as dead men before God; yet he has not only spared us, but taken us to sit at his table. How little reason then have we to complain of any trouble we are in: and how much reason to take all well that God does.

3. David hereupon recalls the sequestration of Mephibosheth's estate; being deceived in his grant, he revokes it, and confirms his former settlement of it; I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land; (v. 29.) that is, "Let it be as I first ordered it, (ch. 9. 10.) the property shall still be vested in thee, but Ziba shall have the occupancy, he shall till the land, paying thee a rent." Thus Mephibosheth is where he was, no harm is done, only Ziba goes away unpunished for his false and malicious information against his master; David either feared him too much, or loved him too well, to do justice upon him according to that law, Deut. 19. 18, 19. and he was now in the humour of forgiving, and resolved to make every body easy.

4. Mephibosheth drowns all his cares about his estate in his joy for the king's return; (v. 30.) "Yea, let him take all, the presence and favour of the king shall be to me instead of all." A good man can contentedly bear his own private losses and disappointments, while he sees Israel in peace, and the throne of the Son of David exalted and established. Ziba, take all, so that David may be in peace.

31. And Barzillai the Gileadite came down from Rogelim, and went over Jordan with the king, to conduct him over Jordan. 32. Now Barzillai was a very aged man, even fourscore years old: and he had provided the king of sustenance while he lay at Mahanaim; for he was a very great man. 33. And the king said unto Barzillai, Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem. 34. And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem? 35. I am this day fourscore years old; and can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing-men and singing-women? wherefore then should thy servant be yet a burden unto my lord the king? 36. Thy servant will go a little way over Jordan with the king; and why should the king recompense it me with such a reward? 37. Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, and be buried by the grave of my father and of my mother: but, behold, thy servant Chimham, let him go over with my lord the king; and do to him what shall seem good unto thee. 38. And the king answered, Chimham shall go over with me, and I will do to him that which shall seem good unto thee: and whatsoever thou shalt require of me, that will I do for thee. 39. And all the people went over Jordan. And when the king was come over, the king kissed Barzillai, and blessed him; and he returned unto his own place.

David had already graced the triumphs of his restoration with the generous remission of the injuries that had been done him; we have him here gracing them with the no less generous reward of the kindnesses that had been shown him. Barzillai, the Gileadite, who had a noble seat at Rogelim, not far from Mahanaim, was the man who, of all the nobility and gentry of that country, had been most kind to David in his distress. If Absalom had prevailed, it is likely he might have suffered for it; but now he and his shall be no losers by it.

Here is,

I. Barzillai's great respect to David, not only as a good man, but as his rightful sovereign. He provided him with sustenance, for himself and family, while he lay at Mahanaim, v. 32. God had given him a large estate, for he was a very great man, and, it seems, he had a large heart to do good with it: what else but that, is a large estate good for? To reduced greatness, generosity obliges us, and to oppressed goodness, piety obliges us, to be in a particular manner kind, to the utmost of our power. Barzillai, to show that he was not weary of David, though he was so great a charge to him, attended him to Jordan, and went over with him, v. 31. Let subjects learn hence, to render tribute to whom tribute is due, and honour to whom honour, Rom. 13. 7.

II. The kind invitation David gave him to court, (v. 33.) Come thou over with me. He invited him, 1. That he might have the pleasure of his company, and the benefit of his counsel; for we may suppose that he was very wise and good, as well as very rich, else he had not been called here a very great man; for it is what a man is, more than what he has, that bespeaks him truly great. 2. That he might have an opportunity of returning his kindness; "I will feed thee with me, thou shalt fare as sumptuously as I fare, and this, at Jerusalem, the royal and holy city." David did not take Barzillai's kindness to him as a debt, (he was none of those arbitrary princes, who think that whatever their subjects have, is their's when they please,) but accepted it and rewarded it as a favour. We must always study to be grateful to our friends, especially to those who have helped us in distress.

III. Barzillai's reply to this invitation, wherein,

1. He admires the king's generosity in making him this offer, lessening his service, and magnifying the king's return for it; Why should the king recompense it with such a reward? v. 36. Will the master thank that servant who only does what was his duty to do? He thought he had done himself honour enough, in doing the king any service. Thus when the saints shall be called to inherit the kingdom, in consideration of what they have done for Christ in this world, they will be amazed at the disproportion between the service and the recompense; (Matth. 25. 37.) Lord when saw we thee hungry, and fed thee?

2. He declines accepting the invitation, begs his majesty's pardon for refusing so generous an offer: he should think himself very happy in being near the king, but, (1.) He is old, and unfit to remove at all, especially to court: old, and unfit for the business of the court; "Why should I go up with the king to Jerusalem?" I can do him no service there, in the council, the camp, the treasury, or the courts of justice; for how long have I to live? v. 34. Shall I think of going into business, now that I am going out of the world? Old, and unfit for the diversions of the court, which will be ill-bestowed, and even thrown away, upon one that can relish them so little, v. 35. As it was in Moses's time, so it was in Barzillai's, and it is not worse now, that if men be so strong that they come to fourscore years, their strength then is labour and sorrow, Ps. 90. 10. These were then, and are still, years of which men say they have no pleasure in them, Eccl. 12. 1. Dainties are insipid, when desire fails; and songs to the aged ear are little better than those sung to a heavy heart; how should they choose, when the daughters of music are brought low? Let those that are old, learn of Barzillai to be dead to the delights of sense; let grace second nature, and make a virtue of the necessity. Nay, Barzillai, being old, thinks he shall be a burthen to the king, rather than any credit to him; and a good man would not go any where to be burthensome, or, if he must be so, will rather be so to his own house than to another's. (2.) He is dying, and must begin to think of his long journey, his removal out of the world, v. 37. It is good for us all, but it especially becomes old people, to think and speak much of dying. "Talk of going to court!" says Barzillai; "let me go home and die in my own city, the place of my father's sepulchre; let me die by the grave of my father, that my bones may be quietly carried to the place of their rest. The grave is ready for me, let me go and get ready for it, go and die in my nest."

3. He desires the king to be kind to his son Chimham, Let him go over with my lord the king, and have preferment at court; what favour is done to him, Barzillai will take as done to himself. They that are old must not grudge young people those delights which they themselves are past the enjoyment of, nor oblige them to retire as they do. Barzillai will go back himself, but he will not make Chimham go back with him; though he could ill spare Chimham, yet, thinking it would gratify and improve him, he is willing to do it.

IV. David's farewell to Barzillai. 1. He sends him back into his country with a kiss and a blessing, (v. 39.) signifying that, in gratitude for his kindnesses, he would love him and pray for him; and with a promise that, whatever request he should at any time make to him, he would be ready to oblige him; (v. 48.) Whatsoever thou shalt think of, when thou comest home, to ask of me, that will I do for thee. What is the chief excellency of power, but this, that gives men a capacity of doing the more good? 2. He takes Chimham forward with him, and leaves it to Barzillai to choose him his preferment; I will do to him what shall seem good unto thee, v. 38. And, it should seem, Barzillai, who had experienced the innocency and safety of retirement, begged a country-seat for him near Jerusalem, but not in it; for, long after, we read of a place near Beth-lehem, David's city, which is called, The habitation of Chimham, allotted him, probably, not out of the crown-lands, or the forfeited estates, but David's paternal estate.

40. Then the king went on to Gilgal, and Chimham went on with him: and all the people of Judah conducted the king, and also half the people of Israel. 41. And, behold, all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto the king, Why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away, and have brought the king and his household, and all David's men with him, over Jordan? 42. And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, Because the king is near of kin to us: wherefore then be ye angry for this matter? have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift? 43. And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, We have ten parts in the king, and we have also more right in David than ye: why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had in bringing back our king? And the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel.

David came over Jordan, attended and assisted by the men of Judah; when he was advanced as far as Gilgal, the first stage on this side Jordan, half the people of Israel, that is, of their elders and great men, were come to wait upon him, to kiss his hand, and congratulate him on his return, but found they came too late to witness the solemnity of his first entrance. This put them out of humour, and occasioned a quarrel between them and the men of Judah, which was a damp to the joy of the day, and the beginning of further mischief.

Here is, 1. The complaint which the men of Israel brought to the king against the men of Judah, (v. 41.) that they had performed the ceremony of bringing the king over Jordan, and not given them notice, that they might have come to join in it. This reflected upon them, as if they were not so well affected to the king and his restoration as the men of Judah were, whereas the king himself knew that they had spoken of it, before the men of Judah thought of it, v. 11. It seemed likewise as if they intended to monopolize the king's favours when he was come back, and to be locked upon as his only friends. See what mischief comes from pride and jealousy.

2. The excuse which the men of Judah made for themselves, v. 42. (1.) They plead relation to the king; "He is near of kin to us", and therefore, in a matter of mere ceremony, as this was, we may claim precedence. It was into our country that he was to be brought, and therefore who so fit as we to bring him?" (2.) They deny the insinuated charge of self-seeking in what they had done. "Have we eaten at all of the king's cost?" No, we have all borne our own charges. "Hath he given us any gift?" No, we have no design to engross the advantages of his return, you are come time enough to share in them." Too many that attend princes, do it only for what they can get.

3. The men of Israel's vindication of their charge, v. 43. They pleaded, "We have ten parts in the king," (Judah having Simeon only, whose lot lay within his, to join with him,) "and therefore it is a slight upon us, that our advice was not asked about bringing back the king." See how uncertain the multitude is; they were lately striving against the king, to drive him out; now they are striving about him, which shall honour him most; a good man and a good cause will thus recover their credit and interest, though, for a time, they may seem to have lost them. See what is commonly the origin of strife; nothing so much as impatience of contempt, or the least seeming slight. The men of Judah had done better, if they had taken their brethren's advice and assistance; but since they did not, why should the men of Israel lay it so much to heart? If a good work be done, and well done, let us not be displeased, nor the work disparaged, though we had no hand in it.

Lastly, The scripture takes notice, by way of blame, which of the contending parties managed the cause with most passion: The words of the men of Judah were fiercer than those of the men of Israel. Though we have reason and right on our side, if we speak it with fierceness, God takes notice of it, and is much displeased with it.

CHAP. XX.

How do the clouds return after the rain! No sooner is one of David's troubles over, than another arises, as it were, out of the ashes of the former, wherein the threatening is fulfilled, that the sword should never depart from his house. I. Before he reaches Jerusalem, a new rebellion is raised by Sheba, v. 1, 2. II. His first work, when he comes to Jerusalem, is, to condemn his concubines to perpetual imprisonment, v. 3. III. Amasa, whom he intrusts to raise an army against Sheba, is too slow in his motions, which puts him into a fright, v. 4-6. IV. One of his generals barbarously murders the other, when they were taking the field, v. 7-13. V. Sheba is at length shut up in the city of Abel, (v. 14, 15.) but the citizens delivered him up to Joab, and so his rebellion was crushed, v. 16. .22. This chapter concludes with a short account of David's great officers, v. 23. .26.

1. AND there happened to be there a man of Belial, whose name was Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite; and he blew a trumpet, and said, We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: every man to his tents, O Israel. 2. So every man of Israel went up from after David, and followed Sheba the son of Bichri: but the men of Judah clave unto their king, from Jordan even to Jerusalem. 3. And David came to his house at Jerusalem; and the king took the ten women his concubines, whom he had left to keep the house, and put them in ward, and fed them, but went not in unto them: so they were shut up unto the day of their death, living in widowhood.

David, in the midst of his triumphs, has here the affliction to see his kingdom disturbed, and his family disgraced.

I. His subjects revolting from him at the instigation of a man of Belial, whom they followed when they forsook the man after God's own heart. Observe, 1. That this happened immediately upon the crushing of Absalom's rebellion. We must not think it strange, while we are in this world, if the end of one trouble be the beginning of another: deep sometimes calls unto deep. 2. That the people were now just returning to their allegiance, when, of a sudden, they flew off from it. When a reconciliation is newly made, it ought to be handled with great tenderness and caution, lest the peace break again before it be settled. A broken bone, when it is set, must have time to knit. 3. That the ring-leader of this rebellion was Sheba, a Benjamite by birth, (v. 1.) who had his habitation in mount Ephraim, v. 21. Shimei and he were both of Saul's tribe, and both retained the ancient grudge of that house. Against the kingdom of the Messiah there is an hereditary enmity in the serpent's seed, and a succession of attempts to overthrow it; (Ps. 2. 1, 2.) but He that sits in Heaven, laughs at them all. 4. That the occasion of it was that foolish quarrel, which we read of in the close of the foregoing chapter, between the elders of Israel and the elders of Judah, about bringing the king back. It was a point of honour that was disputed between them, which had most interest in David; "We are more numerous," say the elders of Israel; "We are nearer akin to him," say the elders of Judah. Now one would think David very safe and happy, when his subjects are striving which shall love him best, and be most forward to show him respect; yet even that strife proves the occasion of a rebellion. The men of Israel complained to David of the slight which the men of Judah had put upon them; if he had now countenanced their complaint, commended their zeal, and returned them thanks for it, he might have confirmed them in his interest; but he seemed partial to his own tribe: their words prevailed above the words of the men of Israel; as some read the last words of the foregoing chapter. David inclined to justify them; which when the men of Israel perceived, they flew off with indignation; "If the king will suffer himself to be engrossed by the men of Judah, let him and them make the best of one another, and we will set up one for ourselves. We thought we had ten parts in David, but that will not be allowed us; the men of Judah tell us, in effect, we have no part in him, and therefore we will have none, nor will we attend him any further, in his return to Jerusalem, nor own him for our king." This Sheba proclaimed, (v. 1.) who, probably, was a man of note, and had been active in Absalom's rebellion; the disgusted Israelites took the hint, and went up from after David to follow Sheba, (v. 2.) that is, the generality of them did so, only the men of Judah adhered to him.

Learn hence, (1.) That it is as impolitic for princes to be partial in their attentions to their subjects, as it is for parents to be so to their children; both should carry it with an even hand. (2.) Those know not what they do, that make light of the affections of their inferiors, by not countenancing and accepting them. Their hatred may be feared, whose love is despised. (3.) The beginning of strife is as the letting forth of water; it is therefore wisdom to leave it off before it be meddled with, Prov. 17. 14. How great a matter doth a little of this fire kindle! (4.) The perverting of words is the subverting of peace: and much mischief is made by forcing invidious constructions upon what is said and written, and drawing consequences that were never intended. The men of Judah said, The king is near of kin to us, by which, say the men of Israel, you mean, We have no part in him; whereas they meant no such thing. (5.) People are very apt to run into extremes, We have ten parts in David, said they; and almost in the next breath, We have no part in him. To-day, Hosanna, to-morrow, Crucify.

II. His concubines shut up and imprisoned for life, and he himself under the necessity of doing it, because they had been defiled by Absalom, v. 3. David had multiplied wives, contrary to the law, and they proved a grief and shame to him. Those whom he had sinfully taken pleasure in, he was now, 1. Obligated, in duty, to put away, they being rendered unclean to him, by the wife's uncleanness his son had committed with them. They whom he had loved, must now be loathed. 2. Obligated, in prudence, to shut up in privacy, not to be seen abroad for shame, lest the sight of them should give occasion to people to speak of what Absalom had done to them, which ought not to be so much as named, 1 Cor. 5. 1. That that villany might be buried in oblivion, they must be buried in obscurity. 3. Obligated, in justice, to shut up in prison, to punish them for their easy submission to Absalom's lust, despairing, perhaps, of David's return, and giving him up for gone. Let none expect to do ill, and fare well.

4. Then said the king to Amasa, Assemble me the men of Judah within three days, and be thou here present. 5. So Amasa went to assemble the men of Judah; but he tarried longer than the set time which he had appointed him. 6. And David said to Abishai, Now shall Sheba the son of Bichri do us more harm than did Absalom: take thou thy lord's servants, and pursue after him, lest he get him fenced cities, and escape us. 7. And there went out after him, Joab's men, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and all the mighty men: and they went out of Jerusalem, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri. 8. When they were at the great stone which is in Gibeon, Amasa went before them. And Joab's garment that he had put on was girded unto him, and upon it a girdle with a sword fastened upon his loins in the sheath thereof; and as he went forth it fell out. 9. And Joab said to Amasa, Art thou in health my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him. 10. But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand: so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib, and shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again; and he died. So Joab and Abishai his brother pursued after Sheba the son of Bichri. 11. And one of Joab's men stood by him, and said, He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David, let him go after Joab. 12. And Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway. And when the man saw that all the people stood still, he removed Amasa out of the highway into the field, and cast a cloth upon him, when he saw that every one that came by him stood still. 13. When he was removed out of the highway, all the people went on after Joab, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.

We have here Amasa's fall, just as he began to rise. He was nephew to David, (ch. 17. 25.) had been Absalom's general, and commander in chief of his rebellious army. But that being routed, he came over into David's interest, upon a promise that he should be general of his forces instead of Joab. Sheba's rebellion gives David an occasion to make good that promise sooner than he could wish, but Joab's envy and emulation made it injurious both to him and David.

I. Amasa has a commission to raise forces for the suppressing of Sheba's rebellion, and is ordered to do it with all possible expedition, v. 4. It seems, the men of Judah, though forward to attend the king's triumphs, were backward enough to fight his battles; else, when they were all in a body attending him to Jerusalem, they might immediately have pursued Sheba, and have crushed that cockatrice in the egg; but most love a loyalty, as well as a religion, that is cheap and easy. Many boast of their being akin to Christ, that yet are very loath to venture for him. Amasa is sent to assemble the men of Judah within three days; but he finds them so backward and unready, that he cannot do it within the time appointed, (v. 5.) though the promotion of Amasa, who had been their general under Absalom, was very agreeable, and a proof of the clemency of David's government.

II. Upon Amasa's delay, Abishai, the brother of Joab, is ordered to take the guards and standing forces, and with them to pursue Sheba, (v. 6, 7.) for nothing could be of more dangerous consequence than to give him time. David gives these orders to Abishai, because he resolves to mortify Joab, and degrade him, not so much, I doubt, for the blood of Abner, which he shed basely, as for the blood of Absalom, which he had shed justly and honourably. "Now," (says Bishop Hall,) "Joab smarteth for a loyal disobedience. How slippery are the stations of earthly honours, and subject to continual mutability! Happy are they who are in favour with Him in whom there is no shadow of change." Joab, without orders, though in disgrace, goes along with his brother, knowing he might be serviceable to the public, or perhaps now meditating the removal of his rival.

III. Joab, near Gibeon, meets with Amasa, and barbarously murders him, v. 8-10. It should seem, the great stone in Gibeon was the place appointed for the general rendezvous: there the rivals met; and Amasa, relying upon his commission, went before, as general both of the new-raised forces which he had got together, and of the veteran troops which Abishai had brought in; but Joab there took an opportunity to kill him with his own hand; and, 1. He did it subtly and with contrivance, and not upon a sudden provocation. He girds his coat about him, that that might not hang in his way, and girds his belt upon his coat, that his sword might be the readier to him; he puts his sword in a sheath too big for it, that, whenever he pleased, it might, upon a little shake, fall out, as if it fell by accident, and so he might take it into his hand, unsuspected, as if he were going to return it into the scabbard, when he designed to sheath it in the bowels of Amasa. The more there is of plot in a sin, the worse it is. 2. He did it treacherously, and under pretence of friendship, that Amasa might not be upon his guard. He called him brother, (for they were own cousins) inquired of his welfare, Art thou in health? and took him by the beard, as one he was free with, to kiss him, while with the drawn sword in his other hand he was aiming at his heart. Was this done like a gentleman, like a soldier, like a general? No, but like a villain, like a base coward. Just thus he slew Abner, and went unpunished for it, which encouraged him to do the like again. 3. He did it impudently, not in a corner, but at the head of his troops, and in their sight, as one that was neither ashamed nor afraid to do it, that was so hardened in blood and murders, that he could neither blush nor tremble. 4. He did it at one blow, gave the fatal push with a good will, as we say, so that he needed not strike him again; with such a strong and steady hand he gave this one stroke that it was fatal. 5. He did it in contempt and defiance of David, and the commission he had given to Amasa: for that commission was the only ground of his quarrel with him, so that David was struck at through the side of Amasa; and it was, in effect, told to his face, that Joab would be general, in spite of him. 6. He did it very unseasonably, when they were going against a common enemy, and were concerned to be unanimous. This ill-timed quarrel might have scattered their forces, or engaged them one against another, and so have made them all an easy prey to Sheba. So contentedly could Joab sacrifice the interest both of king and kingdom to his personal revenge.

IV. Joab immediately resumes his general's place, and takes care to lead the army on in pursuit of Sheba, that, if possible, he might prevent any prejudice to the common cause by what he had done. 1. He leaves one of his men to make proclamation to the forces that were coming up, that they were still engaged in David's cause, but under Joab's command, v. 11. He knew what an interest he had in the soldiery, and how many favoured him, rather than Amasa, that had been a traitor, was now a turn-coat, and had never been successful; on this he boldly relied, and called them all to follow him. What man of Judah would not be for his old king, and his old general? But one would wonder with what face a murderer could pursue a traitor; and how, under such a heavy load of guilt, he had courage to enter upon danger; his conscience was seared with a hot iron. 2. Care is taken to remove the dead body out of the way, because at that they made a stand, (as ch. 2. 23.) and to cover it with a cloth, v. 12, 13. Wicked men think themselves safe in their wickedness, if they can but conceal it from the eye of the world: if it be hidden, it is with them as if it were never done. But the covering of blood with a cloth cannot stop its cry in God's ear for vengeance, or make it the less loud. However, since this was no time to arraign Joab for what he had done, and the common safety called for expedition, it was prudent to remove that which retarded the march of the army; and then they all went on after Joab, while David, who, no doubt, had notice soon brought him of this tragedy, could not but reflect upon it with regret, that he had not formerly done justice upon Joab for the death of Abner, and that he now exposed Amasa by preferring him. And, perhaps, his conscience reminded him of his employing Joab in the murder of Uriah, which had helped to harden him in cruelty.

14. And he went through all the tribes of Israel unto Abel, and to Beth-maachah, and all the Berites; and they were gathered together, and went also after him. 15. And they came and besieged him in Abel of Beth-maachah, and they cast up a bank against the city, and it stood in the trench: and all the people that were with Joab battered the wall, to throw it down. 16. Then cried a wise woman out of the city, Hear hear; say, I pray you, unto Joab, Come near hither, that I may speak with thee. 17. And when he was come near unto her, the woman said, Art thou Joab? And he answered, I am he. Then she said unto him, Hear the words of thine handmaid. And he answered, I do hear. 18. Then she spake, saying, They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They shall surely ask counsel at Abul: and so they ended the matter. 19. I am one of them that are peaceable and faithful in Israel: thou seekest to destroy a city and a mother in Israel: why wilt thou swallow up the inheritance of the LORD? 20. And Joab answered and said, Far be it, far be it from me, that I should swallow up or destroy. 21. The matter is not so: but a man of mount Ephraim, Sheba the son of Bichri by name, hath lifted up his hand against the king, even against David: deliver him only, and I will depart from the city. And the woman said unto Joab, Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee over the wall. 22. Then the woman went unto all the people in her wisdom: and they cut off the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, and cast it out to Joab. And he blew a trumpet, and they retired from the city every man to his tent. And Joab returned to Jerusalem unto the king.

We have here the conclusion of Sheba's attempt.

I. The rebel, when he had rambled over all the tribes of Israel, and found them not so willing, upon second thoughts, to follow him, as they had been, upon a sudden provocation, to desert David, (having only picked up a few like himself, that sided with him,) entered Abel Beth-maachah a strong city in the north, in the lot of Naphtali, where we find it placed, 2 Kings 15. 29. Here he took shelter, whether by force, or with consent, does not appear, but his adherents were mostly Berites of Beeroth in Benjamin, v. 14. One bad man will find and make more.

II. Joab drew up all his force against the city, besieged it, battered the wall, and made ready for a general storm, v. 15. Justly is that place attacked with all this fury, which dares harbour a traitor; nor will that heart fare better, which indulges those rebellious lusts that will not have Christ to reign over them.

III. A discreet good woman of the city of Abel brings this matter, by her prudent management, to a good issue, so as to satisfy Joab, and yet save the city. Here is,

1. Her treaty with Joab, and her capitulation with him by which he is engaged to raise the siege, upon condition that Sheba be delivered up. It seems, none of all the men of Abel, none of the elders or magistrates, offered to treat with Joab, no, not when they were reduced to the last extremity; either they were stupid, and unconcerned for the public safety, or they stood in awe of Sheba, or they despaired of gaining any good terms with Joab, or they had not wit enough to manage the treaty. But this one woman with her wisdom saved the city. Souls know no difference of sexes; though the man be the head, it does not therefore follow that he has the monopoly of the brains, and therefore he ought not, by any salique law,* to have the monopoly of the crown; many a masculine heart, and more than masculine, has been found in a female breast; nor is the treasure of wisdom the less valuable for being lodged in the weaker vessel.

In the treaty between this nameless heroine and Joab,

(1.) She gains his audience and attention, v. 16, 17. We may suppose it was the first time he had ever treated with a woman in martial affairs.

(2.) She reasons with him on behalf of her city, and very ingeniously. [1.] That it was a city famous for wisdom, (v. 18.) as we translate it; she pleads that this city had been long in such reputation for prudent knowing men, that it was the common referee of the country, and all agreed to abide by the award of its elders. Their sentence was an oracle; let them be consulted, and the matter is ended, all sides will acquiesce. Now, shall such a city as this be laid in ashes, and never treated with? [2.] That the inhabitants were generally peaceable and faithful in Israel, v. 19. She could speak, not for herself only, but for all those whose cause she pleaded, that they were not of turbulent and seditious spirits, but of known fidelity to their prince, and peaceableness with their fellow-subjects; neither seditious, nor litigious. [3.] That it was a mother in Israel, a guide and nurse to the towns and country about; and that it was a part of the inheritance of the Lord, a city of Israelites; not of heathens; and the destruction of it would lessen and weaken that nation which God had chosen for his heritage. [4.] That they expected him to offer them peace, before he made an attack upon them, according to that known law of war, Deut. 20. 10. So the margin reads, v. 18. They plainly spake in the beginning, (of the siege,) saying, Surely they will ask of Abel; that is, "The besiegers will demand the traitor, and will ask us to surrender him; and if they do, we will soon come to an agreement, and so end the matter." Thus she tacitly upbraids Joab for not offering them peace, but hopes it is not too late to beg it.

(2.) Joab and Abel's advocate soon agree that Sheba's head shall be the ransom of the city. Joab, though, in a personal quarrel, he had lately swallowed up and destroyed Amasa, yet, when he acts as a general, will by no means bear the imputation, "Far be it from me that I should delight to swallow up or destroy, or design it, but when it is necessary for the public safety, v. 20. The matter is not so, our quarrel is not with your city, we would hazard our lives for its protection; our quarrel is only with the traitor that is harboured among you; deliver him up, and we have done." A great deal of mischief would be prevented, if contending parties would but understand one another. The city obstinately holds out, believing Joab aims at its ruin: Joab furiously attacks it, believing the citizens all confederates with Sheba; whereas both were mistaken; let both sides be undecieved, and the matter is soon accommodated. The single condition of peace, is, the surrender of the traitor; it is so in God's dealing with the soul, when it is besieged by conviction and distress; sin is the traitor; the beloved lust is the rebel: put with that, cast away the transgressions, and all shall be well. No peace on any other terms. Our wise woman immediately agrees to the proposal: Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee presently.

2. Her treaty with the citizens. She went to them in her wisdom, (and perhaps she had as much need of it in dealing with them, as in dealing with Joab,) and persuaded them to cut off Sheba's head, probably, by some public order of their government, and it was thrown over the wall to Joab. He knew the traitor's face, and therefore looked no further, intending not that any of his adherents should suffer. The public safety was secured, and he felt no wish to gratify the public revenge. Joab, hereupon, raised the siege, and marched back to Jerusalem, with the trophies rather of peace than victory.

23. Now Joab was over all the host of Israel; and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the Cherethites, and over the Pelethites; 24. And Adoram was over the tribute; and Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder; 25. And Sheva was scribe: and Zadok and Abiathar were the priests: 26. And Ira also, the Jairite, was a chief ruler about David.

Here is an account of the state of David's court, after his restoration. Joab was continued general, being too great to be displaced, Benaiah, as before, captain of the guards. Here is one new office erected, which we had not, ch. 8. 16. that of treasurer, or one over the tribute, for it was not till toward the latter end of his time, that he began to raise taxes. Adoram was long in this office, but it cost him his life at last, 1 Kings 12. 18.

CHAP. XXI.

The date of the events of this chapter is uncertain. I incline to think that they happened as they are here placed, after Absalom's and Sheba's rebellion, and toward the latter end of David's reign. That the battles with the Philistines, mentioned here, were long after the Philistines were subdued, appears by comparing 1 Chron. 18. 1. with ch. 20. 4. The numbering of the people was just before the fixing of the place of the temple, (as appears, 1 Chron. 22. 1.) and that was toward the close of David's life; and, it should seem, the people were numbered just before the three years' famine for the Gibeonites, for that which is threatened as three years' famine, 1 Chron. 21. 12. is called seven years, 2 Sam. 24. 12, 13. Three more, with the year current, added to those three. We have here, I. The Gibeonites avenged, 1. By a famine in the land, v. 1. 2. By the putting of seven of Saul's posterity to death, (v. 2. 9.) care, however, being taken of their dead bodies, and of the bones of Saul, v. 10. II. The giants of the Philistines slain in several battles, v. 15. 22.

1. THEN there was a famine in the days of David three years, year after year; and David inquired of the LORD. And the LORD answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites. 2. And the king called the Gibeonites, and said unto them; (now the Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites; and the children of Israel had sworn unto them; and Saul sought to slay them in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah;) 3. Wherefore David said unto the Gibeonites, What shall I do for you? and wherewith shall I make the atonement, that ye may bless the inheritance of the LORD? 4. And the Gibeonites said unto him, We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house; neither for us shalt thou kill any man in Israel. And he said, What you shall say, that will I do for you. 5. And they answered the king, The man that consumed us, and that devised against us that we should be destroyed from remaining in any of the coasts of Israel, 6. Let seven men of his sons be delivered unto us, and we will hang them up unto the LORD in Gibeah of Saul, whom the LORD did choose. And the king said, I will give them. 7. But the king spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan the son of Saul, because of the LORD's oath that was between them, between David and Jonathan the son of Saul. 8. But the king took the two sons of Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, whom she bare unto Saul, Armoni and Mephibosheth; and the five sons of Michal the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up for Adriel the son of Barzilai the Meholahite; 9. And he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the LORD: and they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest, in the first days, in the beginning of barley-harvest.

Here,

I. We are told of the injury which Saul had, long before this, done to the Gibeonites, which we had no account of in the history of his reign, nor should have heard of here, but that it came now to be reckoned for. The Gibeonites were of the remnant of the Amorites, (v. 2.) who by a wife had made peace with Israel, and had the public faith pledged to them by Joshua for their safety. We had the story, Josh. 9. where it was agreed (v. 23.) that they should be secured of their lives but deprived of their lands and liberties, that they and their's should be tenants in villanage to Israel. It does not appear that they had broken their part of the covenant, either by denying their service, or attempting to recover their lands or liberties, nor was it pretended; but Saul, under colour of zeal for the honour of Israel, that it might not be said that they had any of the natives among them, aimed to root them out, and, in order to that, slew many of them. Thus he would seem wiser than his predecessors the judges, and more zealous for the public interest; and perhaps he designed it for an instance of his royal prerogative, and the power which as king he assumed to rescind the former acts of government, and to disannul the most solemn leagues. It may be, he designed, by this severity toward the Gibeonites, to atone for his clemency toward the Amalekites. Some conjecture that he sought to cut off the Gibeonites at the same time when he put away the witches; (1 Sam. 28. 3.) or perhaps many of them were remarkably pious, and he sought to destroy them when he slew the priests their masters. That which made this an exceeding sinful sin, was, that he not only shed innocent blood, but therein violated the solemn oath by which the nation was bound to protect them. See what brought ruin on Saul's house; it was a bloody house.

II. We find the nation of Israel chastised with a sore famine, long after, for this sin of Saul. Observe, 1. Even in the land of Israel, that fruitful land, and in the reign of David, that glorious reign, there was a famine, not extreme, for then it would sooner have been taken notice of, and inquiry made into the cause of it, but great drought, and scarcity of provisions, the consequence of it, for three years together. If corn miss one year, commonly the next makes up the deficiency; but if it miss three years successively, it will be a sore judgment; and the man of wisdom will by it hear God's voice crying to the country, to repent of the abuse of plenty. 2. David inquired of God concerning it. Though he was himself a prophet, he must consult the oracle, and know God's mind in his own appointed way. Note, When we are under God's judgments, we ought to inquire into the grounds of the controversy. Lord show me wherefore thou contendest with me. It is strange that David did not sooner consult the oracle, not till the third year; but, perhaps, till then, he apprehended it not to be an extraordinary judgment for some particular sin. Even good men are often slack and remiss in doing their duty. We continue in ignorance, and under mistake, because we delay to inquire. 3. God was ready in his answer, though David was slow in his inquiries, It is for Saul. Note, God's judgments often look a great way back, which obliges us to do so, when we are under his rebukes. It is not for us to object against the people's smarting for the sin of their king, perhaps they were aiding and abetting; nor against this generation's suffering for the sin of the last, God often visiteth the sins of the fathers upon the children, and his judgments are a great deep; he gives not account of any of his matters. Time does not wear out the guilt of sin; nor can we build hopes of impunity upon the delay of judgments. There is no statute of limitation to be pleaded against God's demands. Nullum tempus occurrit Deo—God may punish when he pleases.

III. We have vengeance taken upon the house of Saul, for the turning away of God's wrath from the land, which, at present, smarted for his sin.

1. David, it is probable by divine direction, referred it to the Gibeonites themselves, to prescribe what satisfaction should be given them for the wrong that had been done them, v. 3. They had many years remained silent, had not appealed to David, nor given the kingdom any disturbance with their complaints or demands; and now, at length, God speaks for them; I heard not, for thou wilt hear; (Ps. 38. 14, 15.) and they are recompensed for their patience with this honour, that they are made judges in their own cause, and have a blank given them to write their demands on; What ye shall say, that will I do, (v. 4.) that atonement may be made, and that ye may bless the inheritance of the Lord, v. 3. It is sad for any family or nation to have the prayers of oppressed innocency against them, and therefore the expense of a just restitution is well bestowed for the retrieving of the blessing of those that were ready to perish, Job 29. 13. "My servant Job, whom you have wronged, shall pray for you," says God, "and then I will be reconciled to you, and not till then." Those understand not themselves, that value not the prayers of the poor and despised.

2. They desired that seven of Saul's posterity might be put to death, and David granted them their demand.

(1.) They required no silver, nor gold, v. 4. Note, Money is no satisfaction for blood; see Numb. 35. 31-33. It is the ancient law, Blood calls for blood; (Gen. 9. 6.) and those over-value money, and under-value life, that sell the blood of their relations for corruptible things, such as silver and gold. The Gibeonites had now a fair opportunity to get a discharge from their servitude, in compensation for the wrong done them, according to the equity of that law, (Exod. 21. 26.) If a man strike out his servant's eye, he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. But they did not insist on this; though the covenant was broken on the other side, it should not be broken on their's. They were Nethinim, given to God and his people Israel, and they would not seem weary of the service.

(2.) They required no lives but of Saul's family; he had done them the wrong, and therefore his children must pay for it. We sue the heirs for the parent's debts; men may not extend that so far as life, Deut. 24. 16. The children, in an ordinary course of law, shall never be put to death for the parents, but this case of the Gibeonites was altogether extraordinary. God had made himself an immediate party to the cause, and, no doubt, put it into the heart of the Gibeonites to make this demand, for he owned what was done, (v. 14.) and his judgments are not subject to the rules which men's judgments must be subject to. Let parents take heed of sin, especially the sin of cruelty and oppression, for their poor children's sake, who may be smarting for it by the just hand of God, when they are in their graves. Guilt and a curse are a bad entail upon a family. It should seem, Saul's posterity trod in his steps, for it is called a bloody house: it was the spirit of the family, and therefore they are justly reckoned with for his sin, as well as for their own.

(3.) They would not impose it upon David to do this execution; "Thou shalt not for us kill any man," (v. 4.) but we will do it ourselves, we will hang them up unto the Lord," (v. 6.) that if there were any hardship in it, they might bear the blame, and not David or his house. By our old law, if a murderer had judgment given against him upon an appeal, the relations that appealed, had the executing of him.

(4.) They did not require this, out of malice against Saul or his family, (had they been revengeful, they would have moved it themselves long before,) but out of love to the people of Israel, whom they saw plagued for the injury done to them. "We will hang them up unto the Lord," (v. 6.) to satisfy his justice, not to gratify any revenge of our own; for the good of the public, not for our own reputation."

(5.) The nomination of the persons they left to David; who took care to secure Mephibosheth for Jonathan's sake, that while he was avenging the breach of one oath, he might not himself break another; (v. 7.) but he delivered up two of Saul's sons whom he had by a concubine, and five of his grandsons, whom his daughter Merab bore to Adriel, (1 Sam. 18. 19.) but his daughter Michal brought up, v. 8. Now Saul's treachery was punished, in giving Merab to Adriel, when he had promised her to David, with a design to provoke him. "It is a dangerous matter," says Bishop Hall, upon this, "to offer injury to any of God's faithful ones; if their meekness have easily remitted it, their God will not pass it over without a severe retribution, though it may be long first."

(6.) The place, time, and manner, of their execution, all added to the solemnity of their being sacrificed to divine justice. [1.] They were hanged up as anathemas, under a peculiar mark of God's displeasure; for the law had said, He that is hanged, is accursed of God, Deut. 21. 23. Gal. 3. 13. Christ, being made a curse for us, and dying to satisfy for our sins, and to turn away the wrath of God, became obedient to this ignominious death. [2.] They were hanged up in Gibeah of Saul, (v. 6.) to show that it was for his sin that they died. They were hanged, as it were, before their own door, to expiate the guilt of the house of Saul; and thus God accomplished the ruin of that family, for the blood of the priests, and their families, which, doubtless, now came in remembrance before God, and inquisition was made for it, Ps. 9. 12. Yet the blood of the Gibeonites only is mentioned; because that was shed, in violation of a sacred oath, which, though sworn long before, though obtained by a wife, and the promise made to Canaanites, yet is thus severely reckoned for. The despising of the oath, and breaking of the covenant, will be recompensed on the head of those who thus profane God's sacred name, Ezek. 17. 18, 19. And thus God would show, that with him rich and poor meet together. Even royal blood must go to atone for the blood of Gibeonites, who were but the vassals of the congregation. [3.] They were put to death in the days of harvest, (v. 9.) at the beginning of harvest, (v. 10.) to show that they were thus sacrificed for the turning away of that wrath of God, which had withheld from them their harvest mercies for some years past, and to obtain his favour in the present harvest. Thus there is no way of appeasing God's anger, but by mortifying and crucifying our lusts and corruptions. In vain do we expect mercy from God, unless we do justice upon our sins. Those executions must not be complained of as cruel, which are become necessary to the public welfare. Better that seven of Saul's bloody house be hanged, than that all Israel be famished.

10. And Rizpah the daughter of Aiah took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night. 11. And it was told David what Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, the concubine of Saul, had done. 12. And David went and took the bones of Saul, and the bones of Jonathan his son, from the men of Jabesh-gilead, which had stolen them from the street of Beth-shan, where the Philistines had hanged them, when the Philistines had slain Saul in Gilboa: 13. And he brought up from thence the bones of Saul and the bones of Jonathan his son; and they gathered the bones of them that were hanged. 14. And the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son buried they in the country of Benjamin in Zelah, in the sepulchre of Kish his father; and they performed all that the king commanded: and after that, God was entreated for the land.

Here we have,

I. Saul's sons not only hanged, but hanged in chains, their dead bodies left hanging, and exposed, till the judgment ceased, which their death was to turn away; by the sending of rain upon the land. They died as sacrifices, and thus they were, in a manner, offered up, not consumed all at once by fire, but gradually by the air. They died as anathemas, and by this ignominious usage they were represented as execrable, because iniquity was laid upon them. When our blessed Saviour was made sin for us, he was made a curse for us. But how shall we reconcile this with the law, which expressly obliged to bury those that were hanged, the same day? Deut. 21. 23. One of the Jewish Rabbins wished this passage of story were expunged, that the name of God might be sanctified, which, he thinks, is dishonoured by his acceptance of that which was a violation of his law; but this was an extraordinary case, and did not fall within that law: nay, the very reason for that law is a reason for this exception. He that is thus left hanged, is accursed, therefore ordinary malefactors must not be so abused; but therefore these must; because they were sacrificed, not to the justice of the nation, but for the crime of the nation, no less a crime than the violating of the public faith, and for the deliverance of the nation from no less a judgment than a general famine. Being thus made as the off-scouring of all things, they were made a spectacle to the world; (1 Cor. 4. 9, 13.) God appointing, or, at least, allowing it.

II. Their dead bodies watched by Rizpah, the mother of two of them, v. 10. It was a great affliction to her, now in her old age, to see her two sons, who, we may suppose, had been a comfort to her, and were likely to be the support of her declining years, cut off in this dreadful manner. None know what sorrow they are reserved for. She may not see them decently interred, but they shall be decently attended. She attempts not to violate the sentence past upon them, that they should hang there till God sent rain; she neither steals nor forces away the dead bodies, though the divine law might have been cited to bear her out; she patiently submits, pitches a tent of sackcloth near the gibbets, where, with her servants and friends, she protected the dead bodies from birds and beasts of prey. Thus, 1. She indulges her grief, as mourners are too apt to do, to no good purpose. When sorrow, in such cases, is in danger of growing excessive, we should rather study how to divert and pacify it, than how to humour and gratify it. Why should we thus harden ourselves in sorrow? 2. She testified her love. Thus she let the world know that her sons died, not for any sin of their own, not as stubborn and rebellious sons, whose eye had despised to obey their mother; if that had been the case, she would have suffered the ravens of the valley to pick it out, and the young eagles to eat it, Prov. 30. 17. But they died for their father's sin, and therefore her mind could not be alienated from them by their hard fate. Though they must die, yet they shall die pitied and lamented.

III. The solemn interment of their dead bodies, with the bones of Saul and Jonathan, in the burying-place of their family. David was so far from being displeased at what Rizpah had done, that he was himself stirred up by it to do honour to the house of Saul, and to these branches of it among the rest; thus it appeared that it was not out of any personal disgust to the family that he delivered them up, and that he had not desired the woful day, but that he was obliged to do it for the public good. 1. He now bethought himself of removing the bodies of Saul and Jonathan from the place where the men of Jabesh-gilead had decently, but privately and obscurely, interred them, under a tree, 1 Sam. 31. 12, 13. Though the shield of Saul was vilely cast away, as if he had not been anointed with oil, yet let not royal dust be lost in the graves of the common people. Humanity obliges us to respect human bodies, especially of the great and good, in consideration both of what they have been, and what they are to be. 2. With them he buried the bodies of them that were hanged; for when God's anger was turned away, they were no longer to be looked upon as a curse, v. 13, 14. When water dropped upon them out of heaven, (v. 10.) that is, when God sent rain to water the earth, (which, perhaps, was not many days after they were hung up,) then they were taken down, for then it appeared that God was entreated for the land. When justice is done on earth, vengeance from heaven ceases. Though Christ, who was hanged on a tree, and so made a curse for us, to expiate our guilt, (though he was himself guiltless,) God is pacified, and is entreated for us: and it is said, (Acts 13. 29.) that when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, in token of that and of God's acceptance of it, they took him down and laid him in a sepulchre.

15. Moreover, the Philistines had yet war again with Israel; and David went down, and his servants with him, and fought against the Philistines: and David waxed faint. 16. And Ishbi-benob, which was of the sons of the giant, (the weight of whose spear weighed three hundred shekels of brass in weight,) he, being girded with a new sword, thought to have slain David: 17. But Abishai the son of Zeruiah succoured him, and smote the Philistine, and killed him. Then the men of David sware unto him, saying, Thou shalt go no more out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Israel. 18. And it came to pass after this, that there was again a battle with the Philistines at Gob: then Sibbechai the Hushathite slew Saph, which was of the sons of the giant. 19. And there was again a battle in Gob with the Philistines, where El-hanan the son of Jaare-oregim, a Bethlehemite, slew the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam. 20. And there was yet a battle in Gath, where was a man of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes, four and twenty in number; and he also was born to the giant. 21. And when he defied Israel, Jonathan, the son of Shimeah, the brother of David, slew him. 22. These four were born to the giant in Gath, and fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.

We have here the story of some conflicts with the Philistines, which happened, as it should seem, in the latter end of David's reign. Though he had so subdued them, that they could not bring any great numbers into the field, yet, as long as they had any giants among them to be their champions, they would never be quiet, but took all occasions to disturb the peace of Israel, to challenge them, or to make incursions upon them.

I. David himself was engaged with one of the giants: the Philistines began the war yet again, v. 15. The enemies of God's Israel are restless in their attempts against them. David, though old, desired not a writ of ease from the public service, but he himself went down in person, to fight against the Philistines. Senescit, non segnescit—He grows old, but not indolent. A sign that he fought not for his own glory, (at this age he was loaded with that, and needed no more,) but for the good of his kingdom. But in this engagement, 1. We find him in distress and danger. He thought he could bear the fatigues of war as well as he had done formerly; his will was good, and he hoped he could do as at other times; but he found himself deceived, age had cut his hair, and, after a little toil, he waxed faint. His body could not keep pace with his mind. The champion of the Philistines was soon aware of his advantage, perceived that David's strength failed him, and, being himself strong and well armed, he thought to have slain David; but God was not in his thoughts, and therefore in that very day they all perished. The enemies of God's people are often very strong, very subtle, and very sure of success, like Ishbi-benob, but there is no strength, nor counsel, nor confidence, against the Lord. 2. Wonderfully rescued by Abishai, who came seasonably in to his relief, v. 17. Herein we must own Abishai's courage and fidelity to his prince, to save whose life he bravely ventured his own; but, much more, the good providence of God, which brought him in to David's succour, in the minute of his extremity. Such a cause and such a champion, though distressed, shall not be deserted. When Abishai succoured him, gave him a cordial, it may be, to relieve his fainting spirits, or appeared as his second, he (namely, David, so I understand it) smote the Philistine, and killed him: for it is said, (v. 22.) David had himself a hand in slaying the giants. David fainted, but he did not flee; though his strength failed him, he bravely kept his ground, and then God sent him this help in the time of need, which, though brought him by his junior and inferior, he thankfully accepted, and, with a little recruiting, gained his point, and came off a conqueror. Christ, in his agonies, was strengthened by an angel. In spiritual conflicts, even strong saints sometimes wax faint; then Satan attacks them furiously; but they that stand their ground and resist him, shall be relieved, and made more than conquerors. 3. David's servants, hereupon, resolved that he should never expose himself thus any more. They had easily persuaded him not to fight against Absalom, (ch. 18. 3.) but against the Philistines he would go, till, having had this narrow escape, it was resolved in council, and confirmed with an oath, that the light of Israel (its guide and glory, so David was) should never be put again into such hazard of being blown out. Such valuable lives as David's was, ought to be preserved with a double care, both by themselves and others.

II. The rest of the giants fell by the hand of David's servants. 1. Saph was slain by Sibbechai, one of David's worthies, v. 18. 1 Chron. 11. 29. 2. Another, who was brother to Goliath, was slain by El-hanan, who is mentioned, ch. 23. 24. 3. Another, who was of such an unusual bulk, that he had more fingers and toes than other people, (v. 20.) and such an unparalleled insolence, that, though he had seen the fall of other giants, yet he defied Israel, was slain by Jonathan the son of Shimea. Shimea had one son named Jonadab, 2 Sam. 13. 3. I should have taken it for the same with this Jonathan; but that was noted for subtilty, this for bravery. These giants, probably, were the remains of the sons of Anak, who, though long feared, fell at last.

Now observe, (1.) It is folly for the strong man to glory in his strength; David's servants were no larger or stronger than other men; yet thus, by divine assistance, they mastered one giant after another. God chooses by the weak things to confound the mighty. (2.) It is common for those to go down slain to the pit, who have been the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, Ezek. 32. 27. (3.) The most powerful enemies are often reserved for the last conflict. David began his glory with the conquest of one giant, and here concludes it with the conquest of four. Death is a christian's last enemy, and a son of Anak; but through Him that triumphed for us, we hope, even over that enemy, to be more than conquerors at last.

CHAP. XXII.

This chapter is a psalm, a psalm of praise; we find it afterwards inserted among David's psalms, (Ps. 18.) with some little variation. We have it here, as it was at first composed for his own closet, and his own harp, but there we have it, as it was afterwards delivered to the chief musician for the service of the church; a second edition with some amendments; for though it was calculated primarily for David's case, yet it might indifferently serve the devotion of others, in giving thanks for their deliverances: or, it was intended that his people should thus join with him in his thanksgivings, because, being a public person, his deliverances were to be accounted public blessings, and called for public acknowledgments. The inspired historian, having largely related David's deliverances, in this and the foregoing book, and one particularly in the close of the foregoing chapter, thought fit to record this sacred poem as a memorial of all that had been before related. Some think that David penned this psalm when he was old, upon a general review of the mercies of his life, and the many wonderful preservations God had blessed him with, from first to last. We should, in our praises, look as far back as we can, and not suffer time to wear out the sense of God's favours. Others think that he penned it when he was young, upon occasion of some of his first deliverances, and kept it by him for his use afterwards, and that, upon every new deliverance, his practice was to sing this song. But the book of Psalms shows that he varied, as there was occasion, and confined not himself to one form. Here is, 1. The title of the psalm, v. 1. II. The psalm itself: in which, with a very warm devotion, and very great fluency and copiousness of expression, 1. He gives glory to God. 2. He takes comfort in him; and he finds matter for both, (1.) In the experiences he had of God's former favours. (2.) In the expectations he had of his further favours. These are intermixed throughout the whole psalm.

1. AND David spake unto the LORD the words of this song, in the day that the LORD had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul:

Observe here, 1. That it has often been the lot of God's people to have many enemies, and to be in imminent danger of falling into their hands. David was a man after God's heart, but not after men's heart: many were those that hated him, and sought his ruin; Saul is particularly named, either, (1.) As distinguished from his enemies of the heathen nations; Saul hated David, but David did not hate Saul, and therefore would not reckon him among his enemies; or, rather, (2.) As the chief of his enemies, that was more malicious and powerful than any of them. Let not those whom God loves, marvel if the world hate them.

2. They that trust God in the way of duty, shall find him a present Help to them in their greatest dangers. David did so; God delivered him out of the hand of Saul: he takes special notice of that. Remarkable preservations should be mentioned in our praises with a particular emphasis. He delivered him also out of the hand of all his enemies, one after another; sometimes in one way, sometimes in another: and David, from his own experience, has assured us, that though many are the troubles of the righteous, yet the Lord delivers them out of them all, Ps. 34. 19. We shall never be delivered from all our enemies till we get to heaven; and to that heavenly kingdom God will preserve all his, 2 Tim. 4. 18.

3. Those that have received many signal mercies from God, ought to give him the glory of them. Every new mercy in our hand should put a new song into our mouth, even praises to our God. Where there is a grateful heart, out of the abundance of that the mouth will speak; David spake, not to himself, only for his own pleasure, or to those about him, only for their instruction; but to the Lord, for his honour, the words of this song. Then we sing with grace, when we sing to the Lord. In distress he cried with his voice, (Ps. 142. 1.) therefore with his voice he gave thanks: that is the sweetest music.

4. We ought to be speedy in our thankful returns to God: in the day that God delivered him, he sang this song. While the mercy is fresh, and we are most affected with it, let the thank-offering be brought, to be kindled with the fire of that affection.

2. And he said, The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; 3. The God of my rock; in him will I trust: he is my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower, and my refuge, my saviour; thou savest me from violence. 4. I will call on the LORD, who is worthy to be praised: so shall I be saved from mine enemies. 5. When the waves of death compassed me, the floods of ungodly men made me afraid; 6. The sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me. 7. In my distress I called upon the LORD, and cried to my God; and he did hear my voice out of his temple, and my cry did enter into his ears. 8. Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations of heaven moved and shook, because he was wroth. 9. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled by it. 10. He bowed the heavens also and came down; and darkness was under his feet. 11. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: and he was seen upon the wings of the wind. 12. And he made darkness pavilions round about him, dark waters, and thick clouds of the skies. 13. Through the brightness before him were coals of fire kindled. 14. The LORD thundered from heaven, and the Most High uttered his voice. 15. And he sent out arrows, and scattered them; lightning, and discomfited them. 16. And the channels of the sea appeared, the foundations of the world were discovered, at the rebuking of the LORD, at the blast of the breath of his nostrils. 17. He sent from above, he took me; he drew me out of many waters; 18. He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them that hated me: for they were too strong for me. 19. They prevented me in the day of my calamity: but the LORD was my stay. 20. He brought me forth also into a large place; he delivered me, because he delighted in me. 21. The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness: according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me. 22. For I have kept the ways of the LORD, and have not wickedly departed from my God. 23. For all his judgments were before me: and as for his statutes, I did not depart from them. 24. I was also upright before him, and have kept myself from mine iniquity. 25. Therefore the LORD hath recompensed me according to my righteousness; according to my cleanness in his eye-sight. 26. With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful, and with the upright man thou wilt show thyself upright. 27. With the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and with the froward thou wilt show thyself unsavoury. 28. And the afflicted people thou wilt save: but thine eyes are upon the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down. 29. For thou art my lamp, O LORD; and the LORD will lighten my darkness. 30. For by thee I have run through a troop: by my God have I leaped over a wall. 31. As for God, his way is perfect, the word of the LORD is tried: he is a buckler to all them that trust in him. 32. For who is God, save the LORD? and who is a rock, save our God? 33. God is my strength and power: and he maketh my way perfect. 34. He maketh my feet like hinds' feet; and setteth me upon my high places. 35. He teacheth my hands to war; so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms. 36. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation: and thy gentleness hath made me great. 37. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me; so that my feet did not slip. 38. I have pursued mine enemies, and destroyed them; and turned not again until I had consumed them. 39. And I have consumed them, and wounded them, and they could not arise: yea, they are fallen under my feet. 40. For thou hast girded me with strength to battle: them that rose up against me hast thou subdued under me. 41. Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me. 42. They looked, but there was none to save; even unto the LORD, but he answered them not. 43. Then did I beat them as small as the dust of the earth, I did stamp them as the mire of the street, and did spread them abroad. 44. Thou also hast delivered me from the strivings of my people, thou hast kept me to be head of the heathen: a people which I knew not shall serve me. 45. Strangers shall submit themselves unto me: as soon as they hear, they shall be obedient unto me. 46. Strangers shall fade away, and they shall be afraid out of their close places. 47. The LORD liveth; and blessed be my rock; and exalted be the God of the rock of my salvation. 48. It is God that avengeth me, and that bringeth down the people under me, 49. And that bringeth me forth from mine enemies: thou also hast lifted me up on high above them that rose up against me: thou hast delivered me from the violent man. 50. Therefore I will give thanks unto thee, O LORD, among the heathen, and I will sing praises unto thy name. 51. He is the tower of salvation for his king; and showeth mercy to his anointed, unto David, and to his seed for evermore.

Let us observe, in this song of praise,

I. How David adores God, and gives him the glory of his infinite perfections. There is none like him, nor any to be compared with him; (v. 32.) Who is God, save the Lord? All others that are adored as deities, are counterfeits and pretenders. None are to be relied on besides. Who is a rock, save our God? They are dead, but the Lord liveth, v. 47. They disappoint their worshippers, when they most need them. But as for God, his way is perfect, v. 31. Men begin in kindness, but end not, promise, but perform not; but God will finish his work, and his word is tried, and what we may trust.

II. How he triumphs in the interest he had in this God, and his relation to him, which he lays down as the foundation of all the benefits he had received from him. He is my God; as such he cries to him, (v. 7.) and cleaves to him; (v. 22.) and if my God, then, my Rock; (v. 2.) that is, my Strength and my Power, (v. 33.) the Rock under which I take shelter, and who is to me as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land; the Rock on which I build my hope, v. 3. Whatever is my strength and support, it is the God of my rock that makes it so; nay, he is the God of the rock of my salvation, (v. 47.) my saving strength is in him and from him. David often hides himself in a rock, (1 Sam. 24. 2.) but God was his chief Hiding-place. He is my Fortress, in whom I am safe, and think myself so, my high Tower, or Strong-hold, in which I am out of the reach of real evils; the Tower of salvation, (v. 51.) which can neither be scaled, nor battered, nor undermined; salvation itself saves me. Am I in distress? He is my Deliverer: Struck at? Shot at? He is my Shield: Pursued? He is my Refuge: Oppressed? He is my Saviour, that rescues me out of the hand of those that seek my ruin. Nay, he is the Horn of my salvation, by which I am strongly protected, and my enemies strongly pushed." Christ is spoken of as the Horn of salvation in the house of David, Luke 1. 69. "Am I burthened, and ready to sink? The Lord is my Stay, (v. 19.) by whom I am supported. Am I in the dark, benighted, at a loss? Thou art my lamp, O Lord, to show me my way, and wilt lighten my darkness," v. 29. If we sincerely take the Lord for our God, all this, and much more, he will be to us, all we need and can desire.

III. What improvement he makes of his interest in God. If he be mine, 1. In him will I trust; (v. 3.) that is, "I will resign myself to him, and then depend upon his power, and wisdom, and goodness, to conduct me well. 2. On him will I call, (v. 4.) for he is worthy to be praised. What we have found in God, that is worthy to be praised, should engage us to pray to him, and thereby we do, in effect, praise him, and give glory to him. 3. To him will I give thanks, (v. 50.) and that publicly; when he was among the heathen, he would neither be afraid nor ashamed to own his obligations to the God of Israel.

IV. The full and large account he keeps for himself, and gives to others, of the great and kind things God had done for him. This takes up most of the song. He gives God the glory both of his deliverances, and of his successes; showing both the perils he was delivered from, and the power he was advanced to.

1. He magnifies the great salvations God had wrought for him. God sometimes brings his people into very great difficulties and dangers, that he may have the honour of saving them, and they the comfort of being saved by him. He owns, Thou hast saved me from violence, (v. 3.) from mine enemies, (v. 4.) from my strong enemy, meaning Saul, who, if God had not succoured him, would have been too hard for him, v. 18. Thou hast given me the shield of thy salvation, v. 36. To magnify the salvation, he observes,

(1.) That the danger was very great and threatening, out of which he was delivered. Men rose up against him, (v. 40, 49.) that hated him; (v. 41.) a violent man, (v. 49.) namely, Saul, who was malicious in his designs against him, and vigorous in his pursuits. This is expressed figuratively, v. 5. 6. He was surrounded with death on every side, threatened to be overwhelmed, and saw no way of escape. So violently did the waves of death beat upon him, so strongly did the cords and snares of death hold him, that he could not help himself, any more than a man in the grave can. The floods of Belial, the wicked one, and his wicked instruments, made him afraid; he trembled to see not only earth, but death and hell, in arms against him.

(2.) That his deliverance was in answer to prayer, v. 7. He has here left us a good example, when we are in distress, to cry unto God with importunity, as children, in a fright, cry to their parents; and great encouragement to do so, in that he found God ready to answer prayer out of his temple in heaven, where he is continually served and adored.

(3.) That God appeared in a singular and extraordinary manner for him, and against his enemies: the expressions are borrowed from the descent of the Divine Majesty upon mount Sinai, v. 8, 9, &c. We do not find that in any of David's battles, God fought for him, either with thunder, as in Samuel's time, or with hail, as in Joshua's time, or with the stars in their courses, as in Deborah's time: but those lofty metaphors are used, [1.] To set forth the glory of God, which was manifested in his deliverance. His wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness, his justice and holiness, and his sovereign dominion over all the creatures and all the counsels of men, which appeared in favour of David, were as clear and bright a discovery of God's glory to an eye of faith, as those would have been to an eye of sense. [2.] To set forth God's displeasure against his enemies. God so espoused his cause, that he showed himself an Enemy to all his enemies. His anger is set forth by a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth; (v. 9.) coals kindled, (v. 13.) arrows, v. 15. Who knows the power and terror of his wrath? [3.] To set forth the vast confusion which his enemies were put into, and the consternation that seized them; as if the earth had trembled, and the foundations of the world had been discovered, v. 8, 16. Who can stand before God, when he is angry? [4.] To show how ready God was to help him; he rode upon a cherub, and did fly, v. 11. God hastened to his succour, and came in to him with seasonable relief, though he had seemed at a distance. Yet he was a God hiding himself, (Isa. 45. 15.) for he made darkness his pavilion, (v. 12.) for the amazement of his enemies, and the protection of his own people.

(4.) That God manifested his particular favour and kindness to him in these deliverances; (v. 20.) He delivered me, because he delighted in me. The deliverance came not from common providence, but covenant-love; he was herein treated as a favourite; so he perceived by the communications of divine grace and comfort to his soul, with these deliverances, and the communion he had with God in them. Herein he was a type of Christ, whom God upheld, because he delighted in him, Isa. 42. 1, 2.

2. He magnifies the great successes God had crowned him with; he had not only preserved, but prospered him. He was blest, (1.) With liberty and enlargement. He was brought into a large place, (v. 20.) where he had room to thrive; and his steps were enlarged under him, so that he had room to stir, (v. 37.) no longer straitened and confined. (2.) With military skill, and strength, and swiftness: though he was bred up to the crook, he was well instructed in the arts of war, and qualified for the toils and perils of it. God, having called him to fight his battles, qualified him for the service, made him very ingenious: He teacheth my hands to war; (v. 35.) and this ingenuity was as good as strength, for it follows, so that a bow of steel is broken by my arms, not so much by main force, as by dexterity. He was also very vigorous and valiant: Thou hast girded me with strength to battle, v. 40. He gives God the glory of all his courage and ability for service. He was very expeditious too: He maketh my feet swift like hinds' feet, (v. 34.) which is of great advantage, both in charging and retreating. (3.) With victory over his enemies, not only Saul and Absalom, but the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and other neighbouring nations, whom he subdued, and made tributaries to Israel. His wonderful victories are here described, v. 38-43. They were speedy victories; I turned not again till I had consumed them; (v. 38.) and complete victories: the enemies of Israel were wounded, destroyed, consumed, fell under his feet, trampled upon, and disabled to rise, and their necks lay at his mercy. They cried both to earth and heaven for help, but in vain, there was none to save, none that durst appear for them; God answered them not, for they were not on his side, nor did they cry unto him, till they were brought to the last extremity; being thus abandoned, they became an easy prey to David's righteous and victorious sword, so that he beat them as small as the dust of the earth, which is scattered by the wind, and trodden on by every foot. (4.) With advancement to honour and power. To this he was anointed before his troubles began, and at length, post tot discrimina rerum—after all his dangers and disasters, he gained his point. God made his way perfect, (v. 33.) gave him success in all his undertakings, set him upon his high places, (v. 34.) denoting both safety and dignity. God's gentleness, his grace, and tender mercy, made him great, (v. 36.) gave him great wealth, and great authority, and a name like that of the great men of the earth. He was kept to be the head of the heathen; (v. 44.) his signal preservations evinced that he was designed and reserved for something great—to rule over all Israel, notwithstanding the strivings of the people, and so that they whom he had not known, should serve him, many of the nations that lay remote. Thus he was lifted up on high, as high as the throne, above those that rose up against him, v. 49.

V. The comfortable reflections he makes upon his own integrity, which God, by those wonderful deliverances, had graciously owned, and witnessed to, v. 21-25. He means especially his integrity with reference to Saul and Ish-bosheth, Absalom and Sheba, and those who either opposed his coming to the crown, or endeavoured to dethrone him; they falsely accused him, and misrepresented him, but he had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he was not an ambitious aspiring man, a false and bloody man, as they called him; that he had never taken any indirect unlawful courses to secure or raise himself, but in his whole conduct had kept in the way of his duty: and that in the whole course of his conversation he had, for the main, made religion his business, so that he could take God's favours to him, as the rewards of his righteousness, not of debt, but of grace; God had recompensed him, though not for his righteousness, as if that had merited any thing at the hand of God, yet according to his righteousness, which he was well pleased with, and had an eye to.

His conscience witnessed for him, 1. That he had made the word of God his rule, and had kept to it, v. 23. Wherever he was, God's judgments were before him as his guide; whithersoever he went, he took his religion along with him; and though he was forced to depart from his country, and sent, as it were, to serve other gods, yet, as for God's statutes, he did not depart from them, but kept the way of the Lord, and walked in it. 2. That he had carefully avoided the by-paths of sin. He had not wickedly departed from his God; he could not say but that he had taken some false steps, but he had not deserted God, or forsaken his way. Sins of infirmity he could not acquit himself from, but the grace of God had kept him from presumptuous sins. Though he had sometimes weakly departed from his duty, he had never wickedly departed from his God. By this it appeared that he was upright before God, or to God, in his sight, and with an eye to him—that he kept himself from his own iniquity: not only from that particular sin of killing Saul, when it was in the power of his hand to do it, but, in general, he was afraid of sin, and watchful against it, and made conscience of what he said and did. The matter of Uriah is an exception, (1. Kings 15. 5.) like that in Hezekiah's character, 2 Chron. 32. 31. Note, A careful abstaining from our own iniquity, is one of the best evidences of our own integrity; and the testimony of our conscience for us that we have done so, will be such a rejoicing, as will not only lessen the griefs of an afflicted state, but increase the comforts of an advanced state. David reflected with more comfort upon his victories over his own iniquity, than upon his conquest of Goliath and all the hosts of the uncircumcised Philistines; and the witness of his own heart to his uprightness, was sweeter, though more silent music, than their's that sang, David has slain his ten thousands. If a great man be a good man, his goodness will be much more his satisfaction than his greatness. Let favour be shown to the upright, and his uprightness will sweeten it, will double it.

VI. The comfortable prospects he has of God's further favour; as he looks back, so he looks forward, with pleasure, and assures himself of the kindness God had in store for all the saints, for himself and his seed.

1. For all good people, v. 26-28. As God had dealt with him according to his uprightness, so he will with all others. He takes occasion here to lay down the established rules of God's proceedings with the children of men: (1.) That he will do good to those that are upright in their hearts. As we are found toward God, he will be found toward us. [1.] God's mercy and grace will be the joy of those that are merciful and gracious: even the merciful need mercy, and they shall obtain it. [2.] God's uprightness, his justice and faithfulness, will be the joy of those that are upright, just, and faithful, toward God and man. [3.] God's purity and holiness will be the joy of those that are pure and holy, who therefore give thanks at the remembrance of it. And if any of these good people be afflicted people, he will save them, either out of their afflictions, or by and after them. On the other hand, (2.) That those who turn aside to crooked ways, he will lead forth with the workers of iniquity, as he says in another psalm, With the froward he will wrestle; and those with whom God wrestles, are sure to be foiled. Woe unto him that strives with his Maker! He will walk contrary to those that walk contrary to him, and be displeased with those that are displeased with him. As for the haughty, his eyes are upon them, marking them out, as it were, to be brought down: for he resists the proud.

2. For himself. He foresees that his conquests and kingdom should be yet further enlarged, v. 45, 46. Even the sons of the stranger, that should have the report of his victories; and the tokens of God's presence with him, should be possessed with a fear of him, should be forced to submit to him, though feignedly, and should be obedient to him. The successes which he had had, he looked upon as earnestness of more, and means of more: who durst oppose him, whom so many had been overcome by? Thus the Son of David goes on, conquering and to conquer, Rev. 6. 2. His gospel, which has been victorious, shall be so more and more.

3. For his seed. He showeth mercy to his Messiah, (v. 51.) not only to David himself, but to that Seed of his for evermore. David was himself anointed of God, not an usurper, but duly called to the government, and qualified for it, therefore he doubted not but God would show mercy to him: that mercy he had promised not to take from him, nor from his posterity; (ch. 7. 15, 16.) on that promise he depends, with an eye to Christ, who alone is his Seed for evermore, whose throne and kingdom still continue, and will, to the end, whereas the seed and lineage of David are long since extinct. See Ps. 89. 28, 29. Thus all his joys and all his hopes terminate, as our's should, in the great Redeemer.

CHAP. XXIII.

The historian is now drawing toward a conclusion of David's reign, and therefore gives us an account here, I. Of some of his last words, which he spake by inspiration, and which seem to have reference to his Seed that was to be for evermore, spoken of in the close of the foregoing chapter, v. 1. . 7. II. Of the great men, especially the military men, that were employed under him; the first three, (v. 8. . 17.) two of the next three, (v. 18. . 23.) and then the thirty, v. 24. . 39.

1. NOW these be the last words of David. David the son of Jesse said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, said, 2. The Spirit of the LORD spake by me, and his word was in my tongue. 3. The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me, He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God: 4. And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain. 5. Although my house be not so with God; yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure: for this is all my salvation, and all my desire, although he make it not to grow. 6. But the sons of Belial shall be all of them as thorns thrust away, because they cannot be taken with hands. 7. But the man that shall touch them must be fenced with iron, and the staff of a spear; and they shall be utterly burned with fire in the same place.

We have here the last will and testament of king David, or a codicil annexed to it, after he had settled the crown upon Solomon, and his treasures upon the temple which was to be built. The last words of great and good men are thought worthy to be, in a special manner, remarked and remembered; David would have those taken notice of, and added, either to his Psalms, (as they are here to that in the foregoing chapter,) or to the chronicles of his reign. These words especially, v. 5. though recorded before, we may suppose he often repeated for his own consolation, even to his last breath, and therefore they are called his last words. When we find death approaching, we should endeavour both to honour God, and to edify those about us, with our last words. Let those that have had long experience of God's goodness, and the pleasantness of wisdom, when they come to finish their course, leave a record of that experience, and bear their testimony to the truth of the promise. We have upon record the last words of Jacob and Moses, and here of David, designed, as those, for a legacy to them that were left behind. We are here told,

I. Whose last will and testament this is. This is related, either, as is usual, by the testator himself, or, rather, by the historian, v. 1. He is described, 1. By the meanness of his original: he was the son of Jesse. It is good for those who are advanced to be corner-stones and top-stones, to be reminded, and often to remind themselves, of the rock out of which they were hewn. 2. By the height of his elevation: he was raised up on high, as one favoured of God, and designed for something great; raised up as a prince, to sit higher than his neighbours, and as a prophet, to see further; for, (1.) He was the anointed of the God of Jacob, and so was serviceable to the people of God in their civil interests, the protection of their country, and the administration of justice among them. (2.) He was the sweet psalmist of Israel, and so was serviceable to them in their religious exercises: he penned the psalms, set the tunes, appointed both the singers and the instruments of music, by which the devotions of good people were much excited and enlarged. Note, Singing of psalms is a sweet ordinance, very agreeable to those that delight in praising God. It is reckoned among the honours to which David was raised up, that he was a psalmist: in that he was as truly great, as in his being the anointed of the God of Jacob. Note, It is true preferment to be serviceable to the church in acts of devotion, and instrumental to promote the blessed work of prayer and praise. Observe, Was David a prince? He was so for Jacob. Was he a psalmist? He was so for Israel. Note, The dispensation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, and therefore, as every man has received the gift, so let him minister the same.

II. What the purport of it is. It is an account of his communion with God. Observe,

1. What God said to him, both for his direction and for his encouragement as a king, and to be, in like manner, of use to his successors. Pious persons take a pleasure in calling to mind what they have heard from God, in recollecting his word, and revolving it in their minds. Thus what God spake once, David heard twice, yea often.

See here, (1.) Who spake; The Spirit of the Lord; the God of Israel, and the Rock of Israel; which, some think, is an intimation of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead; the Father, the God of Israel, the Son, the Rock of Israel, and the Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, who spake by the prophets, and particularly by David, and whose word was not only in his heart, but in his tongue, for the benefit of others. David here avows his divine inspiration, that in his Psalms, and in this composition here, the Spirit of God spake by him. He, and other holy men, spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. This puts an honour upon the book of Psalms, and recommends them to our use in our devotions, that they are words which the Holy Ghost teaches.

(2.) What was spoken. Here seems to be a distinction made between what the Spirit of God spake by David, which includes all his Psalms, and what the Rock of Israel spake to David, which concerned himself and his family. Let ministers observe, that those by whom God speaks to others, are concerned to hear and heed what he speaks to themselves. They whose office it is to teach others their duty, must be sure to learn and do their own.

Now that which is here said, (v. 3, 4.) may be considered,

[1.] With application to David and his royal family. And so here is, First, The duty of magistrates enjoined them. When a king was spoken to from God, he was not to be complimented with the height of his dignity, and the extent of his power, but to be told his duty; he must be just, ruling in the fear of God; and so must all inferior magistrates in their places. Let rulers remember that they rule over men; not over beasts whom they may enslave and abuse at pleasure, but over reasonable creatures, and of the same rank with themselves. They rule over men that have their follies and infirmities, and therefore must be borne with. They rule over men, but under God, and for him; and therefore, 1. They must be just, both to those over whom they rule, in allowing them their rights and properties; and between those over whom they rule, using their power to right the injured against the injurious; see Deut. 1. 16, 17. It is not enough that they do no wrong, but they must not suffer wrong to be done. 2. They must rule in the fear of God; that is, they must themselves be possessed with a fear of God, by which they will be effectually restrained from all acts of injustice and oppression: Nehemiah was so; (ch. 5. 15.) So did not I, because of the fear of God; and Joseph, Gen. 42. 18. They must also endeavour to promote the fear of God, that is, the practice of religion, among those over whom they rule. The magistrate is to be the keeper of both tables, and to protect both godliness and honesty. Secondly, Prosperity promised them, if they do this duty. He that rules in the fear of God, shall be as the light of the morning, v. 4. Light is sweet and pleasant, and he that does his duty, shall have the comfort of it; his rejoicing will be the testimony of his conscience. Light is bright, and a good prince is illustrious; his justice and piety will be his honour. Light is a blessing, nor are there greater and more extensive blessings to the public, than princes that rule in the fear of God. It is like the light of the morning, which is most welcome after the darkness of the night; so was David's government after Saul's; (Ps. 75. 3.) and which is increasing, shines more and more to the perfect day: such is the growing lustre of a good government. It is likewise compared to the tender grass, which the earth produces for the service of man; it brings with it a harvest of blessings. See Ps. 72. 6, 16. which were also some of the last words of David, and seem to refer to these here.

[2.] With application to Christ, the Son of David, and then it must all be taken as a prophecy, and the original will bear it; There shall be a ruler among men, or over men, that shall be just, and shall rule in the fear of God, that is, shall order the affairs of religion, and divine worship, according to his father's will; and he shall be as the light of the morning, &c. for he is the Light of the world, and as the tender grass, for he is the Branch of the Lord, and the Fruit of the earth, Isa. 4. 2. Compare this with those promises of Christ, which speak of his reigning in righteousness, and being of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa.

11. 1. 5.—32. 1, 2. Ps. 72. 2. God, by the Spirit, gave David the foresight of this, to comfort him under the many calamities of his family, and the melancholy prospects he had of the degeneracy of his seed.

2. What comfortable use he made of this which God spake to him, and what were his devout meditations on it, by way of reply, v. 5. It is not unlike his meditation, on occasion of such a message, 2 Sam. 7. 18, &c. What goes before, the Rock of Israel spake to him; this the Spirit of God spake by him, and it is a most excellent confession of his faith and hope in the everlasting covenant.

Here is,

(1.) Trouble supposed. Although my house be not so with God, and although he make it not to grow. David's family was not so with God, as is described, (v. 3, 4.) and as he could wish; not so good, not so happy; it had not been so while he lived, he foresaw it would not be so when he was gone; that his house would be neither so pious nor so prosperous as one might have expected the offspring of such a father to be. [1.] Not so with God. Note, We and our's are that really, which we are with God. This was it that David's heart was upon concerning his children, that they might be right with God, faithful to him, and zealous for him. But the children of godly parents are often neither so holy nor so happy as might be expected. We must be made to know, that it is corruption, not grace, that runs in the blood; that the race is not to the swift, but that God gives the Spirit as a free Agent. [2.] Not made to grow, in number, in power; it is God that makes families to grow, or not to grow, Ps. 107. 41. Good men have often the melancholy prospect of a declining family. David's house was typical of the church of Christ, which is his house, Heb. 3. 3. Suppose this be not so with God as we could wish, suppose it be diminished, distressed, disgraced, and weakened, by errors and corruptions, yea, almost extinct, yet God has made a covenant with the church's Head, the Son of David, that he will preserve to him a seed, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against his house. This our Saviour comforted himself with, in his sufferings, that the covenant with him stood firm, Isa. 53. 10. 12.

(2.) Comfort insured. Yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant. Whatever trouble a child of God may have the prospect of, still he has some comfort or other to balance it with, (2 Cor. 4. 8, 9.) and none like this here. [1.] It may be understood of the covenant of royalty, (in the type,) which God made with David and his seed, touching the kingdom, Ps. 132. 11, 12. But, [2.] It must look further, to the covenant of grace, made with all believers, that God will be, in Christ, to them a God, which was signified by the covenant of royalty, and therefore the promises of the covenant are called, the sure mercies of David, Isa. 55. 3. It is this only that is the everlasting covenant, and it cannot be imagined that David, who, in so many of his Psalms, speaks so clearly concerning Christ, and the grace of the gospel, should forget it in his last words. God has made a covenant of grace with us in Jesus Christ, and we are here told, First, That it is an everlasting covenant, from everlasting, in the contrivance and counsel of it, and to everlasting, in the continuance and consequences of it. Secondly, That it is ordered, well-ordered in all things, admirably well, to advance the glory of God, and the honour of the Mediator, together with the holiness and comfort of believers. It is herein well-ordered, that whatever is required in the covenant, is promised, and that every transgression in the covenant does not throw us out of covenant, and that it puts our salvation, not in our own keeping, but in the keeping of a Mediator. Thirdly, That it is sure, and therefore sure, because well-ordered; the general offer of it is sure, the promised mercies are sure, on the performance of the conditions. The particular application of it to true believers is sure, it is sure to all the seed. Fourthly, That it is all our salvation: nothing but this will save us, and this is sufficient: it is this only upon which our salvation depends. Fifthly, That therefore it must be all our desire. Let me have an interest in this covenant, and the promises of it, and I have enough, I desire no more.

3. Here is the doom of the sons of Belial read, v. 6, 7. (1.) They shall be thrust away as thorns, rejected, abandoned; they are like thorns, not to be touched with hands, so passionate and furious that they cannot be managed or dealt with by a wise and faithful reproof, but must be restrained by law, and the sword of justice, (Ps. 32. 9.) and therefore like thorns. (2.) They shall, at length, be utterly burnt with fire in the same place, Heb. 6. 8. Now this is intended either, [1.] As a direction to magistrates, to use their power for the punishing and suppressing of wickedness. Let them thrust away the sons of Belial; see Ps. 101. 8. Or, [2.] As a caution to magistrates, and particularly to David's sons and successors, to see that they be not themselves sons of Belial, (as too many of them were,) for then neither the dignity of their place, nor their relation to David, would secure them from being thrust away by the righteous judgments of God. Though men could not deal with them, God would. Or, [3.] As a prediction of the ruin of all the implacable enemies of Christ's kingdom. There are enemies without, that openly oppose it, and fight against it; and enemies within, that secretly betray it, and are false to it; both are sons of Belial, the children of the wicked one, of the serpent's seed: both are as thorns, grievous and vexatious: but both shall be so thrust away, as that Christ will set up his kingdom, in despite of their enmity, will go through them, (Isa. 27. 4.) and will, in due time, bless his church with such peace, that there shall be no pricking brier, nor grieving thorn. And those that will not repent, to give glory to God, shall, in the judgment-day, (to which the Chaldee paraphrast refers this,) be burnt with unquenchable fire. See Luke 19. 27.

8. These be the names of the mighty men whom David had: The Tachmonite that sat in the seat, chief among the captains; the same was Adino the Eznite; he lifted up his spear against eight hundred, whom he slew at one time. 9. And after him was Eleazar, the son of Dodo the Ahohite, one of the three mighty men with David, when they defied the Philistines that were there gathered together to battle, and the men of Israel were gone away: 10. He arose, and smote the Philistines until his hand was weary, and his hand clave unto the sword: and the LORD wrought a great victory that day; and the people returned after him only to spoil. 11. And after him was Shammah the son of Agee the Hararite: and the Philistines were gathered together into a troop, where was a piece of ground full of lentiles; and the people fled from the Philistines: 12. But he stood in the midst of the ground, and defended it, and slew the Philistines: and the LORD wrought a great victory. 13. And three of the thirty chief went down, and came to David in the harvest-time unto the cave of Adullam: and the troop of the Philistines pitched in the valley of Rephaim. 14. And David was then in a hold, and the garrison of the Philistines was then in Beth-lehem. 15. And David longed, and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Beth-lehem, which is by the gate! 16. And the three mighty men brake through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David: nevertheless he would not drink thereof, but poured it out unto the LORD; 17. And he said, Be it far from me, O LORD, that I should do this: is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives? Therefore he would not drink it. These things did these three mighty men. 18. And Abishai, the brother of Joab, the son of Zeruiah, was chief among three: and he lifted up his spear against three hundred, and slew them, and had the name among three. 19. Was he not most honourable of three! therefore he was their captain: howbeit he attained not unto the first three. 20. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, the son of a valiant man, of Kabzeel, who had done many acts; he slew two lion-like men of Moab: he went down also and slew a lion in the midst of a pit in time of snow. 21. And he slew an Egyptian, a goodly man: and the Egyptian had a spear in his hand; but he went down to him with a staff, and plucked the spear out of the Egyptian's hand, and slew him with his own spear. 22. These things did Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and had the name among three mighty men. 23. He was more honourable than the thirty, but he attained not to the first three: and David set him over his guard. 24. Asahel the brother of Joab was one of the thirty; Elhanan the son of Dodo of Beth-lehem, 25. Shammah the Harodite, Elika the Harodite, 26. Helez the Paltite, Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, 27. Abiezer the Anethothite, Mebunnai the Hushathite, 28. Zalmon the Ahohite, Maharai the Netophathite, 29. Heleb the son of Baanah, a Netpohathite; Ittai the son of Ribai, out of Gibeah of the children of Benjamin, 30. Benaiah the Pirathonite, Hiddai of the brooks of Gaash, 31. Abialbon the Arbathite, Aznaveth the Barhumite, 32. Eliahba the Shaalbonite; of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan, 33. Shammah the Hararite, Ahiam the son of Sharar the Hararite, 34. Eliphelet the son of Ahasbai, the son of the Maachathite; Eliam the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, 35. Hezrai the Carmelite, Paarai the Arbite, 36. Igal the son of Nathan of Zobah, Bani the Gadite, 37. Zelek the Ammonite; Naharai the Beerothite, armour-bearer to Joab the son of Zeruiah, 38. Ira an Ithrite, Gareb an Ithrite, 39. Uriah the Hittite: thirty and seven in all.

The catalogue which the historian has here left upon record of the greatest soldiers that were in David's time, is intended, 1. For the honour of David, who trained them up in the arts and exercises of war, and set them an example of conduct and courage. It is the reputation, as well as the advantage, of a prince, to be attended and served by such brave men as are here described. 2. For the honour of those worthy themselves, who were instrumental to bring David to the crown, settle and protect him in the throne, and enlarge his conquests. Note, Those that in public stations venture themselves, and lay out themselves, to serve the interests of their country, are worthy of double honour, both to be respected by those of their own age, and to be remembered by posterity. 3. To excite those that come after, to a generous emulation. 4. To show how much religion contributes to the inspiring of men with true courage. David, both by his Psalms, and by his offerings for the service of the temple, greatly promoted piety among the grandees of the kingdom; (1 Chron. 29. 6.) and when they became famous for piety, they became famous for bravery.

Now these mighty men are here divided into three ranks.

I. The first three, who had done the greatest exploits, and thereby gained the greatest reputation. Adino, (v. 8.) Eleazar, (v. 9, 10.) and Shammah, v. 11, 12. I do not remember that we read of any of these, or of their actions, any where in all the story of David, but here, and in the parallel place, 1 Chron. 11. Many great and remarkable events are passed by in the annals, which relate rather the blemishes, than the glories, of David's reign, especially after his sin in the matter of Uriah; so that we may conclude it to have been more illustrious than it has appeared to us while reading the records of it.

The exploits of this brave triumvirate are here recorded. They signalized themselves in the wars of Israel against their enemies, especially the Philistines. 1. Adino slew eight hundred at once, with his spear. 2. Eleazar defied the Philistines, as they, by Goliath, had defied Israel, but with better success, and greater bravery; for when the men of Israel were gone away, he not only kept his ground, but arose, and smote the Philistines, on whom God struck a terror, equal to the courage with which this great hero was inspired. His hand was weary, and yet it clave to his sword; as long as he had any strength remaining, he held his weapon, and followed his blow. Thus, in the service of God, we should keep up the willingness and resolution of the spirit, notwithstanding the weakness and weariness of the flesh: faint, yet pursuing, (Judg. 8. 4.) the hand weary, yet not quitting the sword. Now that Eleazar had beaten the enemy, the men of Israel, who were gone away from the battle, (v. 9.) returned to spoil, v. 10. It is common for those who quit the field, when any thing is to be done, to hasten to it, when any thing is to be gotten. 3. Shammah met with a party of the enemy, that were foraging, and routed them, v. 11, 12. But observe both concerning this exploit and the former, it is here said, The Lord wrought a great victory. Note, How great soever the bravery of the instruments is, the praise of the achievement must be given to God. These fought the battles, but God wrought the victory. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength, or any of his military operations, but let him that glories, glory in the Lord.

II. The next three were distinguished from, and dignified above, the thirty, but attained not to the first three, v. 23. All great men are not of the same size. Many a bright and benign star there is, which is not of the first magnitude; and many a good ship not of the first rate: of this second triumvirate, two only are named, Abishai and Benaiah, whom we have often met with in the story of David; and who seem to have been not inferior in serviceableness, though they were in dignity, to the first three.

Here is,

1. A brave action of these three in conjunction. They attended David in his troubles, when he absconded in the cave of Adullam, (v. 13.) suffered with him, and therefore were afterward preferred by him. When David and his brave men who attended him, who had acted so vigorously against the Philistines, were, by the iniquity of the times, in Saul's reign, driven to shelter themselves from his rage in caves and strong holds, no marvel that the Philistines pitched in the valley of Rephaim, and put a garrison even in Beth-lehem itself, v. 13, 14. If the church's guides are so misled, as to persecute some of her best friends and champions, the common enemy will, no doubt, get advantage by it. If David had had his liberty, Beth-lehem would not have been now in the Philistine's hands.

But being so, we are here told, (1.) How earnestly David longed for the water of the well of Beth-lehem. Some make it a public-spirited wish, and that he meant, "O that we could drive the garrison of the Philistines out of Beth-lehem, and make that beloved city of mine our own again;" the well being put for the city, as the river often signifies the country it passes through. But if he meant so, those about him did not understand him; therefore it seems rather to be an instance of his weakness. It was harvest-time, the weather was hot, he was thirsty, perhaps good water was scarce, and therefore he earnestly wishes, "O that I could but have one draught of the water of the well of Beth-lehem!" With the water of that well he had often refreshed himself when he was a youth, and nothing now will serve him but that, though it is almost impossible to come at it. He strangely indulged a humour which he could give no reason for. Other water might quench his thirst as well, but he had a fancy for that above any. It is folly to entertain such fancies, and greater folly to insist upon the gratification of them. We ought to check our appetites, when they go out inordinately toward those things that really are more pleasant and grateful than other things. Be not desirous of dainties, much more, when they are thus set upon such things as only please a humour. (2.) How bravely his three mighty men, Abishai, Benaiah, and another not named, ventured through the camp of the Philistines, upon the very mouth of danger, and fetched water from the well of Beth-lehem, without David's knowledge. When he wished for it, he was far from desiring that any of his men should venture their lives for it; but those three did, (v. 16.) to show, [1.] How much they valued their prince, and with what pleasure they could run the greatest hazards, and undergo the greatest hardships, in his service. David, though anointed king, was, as yet, an exile, a poor prince that had no external advantages to recommend him to the affection and esteem of his attendants, nor was he in any capacity to prefer or reward them; yet those three were thus zealous for his satisfaction, firmly believing the time of recompense would come. Let us be willing to venture in the cause of Christ, even when it is a suffering cause, as those who are assured that it will prevail, and that we shall not lose by it at last. Were they so forward to expose themselves, upon the least hint of their prince's mind, and so ambitious to please him? And shall not we covet to approve ourselves to our Lord Jesus, by a ready compliance with every intimation of his will, given us by his word, Spirit, and providence? [2.] How little they feared the Philistines. They were glad of an occasion to defy them. Whether they broke through the host clandestinely, and with such art that the Philistines did not discover them, or openly, and with such terror in their looks that the Philistines durst not oppose them, is not certain; it should seem, they forced their way, sword in hand. But see, (3.) How self-denyingly David, when he had this far-fetched, dear-bought water, poured it before the Lord, v. 16. [1.] Thus he would show the tender regard he had to the lives of the soldiers, and how far he was from being prodigal of their blood, Ps. 72. 14. In God's sight, the death of his saints is precious. [2.] Thus he would testify his sorrow for speaking that foolish word which occasioned those men to put their lives in their hands. Great men should take heed what they say, lest any bad use be made of it by those about them. [3.] Thus he would prevent the like rashness in any of his men for the future. [4.] Thus he would cross his own foolish fancy, and punish himself for entertaining and indulging it, and show that he had sober thoughts to correct his rash ones, and knew how to deny himself even in that which he was most fond of. Such generous mortifications become the wise, the great, and the good. [5.] Thus he would honour God, and give glory to him; the water purchased at this rate, he thought too precious for his own drinking, and fit only to be poured out to God as a drink-offering. If it was the blood of these men, it was God's due, for the blood was always his. [6.] Bishop Patrick speaks of some who think that David hereby showed that it was not material water he longed for, but the Messiah, who had the water of life; who, he knew, should be born at Beth-lehem, which the Philistines therefore should not be able to destroy. Lastly, Did David look upon that water as very precious, which was got at the hazard of these men's blood, and shall not we much more value those benefits, for the purchasing of which our blessed Saviour shed his blood? Let us not undervalue the blood of the covenant, as they do, that undervalue the blessings of the covenant.

2. The brave actions of two of them on other occasions. Abishai slew three hundred men at once, v. 18, 19. Benaiah did many great things: (1.) He slew two Moabites that were lion-like men, so bold and strong, so fierce and furious. (2.) He slew a lion in a pit, either in his own defence, as Samson, or, perhaps, in kindness to the country, a lion that had done mischief. It being in a time of snow, he was more stiff, and the lion more fierce and ravenous, and yet he mastered him. (3.) He slew an Egyptian, on what occasion it is not said; he was well armed, but Benaiah attacked him with no other weapon than a walking-staff, dexterously wrested his spear out of his hand, and slew him with it, v. 21. For these, and the like exploits, David preferred him to be captain of the life-guard of standing forces, v. 23.

III. Inferior to the second three, but of great note, were the thirty-one here mentioned by name, v. 24, &c. Asahel is the first, who was slain by Abner in the beginning of David's reign, but lost not his place in this catalogue. Elhanan is the next, brother to Eleazar, one of the first three, v. 9. The surnames here given them, are taken, as it should seem, from the places of their birth or habitation, as many surnames with us originally were. From all parts of the nation, the most wise and valiant were picked up to serve the king. Several of these here named, we find captains of the twelve courses which David appointed, one for each month in the year, 1 Chron. 27. They that did worthily, were preferred according to their merits. One of them was the son of Ahithophel; (v. 34.) the son famous in the camp, as the father at the council-board. But to find Uriah the Hittite bringing up the rear of these worthies, as it revives the remembrance of David's sin, so it aggravates it; that a man who deserved so well of his king and country should be so ill treated. Joab is not mentioned among all these, either, 1. Because he was so great, that he did not need to be mentioned; the first of the first three, sat chief among the captains, but Joab was over them as general. Or, 2. Because he was so bad, that he did not deserve to be mentioned; for though he was confessedly a great soldier, and one that had so much religion in him as to dedicate of his spoils to the house of God, (1 Chron. 26. 28.) yet he lost as much honour by slaying two of David's friends, as ever he got by slaying his enemies.

Christ, the Son of David, has worthies too, who, like David's, are influenced by his example, fight his battles against the spiritual enemies of his kingdom, and in his strength are more than conquerors. Christ's apostles were his immediate attendants, did suffer great things for him, and, at length, came to reign with him. They are mentioned with honour in the New Testament, as these in the Old, especially, Rev. 21. 14. Nay, all the good soldiers of Jesus Christ have their names better preserved than even these worthies have; for they are written in heaven. This honour have all his saints.

CHAP. XXIV.

The last words of David, which we read in the chapter before, were admirably good, but in this chapter we read some of his last works, which were none of the best; yet he repented, and did his first works again, and so he finished well. We have here, I. His sin, which was, numbering the people in the pride of his heart, v. 1. 9. II. His conviction of the sin, and repentance for it, v. 10. III. The judgment inflicted upon him for it, v. 11. 15. IV. The staying of the judgment, v. 16, 17. V. The erecting of an altar in token of God's reconciliation to him and his people, v. 18. 25.

1. AND again the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah. 2. For the king said to Joab the captain of the host, which was with him, Go now through all the tribes of Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, and number ye the people, that I may know the number of the people. 3. And Joab said unto the king, Now the LORD thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, a hundred fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it: but why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? 4. Notwithstanding the king's word prevailed against Joab, and against the captains of the host: and Joab and the captains of the host went out from the presence of the king, to number the people of Israel. 5. And they passed over Jordan, and pitched in Aroer, on the right side of the city that lieth in the midst of the river of Gad, and toward Jazer: 6. Then they came to Gilead, and to the land of Tahtim-hodshi; and they came to Dan-jaan, and about to Zidon, 7. And came to the strong hold of Tyre, and to all the cities of the Hivites, and of the Canaanites: and they went out to the south of Judah, even to Beer-sheba. 8. So when they had gone through all the land, they came to Jerusalem at the end of nine months and twenty days. 9. And Joab gave up the sum of the number of the people unto the king: and there were in Israel eight hundred thousand valiant men that drew the sword; and the men of Judah were five hundred thousand men.

Here we have,

I. The orders which David gave to Joab to number the people of Israel and Judah, v. 1, 2. Two things here seem strange.

1. The sinfulness of this. What harm was there in it? Did not Moses twice number the people, without any crime? Does not political arithmetic come in among the other policies of a prince? Should not the shepherd know the number of his sheep? Does not the Son of David know all his own by name? Might not he make good use of this calculation? What evil has he done, if he do this? Answer. It is certain that it was a sin, and a great sin; but where the evil of it lay is not so certain. (1.) Some think that the fault was, that he numbered them that were under twenty years old, if they were but of stature and strength able to bear arms; and that was the reason why this account was not enrolled, because it was illegal, 1 Chron. 27. 23, 24. (2.) Others think the fault was, that he did not require the half-shekel which was to be paid for the service of the sanctuary, whenever the people were numbered, as a ransom for their souls, Exod. 30. 12. (3.) Others think that he did it with a design to impose a tribute upon them for himself, and to be put into his treasury; this by way of poll, which, when he knew their numbers, he could tell what it would amount to; but nothing of this appears, nor was David ever a raiser of taxes. (4.) This was the fault, that he had no orders from God to do it, nor was there any occasion for the doing of it. It was a needless trouble both to himself and to his people. (5.) Some think that it was an affront to the ancient promise which God made to Abraham, that his seed should be innumerable as the dust of the earth: it savoured of distrust of that promise, or a design to show that it was not fulfilled in the letter of it. He would number those of whom God had said that they could not be numbered. Those know not what they do, that go about to disprove the word of God. (6.) That which was the worst thing in numbering the people, was, that David did it in the pride of his heart, which was Hezekiah's sin in showing his treasures to the ambassadors. [1.] It was a proud conceit of his own greatness, in having the command of so numerous a people, as if their increase had been owing to any conduct of his,

which was to be ascribed purely to the blessing of God. [2.] It was a proud confidence in his own strength. By publishing among the nations the number of his people, he thought to appear the more formidable; and doubted not, if he should have any war, that he should overpower his enemies with the multitude of his forces; trusting in an arm of flesh, more than he should have done, who had written so much of trusting in God only. God judges not of sin as we do. What appears to us harmless, or, at least, but a small offence, may be a great sin in the eye of God, who sees men's principles, and is a Discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. But his judgment, we are sure, is according to truth.

2. The spring from which it is here said to arise, is yet more strange, v. 1. It is not strange that the anger of the Lord should be kindled against Israel; there was cause enough for it, they were unthankful for the blessings of David's government, and strangely drawn in to take part with Absalom first, and afterward with Sheba: we have reason to think that their peace and plenty made them secure and sensual, and for this, God was displeased with them; but that, in this displeasure, he should move David to number the people, is very strange. We are sure that God is not the author of sin: he tempts no man: we are told (1 Chron. 21. 1.) that Satan provoked David to number Israel; Satan, as an enemy, suggested it for a sin, as he put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ. God, as a righteous Judge, permitted it, with a design, from this sin of David, to take an occasion to punish other sins of Israel, which he might justly have punished them for without this. But, as before, he brought a famine upon them for the sin of Saul, so now, a pestilence for the sin of David; that princes may, from these instances, learn, when the judgments of God are abroad, to suspect that their sins are the ground of the controversy, and may therefore repent and reform themselves, which should have a great influence upon national repentance and reformation; and that people may learn to pray for those in authority, that God would keep them from sin; because if they sin, the kingdom smarts.

II. The opposition which Joab made to these orders. Even he was aware of David's folly and vain-glory in this design. He observed that David gave no reason for it, only, Number the people, that I may know the number of the people; and therefore endeavours to divert his pride, and in a much more decent manner than he had before endeavoured to divert his passion upon the death of Absalom; then he spake rudely and insolently, (ch. 19. 5-7.) but now, as became him, (v. 3.) Now the Lord thy God add unto the people a hundred fold. There is no occasion either to tax them, or enlist them, or make any distribution of them. They are all easy and happy; and it is his wish, both that their number might increase, and that the king, though old, might live to see it, and have the satisfaction of it. But why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? What need is there of doing it? Pauperis est numerare pecus—Leave it to the poor to count their flocks. Especially, why should David, who speaks so much of delighting in God, and the exercises of devotion, and who, being old, one would think, should have put away childish things, take a pleasure (so he calls it modestly, but means taking a pride) in a thing of this nature? Note, Many things, not in themselves sinful, turn into sin to us by our inordinate delighting in them. Joab was aware of David's vanity herein, but he himself was not. It would be good for us to have a friend that would faithfully admonish us, when we say or do any thing proud or vain-glorious, for we often do so, and are not ourselves aware of it.

III. The orders executed notwithstanding. The king's word prevailed; (v. 4.) he would have it done; Joab must not gainsay it, lest he be thought to grudge his time and pains in the king's service. It is an unhappiness to great men, to have those about them, that will aid them and serve them in that which is evil; Joab, according to order, applied himself with some reluctancy to this displeasing task, and took the captains of the host to help him. They began in the most distant places; in the east first, on the other side Jordan; (v. 5.) then they went toward Dan in the north; (v. 6.) so to Tyre on the east, and thence to Beer-sheba in the south, v. 7. Above nine months were spent in taking this account; a great deal of trouble and amazement was occasioned by it in the country; (v. 8.) and the sum total was, at length, brought to the king at Jerusalem, v. 9. Whether the numbers answered David's expectation or no, we are not told, nor whether the account fed his pride or mortified it. They were very many, but, it may be, not so many as he thought they were. They had not increased in Canaan as they had in Egypt, nor were much more than double to what they were when they came into Canaan under Joshua, about 400 years before; yet it is an evidence that Canaan was a very fruitful land, that so many thousands were maintained within so narrow a compass.

10. And David's heart smote him after that he had numbered the people. And David said unto the LORD, I have sinned greatly in that I have done: and now, I beseech thee, O LORD, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly. 11. For when David was up in the morning, the word of the LORD came unto the prophet Gad, David's seer, saying, 12. Go and say unto David, Thus saith the LORD, I offer thee three things; choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee. 13. So Gad came to David, and told him, and said unto him, Shall seven years of famine come unto thee in thy land? or wilt thou flee three months before thine enemies, while they pursue thee? or that there be three days' pestilence in thy land? Now advise, and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me. 14. And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait: let us fall now into the hand of the LORD, (for his mercies are great,) and let me not fall into the hand of man. 15. So the LORD sent a pestilence upon Israel, from the morning even to the time appointed: and there died of the people, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, seventy thousand men. 16. And when the angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the LORD repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed the people, It is enough; stay now thine hand. And the angel of the LORD was by the threshing-place of Araunah the Jebusite. 17. And David spake unto the LORD, when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly: but these sheep, what have they done? Let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house.

We have here David repenting of the sin, and yet punished for it; God repenting of the judgment, and David thereby made more penitent.

I. Here is David's penitent reflection upon, and confession of, his sin in numbering the people. While the thing was in doing, during all those nine months, we do not find that David was sensible of his sin, (for then he would have countermanded the orders he had given,) but when the account was finished, and laid before him, that very night, his conscience was awakened, and he felt the pain of it, just then when he promised himself the pleasure of it. When he was about to feast on the satisfaction of the numbers of his people, it was turned into the gall of asps within him; sense of the sin cast a damp upon the joy, v. 10. 1. He was convinced of his sin; his heart smote him, before the prophet came to him, (I think it should not be read for, v. 11. but, and when David was up, so it is in the original,) his conscience showed him the evil of what he had done; now that appeared sin, and exceeding sinful, which, before, he saw no harm in. He reflected upon it with great regret, and his heart reproached him for it. Note, It is a good thing, when a man has sinned, to have a heart within him to smite him for it; it is a good sign of a principle of grace in the heart, and a good step toward repentance and reformation. 2. He confessed it to God, and begged earnestly for the forgiveness of it. (1.) He owns he had sinned, sinned greatly, though to others it might seem no sin at all, or a very little one. True penitents, whose consciences are tender and well informed, see that evil in sin, which others do not see. (2.) He owns he had done foolishly, very foolishly, because he had done it in the pride of his heart; and it was folly for him to be proud of the numbers of his people, when they were God's people, not his, and as many as they were, God could soon make them fewer. (3.) He cries to God for pardon: I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant. If we confess our sins, we may pray in faith that God will forgive them, and take away, by pardoning mercy, that iniquity which we cast away by sincere repentance.

II. The just and necessary correction which he suffered for this sin. David had been full of tossings to and fro, all night, under the sense of this sin, no rest in his bones because of it, and he arose in the morning, expecting to hear of God's displeasure against him for what he had done, or designing to speak with Gad his seer concerning it: Gad is called his seer, because he had him always at hand to advise with in the things of God, and made use of him as his confessor and counsellor, but God prevented him, and directed the prophet Gad what to say to him; (v. 11.) and it is taken for granted, 1. That David must be corrected for this fault; it is too great a crime, and reflects too much dishonour upon God, to go unpunished, even in David himself: of the seven things that God hates, pride is the first, Prov. 6. 17. Note, Those who truly repent of their sins, and have them pardoned, yet are often made to smart for them in this world. 2. The punishment must answer to the sin. He was proud of the numbers of his people, and therefore the judgment he must be chastised with for this sin, must be such as will make them fewer. Note, What we make the matter of our pride, it is just with God to take from us, or imbitter to us; and, some way or other, to make the matter of our punishment. 3. It must be such a punishment as the people must have a large share in, for God's anger was kindled against Israel, v. 1. Though it was David's sin that immediately opened the sluice, the sins of the people all contributed to the deluge.

Now as to the punishment that must be inflicted,

(1.) David is bid to choose what rod he will be beaten with, v. 12, 13. His heavenly Father must correct him, but, to show that he does not do it willingly, he gives David leave to make choice whether it shall be by war, famine, or pestilence, three sore judgments, and which greatly weaken and diminish a people. God, by putting him thus to his choice, designed, [1.] To humble him the more for his sin, which he would see to be exceeding sinful, when he came to consider each of these judgments as exceeding dreadful. [2.] To upbraid him with the proud conceit he had of his own sovereignty over Israel: he that is so great a prince, begins to think he may have what he will; "Come," says God, "then, which wilt thou have of these three things?" Compare Jer. 34. 17, I proclaim a liberty for you, but it is such a liberty as this of David's, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and Jer. 15. 2, Such as are for death, to death. Or, [3.] To give him some encouragement under the correction, letting him know that God did not cast him out of communion with himself, but that still his secret was with him, and in afflicting him, he considered his frame, and what he could best bear. Or, [4.] That he might the more patiently bear the rod, when it was a rod of his own choosing. The prophet bids him advise with himself, and then tell him what answer he should return to him that sent him. Note, Ministers are sent of God to us, and they must give an account of the success of their embassy; it concerns us therefore to consider, what answer they shall return from us, that they may give up their account of us with joy.

(2.) He excepts only against the judgment of the sword, and, for the other two, he refers himself to God, but intimates his choice of the pestilence rather; (v. 14.) I am in a great strait, and well he might be, when fear, and the pit, and the snare are before him, and if he escape one, he inevitably falls into the other, Jer. 48. 43, 44. Note, Sin brings men into straits; wise and good men often distress themselves by their own folly. [1.] He begs that he may not fall into the hand of man; whatever comes, Let us not flee three months before our enemies; that will sully all the glory of David's triumphs, and give occasion to the enemies of God and Israel to brave themselves proudly. See Deut. 32. 26, 27. Their tender mercies are cruel; and in three months they will do that damage to the nation, which many years will not repair. But, [2.] He casts himself upon God; Let us fall now into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great. Men are God's hand, so they are called, Ps. 17. 14. the sword of his sending, yet there are some judgments which come more immediately from his hand than others, as famine and pestilence; and which of these shall be the scourge, he refers it to God, who chooses the shortest, that he might the sooner testify his being reconciled. But some think that David, by these words, intimates his choice of the pestilence. The land had not yet recovered the famine under which it smarted three years upon the Gibeonites' account, and therefore let us not be corrected with that rod, for that also will be the triumph of our neighbours; hence we read of the reproach of famine; (Ezek. 36. 30.) but, if Israel must be diminished, let it be by the pestilence, for that is falling into the hands of the Lord, who usually inflicted that judgment by the hand of his own immediate servants, the angels, as in the death of the first-born of Egypt. That is a judgment to which David himself, and his own family, lie as open as the meanest subject, but not so, either to famine or sword, and therefore David, tenderly conscious of his guilt, chooses that. Sword and famine will devour one as well as another, but, it may be thought, the destroying angel will draw his sword against those who are known to God to be most guilty. This will be of the shortest continuance, and he dreads the thought of lying long under the tokens of God's displeasure. It is a dreadful thing, the apostle says, to fall into the hands of the living God; (Heb. 10. 31.) a fearful thing indeed for sinners that have, by their impenitency, shut themselves out from all hope of his mercy: but David, a penitent, dares cast himself into God's hand, knowing he shall find that his mercies are great. Good men, even when they are under God's frowns, yet will entertain no other than good thoughts of him. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.

(3.) A pestilence is, accordingly, sent, (v. 15.) from Dan to Beer-sheba, from one end of the kingdom to the other, which shows it to come immediately from God's hand, and not from any natural causes: David has his choice, he suffers by miracle, and not by ordinary means. For the continuance of it, it lasted from morning (this very morning on which it was put to David's choice) to the time appointed, that is, to the third day, so Mr. Poole: or only to the evening of the first day, the time appointed for the evening sacrifice, so Bishop Patrick and others, who reckon that the pestilence lasted but nine hours, and that, in compassion to David, God shortened the time he had first mentioned. The execution the pestilence did, was very severe, there died seventy thousand men, that were all well, and sick, and dead, in a few hours. What a great cry, may we suppose, was there now throughout all the land of Israel, as there was in Egypt when the first-born were slain: but that was at midnight, this, in the day-time, Ps. 91. 6. See the power of the angels, when God gives them commission, either to save or to destroy: Joab is nine months in passing with his pen, the angel but nine hours in passing with his sword, through all the coasts and corners of the land of Israel. See how easily God can bring down the proudest sinners, and how much we owe daily to the divine patience. David's adultery is punished, for the present, only with the death of one infant, his pride, with the death of all those thousands, so much does God hate pride. The number slain amounts almost to a half decimation; seventy thousand was about one in twenty: now we may suppose, David's flesh trembled for fear of God, and he was afraid of his judgments, Ps. 119. 120.

III. God's gracious relaxation of the judgment, when it began to be inflicted upon Jerusalem, v. 16. The angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem, as if he intended to do greater execution there than any where else, even to destroy it; the country had drunk of the bitter cup, but Jerusalem must drink the dregs: it should seem, that was last numbered, and therefore was reserved to be last plagued; perhaps there was more wickedness, especially more pride, (and that was the sin now chastised,) in Jerusalem than elsewhere, therefore the hand of the destroyer is stretched out upon that: but then the Lord repented him of the evil, changed not his mind, but his way, and said to the destroying angel, It is enough; stay now thine hand, and let mercy rejoice against judgment. Jerusalem shall be spared for the ark's sake, for it is the place God hath chosen to put his name there. See here how ready God is to forgive, and how little pleasure he takes in punishing; and let it encourage us to meet him by repentance in the way of his judgments. This was on mount Moriah. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that in the very place where Abraham, by a countermand from heaven, was stayed from slaying his son, this angel, by a like countermand, was stayed from destroying Jerusalem. It is for the sake of the great Sacrifice, that our forfeited lives are preserved from the destroying angel.

IV. David's renewed repentance for his sin upon this occasion, v. 17. He saw the angel, (God opening his eyes for that purpose,) saw his sword stretched out to destroy, a flaming sword; saw him ready to sheath it, upon the orders given him to stay proceedings; seeing this, he spoke, not to the angel, (he knew better than to address himself to the servant in the presence of the Master, or to give that honour to the creature, which is the Creator's due,) but to the Lord, and said, Lo, I have sinned. Note, True penitents, the more they receive of God's sparing pardoning mercy, the more humbled they are for sin, and the more resolved against it. They shall be ashamed, when I am facified toward them, Ezek. 16. 63. Observe, 1. How he criminalizes himself, as if he could never speak ill enough of his own fault; "I have sinned, and I have done wickedly, mine is the crime, and therefore on me be the cross; Let thy hand be against me, and my father's house; I am the sinner, let me be the sufferer;" so willing was he to accept the punishment of his iniquity, though he was worth ten thousand of them. 2. How he intercedes for the people, whose bitter lamentations made his heart to ache, and his ears to tingle; These sheep, what have they done? Done! Why they had done much amiss; it was their sin that provoked God to leave David himself to do as he did; yet, as became a penitent, he is severe upon his own faults, while he extenuates their's. Most people, when God's judgments are abroad, charge others with being the cause of them, and care not who falls by them, so they can escape; but David's penitent and public spirit was otherwise affected. Let this remind us of the grace of our Lord Jesus, who gave himself for our sins, and was willing that God's hand should be against him, that we might escape. The shepherd was smitten, that the sheep might be spared.

18. And Gad came that day to David, and said unto him, Go up, rear an altar unto the LORD in the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. 19. And David, according to the saying of Gad, went up, as the LORD commanded. 20. And Araunah looked, and saw the king and his servants coming on toward him: and Araunah went out, and bowed himself before the king on his face upon the ground. 21. And Araunah said, Wherefore is my lord the king come to his servant? And David said, To buy the threshing-floor of thee, to build an altar unto the LORD, that the plague may be stayed from the people. 22. And Araunah said unto David, Let my lord the king take and offer up what seemeth good unto him: behold, here be oxen for burnt-sacrifice, and threshing instruments and other instruments of the oxen for wood. 23. All these things did Araunah, as a king, give unto the king: and Araunah said unto the king, The LORD thy God accept thee. 24. And the king said unto Araunah, Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price: neither will I offer burnt-offerings unto the LORD my God of that which doth cost me nothing. So David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver. 25. And David built there an altar unto the LORD, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. So the LORD was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.

Here is,

I. A command sent to David, to erect an altar in the place where he saw the angel, v. 18. This was to intimate to David, 1. That, upon his repeated submission and humiliation, God was now thoroughly reconciled to him; for if the Lord had been pleased to kill him, he would not have accepted an offering, and therefore would not have ordered him to build an altar. God's encouraging us to offer to him spiritual sacrifices, is a comfortable evidence of his reconciling us to himself. 2. That peace is made between God and sinners by sacrifice, and not otherwise, even by Christ the great Propitiation, of whom all the legal sacrifices were types. It is for his sake, that the destroying angel is bid to stay his hand. 3. That when God's judgments are graciously stayed, we ought to acknowledge it with thankfulness, to his praise. This altar was to be for thank-offerings. See Isa. 12. 1.

II. The purchase which David made of the ground, in order hereunto. It seems, the owner was a Jebusite, Araunah by name, proselyted, no doubt, to the Jewish religion, though by birth a Gentile, and therefore allowed, not only to dwell among the Israelites, but to have a possession of his own in a city, Lev. 25. 29, 30. The piece of ground was a threshing-floor, a mean place, yet thus dignified; a place of labour, therefore thus dignified. Now,

1. David went in person to the owner, to treat with him. See his justice, that he would not so much as use it in the present exigence, though the proprietor was an alien, though himself was a king, and though he had express orders from God to rear an altar there, till he had bought it, and paid for it. God hates robbery for burnt-offering. See his humility, how far he was from taking state; though a king, he was now a penitent, and therefore, in token of his self-abasement, he neither sent for Araunah to come to him, nor sent another to deal with him, but went himself; (v. 19.) and, though it looked like a diminution of himself, he lost no honour by it; Araunah, when he saw him, went and bowed himself to the ground before him, v. 20. Great men will be never the less respected for their humility, but the more.

2. Araunah, when he understood his business, (v. 21.) generously offered him, not only the ground to build his altar on, but oxen for sacrifices, and other things that might be of use to him in the service, (v. 22.) and all this, gratis, and a good prayer into the bargain; The Lord thy God accept thee! This he did, (1.) Because he had a generous spirit with a great estate. He gave as a king, (v. 23.) though an ordinary subject, he had the spirit of a prince. In the Hebrew it is, He gave, even the king to the king, whence it is supposed that Araunah had been king of the Jebusites in that place; or was descended from their royal family, though now a tributary to David. (2.) Because he greatly honoured David, though his conqueror, upon the score of his personal merits, and never thought he could do too much to oblige him. (3.) Because he had an affection for Israel, and earnestly desired that the plague might be stayed; and the honour of its being stayed at his threshing-floor he would account a valuable consideration for all he now tendered to David.

3. David resolves to pay the full value of it, and does so, v. 24. Here were two generous souls well met. Araunah is very willing to give; but David is determined to buy, and for a good reason—he will not offer that to God, which cost him nothing. He would not take advantage of the pious Jebusite's generosity; he thanks him, no doubt, for his kind offer, but pays him now fifty shekels of silver, for the floor and the oxen, for the present service, and afterward 600 shekels of gold for the ground adjoining, to build the temple on. Note, Those know not what religion is, all whose care it is, to make it cheap and easy to themselves, and who are best pleased with that which costs them least pains or money. What have we our substance for, but to honour God with it; and how can it be better bestowed?

III. The building of the altar, and the offering of the proper sacrifices upon it; (v. 25.) burnt-offerings, to the glory of God's justice in the execution that had been done; and peace-offerings, to the glory of his mercy in the seasonable staying of the process. Hereupon, God showed (it is supposed by fire from heaven consuming the sacrifices) that he was entreated for the land, and that it was in mercy, that the plague was removed, and in token of God's being reconciled both to prince and people. Christ is our Altar, our Sacrifice; in him alone we may expect to find favour with God, to escape his wrath, and the sword, the flaming sword, of that cherubim, which keeps the way of the tree of life.

OF THE FIRST BOOK OF

Many histories are books of kings and their reigns, to which the affairs of their kingdoms are reduced; it is a piece of honour that has commonly been paid to crowned heads. The holy Scripture is the history of the kingdom of God among men, under the several administrations of it; but there, the King is one, and his Name one. The particular history now before us, accounts for the affairs of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, yet with special regard to the kingdom of God among them; for still it is a sacred history, much more instructive, and not less entertaining, than any of the histories of the kings of the earth, to which (those of them that are of any certainty) it is prior in time; for though there were kings in Edom before there was any king in Israel, Gen. 36. 31. (foreigners, in that point of state, got the precedence,) yet the history of the kings of Israel lives, and will live, in holy writ, to the end of the world, whereas that of the kings of Edom is long since buried in oblivion: for the honour that comes from God, is durable, while the honour of the world is like a mushroom, which comes up in a night, and perishes in a night.

The Bible began with the story of the Patriarchs, and Prophets, and Judges, men whose converse with heaven was more immediate, (the record of which strengthens our faith,) but is not so easily accommodated to our case, now that we expect not visions, as the subsequent history of affairs like ours, under the direction of common providence; and here also we find, though not many types and figures of the Messiah, yet great expectations of him: for not only prophets, but kings, desired to see the great mysteries of the gospel, Luke 10. 24.

The two books of Samuel are introductions to the books of the Kings, as they relate the origin of the royal government in Saul, and of the royal family in David. These two books give us an account of David's successor, Solomon, the division of his kingdom, and the succession of the several kings both of Judah and Israel, with an abstract of their history down to the captivity. And as from the book of Genesis we may collect excellent rules of economics, for the good governing of families; so from these books, of politics, for the directing of public affairs. There is in these books special regard had to the house and lineage of David, from which Christ came. Some of his sons trod in his steps, and others did not. The characters of the kings of Judah may be thus briefly given:—David the devout, Solomon the wise, Rehoboam the simple, Abijah the valiant, Asa the upright, Jehoshaphat the religious, Jehoram the wicked, Ahaziah the profane, Joash the backslider, Amaziah the rash, Uzziah the mighty, Jotham the peaceable, Ahaz the idolater, Hezekiah the reformer, Manasseh the penitent, Amon the obscure, Josiah the tender-hearted, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, all wicked, and such as brought ruin quickly on themselves and their kingdom. The number of the good and bad is nearly equal, but the reigns of the good were generally long, and those of the bad, short. The consideration of which will make the state of Israel not altogether so bad in this period as, at first, it seems. In this first book, we have,

- I. The death of David, ch. 1. and 2.
- II. The glorious reign of Solomon, and his building of the temple; (ch. 3..10.) but the cloud his sun set under, ch. 11.
- III. The division of the kingdoms in the reign of Rehoboam, and his reign and Jeroboam's, ch. 12..14.
- IV. The reigns of Abijah and Asa over Judah, Baasha and Omri over Israel, ch. 15. and 16.
- V. Elijah's miracles, ch. 17..19.
- VI. Ahab's success against Ben-hadad, his wickedness and fall, ch. 20..22. And in all this history it appears that kings, though gods to us, are men to God, mortal and accountable.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter, we have, I. David declining in his health, v. 1. . 4. II. Adonijah aspiring to the kingdom, and treating his party, in order to it, v. 5. . 10. III. Nathan and Bath-sheba contriving to secure the succession to Solomon, and prevailing for an order from David for that purpose, v. 11. . 31. IV. The anointing of Solomon accordingly, and the people's joy therein, v. 32. . 40. V. The effectual stop this put to Adonijah's usurpation, and the dispersion of his party, thereupon, v. 41. . 49. VI. Solomon's dismissal of Adonijah upon his good behaviour, v. 50. . 53.

NOW king David was old and stricken in years; and they covered him with clothes, but he gat no heat. 2. Wherefore his servants said unto him, Let there be sought for my lord the king a young virgin; and let her stand before the king, and let her cherish him, and let her lie in thy bosom, that my lord the king may get heat. 3. So they sought for a fair damsel throughout all the coasts of Israel, and found Abishag a Shunammite, and brought her to the king. 4. And the damsel was very fair, and cherished the king, and ministered to him: but the king knew her not.

David, in the foregoing chapter, had, by the great mercy of God, escaped the sword of the destroying angel; but our deliverances from or through diseases and dangers, are but reprieves; if the candle be not blown out, it will burn out of itself. We have David here sinking under the infirmities of old age, and brought by them to the gates of the grave. He that cometh up out of the pit, shall fall into the snare; and, one way or other, we must needs die.

1. It would have troubled one to see David so infirm. He was old, and his natural heat so wasted, that no clothes could keep him warm, v. 1. David had been a valiant active man, and a man of business, and very vehement had the flame always been in his breast; and yet now his blood is chilled and stagnated, he is confined to his bed, and there can get no heat. He was now 70 years old. Many, at that age, are as lively and fit for business as ever: but David was now chastised for his former sins, especially that in the matter of Uriah, and felt from his former toils, and the hardships he had gone through in his youth, which then he made nothing of, but was now the worse for. Let not the strong man glory in his strength, which may soon be weakened by sickness, or, at last, will be weakened by old age. Let young people remember their Creator in the days of their youth, before these evil days come. What our hand finds to do for God, and our souls, and our generation, let us do with all our might, because the night comes, the night of old age, in which no man can work; and when our strength is gone, it will be a comfort to remember that we used it well.

2. It would have troubled one to see his physicians so weak and unskilful, that they knew no other way of relieving him, than by outward applications. No cordials, no spirits, but, (1.) They covered him with clothes, which, where there is any inward heat, will keep it in, and so increase it; but, where it is not, they have none to communicate, no, not royal clothing. Elihu makes it a difficulty to understand how our garments are warm upon us; (Job 37. 17.) but if God deny his blessing, men clothe them, and there is none warm; (Hag. 1. 6.) David here was not. (2.) They foolishly prescribed nuptials to one that should rather have been preparing for his funeral; (v. 2. . 4.) but they knew what would gratify their own corruptions, and perhaps were too willing to gratify his, under colour of consulting his health; his prophets should have been consulted as well as his physicians, in an affair of this nature. However, this might be excused then, when even good men ignorantly allowed themselves to have many wives. We now have not so learned Christ, but are taught, that one man must have but one wife; (Matth. 19. 5.) and further, that it is good for a man not to touch a woman, 1 Cor. 7. 1. That Abishag was married to David before she lay with him, and was his secondary wife, appears from its being imputed as a great crime to Adonijah, that he desired to marry her, (ch. 2. 22.) after his father's death.

5. Then Adonijah the son of Haggith exalted himself, saying, I will be king: and he prepared him chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him. 6. And his father had not displeased him at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so? and he also was a very goodly man; and his mother bare him after Absalom. 7. And he conferred with Joab the son of Zeruiah, and with Abiathar the priest: and they, following Adonijah, helped him. 8. But Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and Nathan the prophet, and Shimei, and Rei, and the mighty men which belonged to David, were not with Adonijah. 9. And Adonijah slew sheep and oxen and fat cattle by the stone of Zoheth, which is by En-rogel, and called all his brethren the king's sons, and all the men of Judah the king's servants: 10. But Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah, and the mighty men, and Solomon his brother, he called not.

David had much affliction in his children; Amnon and Absalom had both been his grief; the one his first-born, the other his third: (2 Sam. 3. 2, 3.) his second, whom he had by Abigail, we will suppose he had comfort in; his fourth was Adonijah, (2 Sam. 3, 4.) he was one of those that were born in Hebron; we have heard nothing of him till now, and here we are told that he was a comely person, and that he was next in age, and (as it proved) next in temper, to Absalom, v. 6. And further, that in his father's eyes he had been a jewel, but was now a thorn.

I. His father had made a fondling of him, v. 6. He had not displeased him at any time. It is not said, He never displeased his father; it is probable that he had done so frequently, and his father was secretly troubled at his misconduct, and lamented it before God: but his father had not displeased him, either by crossing him in his humours, or denying him any thing he had a mind to, or by calling him to an account, as to what he had done, and where he had been, or by keeping him to his book or his business, or reproving him for what he saw or heard of, that he did amiss; he never said to him, Why hast thou done so? Because he saw it was uneasy to him, and he could not bear it without fretting. It was the son's fault that he was displeased at reproof, and took it for an affront, whereby he lost the benefit of it. And it was the father's fault, that, because he saw it displeased him, he did not reprove him; and now he justly smarted for indulging him. They who honour their sons more than God as they do, who keep them not under good discipline, thereby forfeit the honour they might expect from their sons.

II. He, in return, made a fool of his father: because he was old, and confined to his bed, he thought no notice was to be taken of him, and therefore exalted himself; and said, I will be king, v. 5. Children that are indulged, learn to be proud and ambitious, and that is the ruin of a great many young people. The way to keep them humble, is, to keep them under. Observe Adonijah's insolence. 1. He looks upon the days of mourning for his father to be at hand, and therefore he prepares to succeed him, though he knew that by the designation both of God and David, Solomon was to be the man, for public notice had been given of it by David himself, and the succession settled, as it were, by act of parliament, in pursuance of God's appointment, 1 Chron. 22. 9.—23. 1. This entail Adonijah attempted by force to cut off, in contempt both of God and his father. Thus is the kingdom of Christ opposed, and there are those that say, "We will not have him to reign over us." 2. He looks upon his father as superannuated, and good for nothing, and therefore he enters immediately upon the possession of the throne. He cannot wait till his father's head be laid low, but it must now be said, Adonijah reigns, (v. 18.) and God save king Adonijah, v. 25. His father is not fit to govern, for he is old and past it; nor Solomon, for he is young, and not come to it; and therefore Adonijah will take it upon him. It argues a very base and wicked mind, for children to insult over their parents, because of the infirmities of their age.

In pursuance of this ambitious prospect, (1.) He got a great retinue, (v. 5.) chariots and horsemen, both for state and strength; to wait on him, and to fight for him. (2.) He made great interest with no less than Joab, the general of the army, and Abiathar the High Priest, v. 7. That he should make his court to those, who, by their influence in church and camp, were capable of doing him great service, is not strange; but we may well wonder by what arts they could be drawn to follow him, and help him. They were old men, who had been faithful to David, in the most difficult and troublesome of his times; men of sense and experience, who, one would think, would not easily be wheedled. They could not propose any advantage to themselves by it, for they were both at the top of their preferment, and stood fast in it. They could not be ignorant of the entail of the crown upon Solomon, which it was not in their power to cut off, and whom therefore it was their interest to oblige. But God, in this matter, left them to themselves, perhaps, to correct them for some former misconduct, with a scourge of their own making. We are told (v. 8.) who they were, that they were of such approved fidelity to David, that Adonijah had not the confidence so much as to propose it to them; Zadok, Benaiah, and Nathan. A man that has given proofs of his resolute adherence to that which is good, shall not be asked to do a bad thing. (3.) He prepared a great entertainment (v. 9.) at En-rogel, not far from Jerusalem; his guests were the king's sons, and the king's servants, whom he feasted and caressed, to bring them over to his party; but Solomon was not invited, either because he despised him, or because he despaired of him, v. 10. Such as serve their own belly, and will be in the interest of those that will feast them, what side soever they are of, are an easy prey to seducers, Rom. 16. 18. Some think that Adonijah slew these sheep and oxen, even fat ones, for sacrifice, and that it was a religious feast he made, beginning his usurpation with a show of devotion, as Absalom, under the colour of a vow, (2 Sam. 15. 7.) which he might do the more plausibly, when he had the High Priest himself on his side. It is pity that any occasion should ever be given to say, In nomine Domini incipit omne malum—In the name of the Lord begins all evil, and that religious exercises should be made to patronise unrighteous practices.

11. Wherefore Nathan spake unto Bathsheba the mother of Solomon, saying, Hast thou not heard that Adonijah the son of Haggith doth reign, and David our lord knoweth it not? 12. Now therefore come, let me, I pray thee, give thee counsel, that thou mayest save thine own life, and the life of thy son Solomon. 13. Go and get thee in unto king David, and say unto him, Didst not thou, my lord, O king, swear unto thine handmaid, saying, Assuredly Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne? why then doth Adonijah reign? 14. Behold, while thou yet talkest there with the king, I also will come in after thee, and confirm thy words. 15. And Bathsheba went in unto the king into the chamber: and the king was very old; and Abishag the Shunammite ministered unto the king. 16. And Bathsheba bowed, and did obeisance unto the king. And the king said, What wouldest thou? 17. And she said unto him, My lord, thou swarest by the LORD thy God unto thine handmaid, saying, Assuredly Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne: 18. And now, behold, Adonijah reigneth; and now, my lord the king, thou knowest it not: 19. And he hath slain oxen and fat cattle and sheep in abundance, and hath called all the sons of the king, and Abiathar the priest, and Joab the captain of the host: but Solomon thy servant hath he not called. 20. And thou, my lord, O king, the eyes of all Israel are upon thee, that thou shouldest tell them who shall sit on the throne of my lord the king after him. 21. Otherwise it shall come to pass, when my lord the king shall sleep with his fathers, that I and my son Solomon shall be counted offenders. 22. And, lo, while she yet talked with the king, Nathan the prophet also came in. 23. And they told the king, saying, Behold, Nathan the prophet. And when he was come in before the king, he bowed himself before the king with his face to the ground. 24. And Nathan said, My lord, O king, hast thou said, Adonijah shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne? 25. For he is gone down this day, and hath slain oxen and fat cattle and sheep in abundance, and hath called all the king's sons, and the captains of the host, and Abiathar the priest: and, behold, they eat and drink before him, and say, God save king Adonijah. 26. But me even me thy servant, and Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and thy servant Solomon, hath he not called. 27. Is this thing done by my lord the king, and thou hast not showed it unto thy servant, who should sit on the throne of my lord the king after him? 28. Then king David answered and said, Call me Bath-sheba. And she came into the king's presence, and stood before the king. 29. And the king sware, and said, As the LORD liveth, that hath redeemed my soul out of all distress, 30. Even as I swear unto thee by the LORD God of Israel, saying, Assuredly Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne in my stead; even so will I certainly do this day. 31. Then Bath-sheba bowed with her face to the earth, and did reverence to the king, and said, Let my lord king David live for ever.

We have here the effectual endeavours that were used by Nathan and Bath-sheba, to obtain from David a ratification of Solomon's succession, for the crushing of Adonijah's usurpation. 1. David himself knew not what was doing. Disobedient children think that they were well enough off, if they can but keep their good old parents ignorant of their bad courses; but a bird of the air will carry the voice. 2. Bath-sheba lived retired, and knew nothing of it, till Nathan informed her. Many get very comfortably through this world, that know little how the world goes. 3. Solomon, it is likely, knew of it, but was a deaf man that heard not. Though he had years, and wisdom above his years, yet we do not find that he stirred to oppose Adonijah, but quietly composed himself, and left it to God and his friends to order the matter. Hence David, in his Psalm for Solomon, observes, that while men, in pursuit of the world, in vain rise early and sit up late, God giveth his beloved (his Jeditiahs) sleep, in giving them to be easy, and gain their point without agitation, Ps. 127. 1, 2. How then is the design brought about?

I. Nathan the prophet alarms Bath-sheba, by acquainting her with the case, and puts her in a way to get an order from the king, for the confirming of Solomon's title. He was concerned, because he knew God's mind, and David's and Israel's interest; it was by him that God had named Solomon Jeditiah, (2 Sam. 12. 25.) and therefore he could not sit still, and see the throne usurped, which he knew was Solomon's right, by the will of Him from whom promotion cometh. When crowns were disposed of by immediate direction from heaven, no marvel that prophets were so much interested and employed in that matter; but now that common providence rules the affairs of the kingdom of men, (Dan. 4. 32.) the subordinate agency must be left to common persons, and let not prophets intermeddle in them, but keep to the affairs of the kingdom of God among men. Nathan applies himself to Bath-sheba, as one that had the greatest concern for Solomon, and could have the freest access to David. He acquaints her with Adonijah's attempt, (v. 11.) and that it was not with David's consent or knowledge. He suggests to her, that not only Solomon was in danger of losing the crown, but that he and she too were in danger of losing their lives, if Adonijah prevailed. A humble spirit may be indifferent to a crown, and may be content notwithstanding the prospect of it, to sit down short of the possession of it. But the law of self-preservation, and the sixth commandment, obliges us to use all possible endeavours to secure our own life and the life of others. Now, says Nathan, let me give thee counsel how to save thy own life, and the life of thy son, v. 12. Such as this, is the counsel that Christ's ministers give us in his name, to give all diligence, not only that no man take our crown, (Rev. 3. 11.) but that we save our lives, even the lives of our souls. He directs her, (v. 13.) to go to the king, to remind him of his word and oath, that Solomon should be his successor; and to ask him in the most humble manner, Why doth Adonijah reign? He thought David was not so cold, but this would warm him. Conscience, as well as a sense of honour, would put life into him, upon such an occasion as this; and he promises, (v. 14.) that while she was reasoning with the king upon this matter, he would come in and second her, as if he came accidentally, which perhaps the king might look upon as a special providence, (and he was one that took notice of such evidences, 1 Sam. 25. 32, 33.) or, however, it would help to awaken him so much the more.

II. Bath-sheba, according to his advice and direction, loses no time, but immediately makes her application to the king, on the same errand that Esther came to king Ahasuerus, to intercede for her life. She needed not wait for a call, as Esther did, she knew she should be welcome at any time; but it is remarked that when she visited the king Abishag was ministering to him, (v. 15.) and Bath-sheba took no displeasure either at him or her for it. Also that she bowed, and did obedience to the king, (v. 16.) in token of her respect to him, both as her prince and as her husband; such a genuine daughter was she of Sarah, who obeyed Abraham, calling him lord. They that would find favour with superiors, must show them reverence, and be dutiful to those whom they expect to be kind to them. Her address to the king, on this occasion, is very discreet. 1. She reminds him of his promise made to her, and confirmed with a solemn oath, that Solomon should succeed him, v. 17. She knew how fast this would hold such a conscientious man as David was. 2. She informs him of Adonijah's attempt, which he was ignorant of; (v. 18.) "Adonijah reigns in competition with thee for the present, and in contradiction to thy promise for the future. The fault is not thine, for thou knewest it not; but now that thou knowest it, thou wilt, in pursuance of thy promise, take care to suppress it." She tells him who were his guests, and who were in his interest, but Solomon thy servant has he not called, which plainly shows he looks upon him as his rival, and aims to undermine him, v. 19. It is not an oversight, but a contempt of the act of settlement, that Solomon is neglected. 3. She pleads that it was very much in his power to obviate this mischief; (v. 20.) The eyes of all Israel are upon thee, not only as a king, for we cannot suppose it to be the prerogative of any prince to bequeath his subjects by will, (as if they were his goods and chattels, to whom he pleases, but as a prophet. All Israel knew that David was not only himself the anointed of the God of Jacob, but that the Spirit of the Lord spake by him, (2 Sam. 23. 1, 2.) and therefore waiting for, and depending upon, a divine designation, in a matter of such importance, David's word would be an oracle and a law to them; this therefore (says Bath-sheba) they expect, and it will end the controversy, and effectually quash all Adonijah's pretensions. A divine sentence is in the lips of the king. Note, Whatever power, interest, or influence, men have, they ought to improve it to the utmost, for the preserving and advancing of the kingdom of the Messiah, of which Solomon's kingdom was a type. 4. She suggests the imminent peril which she and her son would be in, if this matter was not settled in David's life-time, v. 21. If Adonijah prevail, as he is likely to do, (having Joab the general, and Abiathar the High Priest, on his side,) Solomon and all his friends will be looked upon as traitors, and dealt with accordingly; usurpers are most cruel. If Adonijah had got into the throne, he would not have dealt so fairly with Solomon, as Solomon did with him. Those hazard every thing, who stand in the way of such as, against right, force their entrance.

III. Nathan the prophet, according to his promise, seasonably stepped in, and seconded her, while she was speaking, before the king had given his answer, lest, if he had heard Bath-sheba's representation only, his answer should have been dilatory, and only that he would consider of it: but out of the mouth of two witnesses, two such witnesses, the word would be established, and he would immediately give positive orders. The king is told that Nathan the prophet is come, and he is sure to be always welcome to the king, especially, when either he is not well, or has any great affair upon his thoughts, for, in either case, a prophet will be, in a particular manner, serviceable to him. Nathan knows he must render honour to whom honour is due, and therefore pays the king the same respect now that he finds him sick in bed, as he would have done, if he had found him in his throne; he bowed himself with his face to the ground, v. 23. He deals a little more plainly with the king than Bath-sheba had done, in which his character would support him, and the present languor of the king's spirits made it necessary that they should be roused. 1. He makes the same representation of Adonijah's attempt, as Bath-sheba had made, (v. 25, 26.) adding, that his party were already got to that height of assurance, as to shout God save king Adonijah, as if king David were already dead, taking notice also, that they had not invited him to their feast, Me, thy servant, has he not called; thereby intimating, that they resolved not to consult either God or David in the matter, for Nathan was a secretioribus consiliis—intimately acquainted with the mind of both. He makes David sensible how much he was concerned to clear himself from having a hand in it. Hast thou said, Adonijah shall reign after me? v. 24. And again, (v. 27.) "Is this thing done by my lord the king?" If it be, he is not so faithful either to God's word or to his own, as we all took him to be; if it be not, it is high time that we witness against the usurpation, and declare Solomon his successor. If it be, why is not Nathan made acquainted with it, who is not only, in general, the king's confidant, but is particularly concerned in this matter, having been employed to notify to David the mind of God concerning the succession; but if my lord the king know nothing of the matter, (as certainly he does not,) what daring insolence are Adonijah and his party guilty of!" Thus he endeavours to incense David against them, that he might act the more vigorously for the support of Solomon's interest. Note, Good men would do their duty, if they were reminded of it, and put upon it, and told what occasion there is for them to appear: and those who thus are their remembrancers, do them a real kindness, as Nathan here did to David.

IV. David, hereupon, made a solemn declaration of his firm adherence to his former resolution, that Solomon should be his successor; Bath-sheba is called in, (v. 28.) and to her, as acting for and on behalf of her son, the king gives these fresh assurances. 1. He repeats his former promise and oath, owns that he had sworn unto her, by the Lord God of Israel, that Solomon should reign after him, v. 30. Though he is old, and his memory begins to fail him, yet he remembers this. Note, An oath is so sacred a thing, that the obligations of it cannot be broken, and so solemn a thing, that the impressions of it, one would think, cannot be forgotten. 2. He ratifies it with another, because the occasion called for it; As the Lord liveth, that hath redeemed my soul out of all distress, even so will I certainly do this day, without dispute, without delay. His form of swearing seems to be what he commonly used on solemn occasions, for we find it, 2 Sam. 4. 9. And it carries in it a grateful acknowledgment of the goodness of God to him, in bringing him safe through the many difficulties and hardships which had lain in his way; and which he now makes mention of, to the glory of God, as Jacob, when he lay a dying; (Gen. 48. 16.) thus setting to his seal, from his own experience, that that was true, which the Lord spake by him; (Ps. 34. 22.) The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants. Dying saints ought to be witnesses for God, and speak of him as they have found. Perhaps, he speaks thus, on this occasion, for the encouragement of his son and successor, to trust in God in the distresses he also might meet with.

Bath-sheba receives these assurances, (v. 31.) (1.) With great complaisance to the king's person; she did reverence to him, while Adonijah and his party affronted him. (2.) With hearty good wishes for the king's health, Let him live. So far was she from thinking that he lived too long, that she prayed he might live for ever, if it were possible, to adorn the crown he wore, and to be a blessing to his people. We should earnestly desire the prolonging of useful lives, however it may be the postponing of any advantages of our own.

32. And king David said, Call me Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada. And they came before the king. 33. The king also said unto them, Take with you the servants of your lord, and cause Solomon my son to ride upon mine own mule, and bring him down to Gihon: 34. And let Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet anoint him there king over Israel: and blow ye with the trumpet, and say, God save king Solomon. 35. Then ye shall come up after him, that he may come and sit upon my throne; for he shall be king in my stead: and I have appointed him to be ruler over Israel and over Judah. 36. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada answered the king, and said, Amen: the LORD God of my lord the king say so too. 37. As the LORD hath been with my lord the king, even so be he with Solomon, and make his throne greater than the throne of my lord king David. 38. So Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, went down, and caused Solomon to ride upon king David's mule, and brought him to Gihon. 39. And Zadok the priest took a horn of oil out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon. And they blew the trumpet; and all the people said, God save king Solomon. 40. And all the people came up after him; and the people piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them.

We have here the effectual care David took, both to secure Solomon's right, and to preserve the public peace, by crushing Adonijah's project in the bud. Observe,

I. The express orders he gave for the proclaiming of Solomon. The persons he entrusted with this great affair, were, Zadok, Nathan, and Benaiah, men of power and interest, whom David had always reposed a confidence in, and found faithful to him, and whom Adonijah had passed by in his invitation, v. 10. David orders them forthwith, with all possible solemnity, to proclaim Solomon; they must take with them the servants of their lord, the life-guards, and all the servants of the household; they must set Solomon on the mule the king used to ride, for he kept not such stables of horses as his son afterward did; he appoints them whither to go, (v. 33.) and (v. 34, 35.) what to do. 1. Zadok and Nathan, the two ecclesiastical persons, must, in God's name, anoint him king: for though he was not the first of his family, as Saul and David were, yet he was a younger son, was made king by divine appointment, and his title was contested, which made it necessary that hereby it should be settled. This unction was typical of the designation and qualification of the Messiah, or Christ, the anointed One, on whom the Spirit, that oil of gladness, was poured without measure, Heb. 1. 9. Ps. 89. 20. And all real christians, being heirs of the kingdom, (Jam. 2. 5.) do from him receive the anointing, 1 John 2. 27. 2. The great officers, civil and military, are ordered to give public notice of this, and to express the public joy upon this occasion, by sound of trumpet, by which the law of Moses directed the gracing of great solemnities; to this must be added the acclamations of the people, "Let king Solomon live, let him prosper, let his kingdom be established and perpetuated, and let him long continue in the enjoyment of it;" so it had been promised concerning him, (Ps. 72. 15.) He shall live. 3. They must then bring him in state to the city of David, and he must sit upon the throne of his father, as his substitute now, or viceroy, to despatch public business during his weakness, and be his successor after his death; He shall be king in my stead. It would be a great satisfaction to David himself, and to all parties concerned, to have this done immediately, that, upon the demise of the king, there might be no dispute, or agitation, in the public affairs. David was far from grudging his successor the honour of appearing such in his life-time, and yet perhaps was so taken up with his devotions on his sick bed, that if he had not been put in mind of it by others, this great good work, which was so necessary to the public repose, had been left undone.

II. The great satisfaction which Benaiah, in the name of the rest, professed in these orders. The king said, "Solomon shall reign for me, and reign after me;" "Amen," (says Benaiah, heartily,) "as the king says, so say we, we are entirely satisfied in the nomination, and concur in the choice; we give our vote for Solomon, nemine contradicente—unanimously, and since we can bring nothing to pass, much less establish it, without the concurrence of a propitious providence, the Lord God of my lord the king say so too!" v. 36. This is the language of his faith in that promise of God, on which Solomon's government was founded. If we say as God says in his word, we may hope that he will say as we say by his providence. To this he adds a prayer for Solomon, (v. 37.) that God would be with him as he had been with David, and make his throne greater. He knew David was none of those that envy their children's greatness, and therefore that he would not be disquieted at this prayer, nor take it as an affront, but would heartily say Amen to it. The wisest and best man in the world desires his children may be wiser and better than he, for he himself desires to be wiser and better than he is; and wisdom and goodness are true greatness.

III. The immediate execution of these orders, v. 38. . 40. No time was lost, but Solomon was brought in state to the place appointed, and there Zadok (who, though he was not as yet High Priest, was, we may suppose, the Suffragan, the Jews called him the Sagan, or second priest) anointed him by the direction of Nathan the prophet, and David the king, v. 39. In the tabernacle, where the ark was now lodged, was kept, among other sacred things, the holy oil, for many religious services; thence Zadok took a horn of oil, which denotes both power and plenty, and therewith anointed Solomon. We do not find that Abiathar pretended to anoint Adonijah, he was made king by a feast, not by an unction; whom God calls he will qualify, which was signified by the anointing; usurpers had it not. Christ signifies anointed, and he is the King whom God hath set upon his holy hill of Zion, according to the decree, Ps. 2. 6, 7. Christians also are made to our God (and by him) kings, and they have an unction from the Holy One, 1 John 2. 20.

The people, hereupon, express their great joy and satisfaction in the elevation of Solomon, surround him with their Hosannas, God save king Solomon, and attend him with their music and shouts of joy, v. 40. Hereby they declared their concurrence in the choice, and that he was not forced upon them, but cheerfully accepted by them. The power of a prince can be little satisfaction to himself, unless he knows it to be a satisfaction to his people. Every Israelite indeed rejoices in the exaltation of the Son of David.

41. And Adonijah, and all the guests that were with him, heard it, as they had made an end of eating. And when Joab heard the sound of the trumpet, he said, Wherefore is this noise of the city being in an uproar? 42. And while he yet spake, behold, Jonathan the son of Abiathar the priest came: and Adonijah said unto him, Come in; for thou art a valiant man, and bringest good tidings. 43. And Jonathan answered and said to Adonijah, Verily our lord king David hath made Solomon king. 44. And the king hath sent with him Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and they have caused him to ride upon the king's mule: 45. And Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet have anointed him king in Gihon; and they are come up from thence rejoicing, so that the city rang again. This is the noise that ye have heard. 46. And also Solomon sitteth on the throne of the kingdom. 47. And moreover, the king's servants came to bless our lord king David, saying, God make the name of Solomon better than thy name, and make his throne greater than thy throne. And the king bowed himself upon the bed. 48. And also thus said the king, Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, which hath given one to sit on my throne this day, mine eyes even seeing it. 49. And all the guests that were with Adonijah were afraid, and rose up, and went every man his way. 50. And Adonijah feared because of Solomon, and arose, and went, and caught hold on the horns of the altar. 51. And it was told Solomon, saying, Behold, Adonijah feareth king Solomon: for, lo, he hath caught hold on the horns of the altar, saying, Let king Solomon swear unto me to-day, that he will not slay his servant with the sword: 52. And Solomon said, If he will show himself a worthy man, there shall not a hair of him fall to the earth: but if wickedness shall be found in him, he shall die. 53. So king Solomon sent, and they brought him down from the altar. And he came and bowed himself to king Solomon: and Solomon said unto him, Go to thine house.

We have here,

I. The tidings of Solomon's inauguration brought to Adonijah and his party in the midst of their jollity. They had made an end of eating, and, it should seem, it was a great while before they made an end, for all the affair of Solomon's anointing was ordered, done, and finished, while they were at dinner, glutting themselves. Thus they who serve not our Lord Christ, but oppose him, are commonly such as serve their own belly, (Rom. 16. 18.) and make a god of it, Philip 3. 19. Their long feast intimates likewise that they were very secure, and confident of their interest, else they would not have lost so much time. The old world and Sodom were eating and drinking, secure and sensual, when their destruction came, Luke 17. 26, &c. When they had made an end of eating, and were preparing themselves to proclaim their king, and bring him in triumph into the city, they heard the sound of the trumpet, (v. 41.) and a dreadful sound it was in their ears, Job 15. 21. Joab was an old man, and was alarmed at it, apprehending the city to be in an uproar; but Adonijah is very confident that the messenger, being a worthy man, brings good tidings, v. 42. Usurpers flatter themselves with the hopes of success, and those are commonly least timorous, whose condition is most dangerous. But how can those who do evil deeds, expect to have good tidings? No, the worthiest man will bring them the worst news, as the priest's son did here to Adonijah, v. 43. "Verily, the best tidings I have to bring you, is, that Solomon is made king, so that your pretensions are all quashed."

He relates to them very particularly, 1. With what great solemnity Solomon was made king, (v. 44, 45.) and that he was now sitting on the throne of the kingdom, v. 46. Adonijah thought to have stepped into the throne before him, but Solomon was too quick for him. 2. With what general satisfaction Solomon was made king, so that that which was done, was not likely to be undone again. (1.) The people were pleased, witness their joyful acclamations, v. 45. (2.) The courtiers were pleased; The king's servants attended him with an address of congratulation upon this occasion, v. 47. We have here the heads of their address; they blessed king David, applauded his prudent care for the public welfare, acknowledged their happiness under his government, and prayed heartily for his recovery. They also prayed for Solomon, that God would make his name better than his father's, which it might well be, when he had his father's foundation to build upon; a child, on a giant's shoulders, is taller than the giant himself. (3.) The king himself is pleased; he bowed himself upon the bed, not only to signify his acceptance of his servants' address, but to offer up his own address to God; (v. 48.) "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who, as Israel's God, for Israel's good, has brought this matter to such a happy issue, mine eyes even seeing it." Note, it is a great satisfaction to good men, when they are going out of the world, to see the affairs of their families in a good posture, their children rising up in their stead to serve God and their generation, and especially to see peace upon Israel, and the establishment of it.

II. The effectual crush which this gave to Adonijah's attempt; it spoiled their sport, dispersed their company, and obliged every man to shift for his own safety. The triumphing of the wicked is short. They were building a castle in the air, which, having no foundation, would soon fall, and crush them; they were afraid of being taken in the fact, while they were together hatching their treason, and therefore each one made the best of his way.

III. The terror Adonijah himself was in, and the course he took to secure himself; he was now as much depressed as he had been elevated; (v. 42, 50.) he had despised Solomon, as not worthy to be his guest, (v. 10.) but now he dreads him as his judge; he feared because of Solomon. Thus they who oppose Christ and his kingdom, will shortly be made to tremble before him, and call, in vain, to rocks and mountains to shelter them from his wrath. He took hold on the horns of the altar, which was always looked upon as a sanctuary, or place of refuge; (Exod. 21. 14.) intimating hereby, that he durst not stand a trial, but threw himself upon the mercy of his prince, in suing for which, he relied upon no other plea than the mercy of God, which was manifested in the institution and acceptance of the sacrifices that were offered on that altar, and the remission of sin thereupon. Perhaps Adonijah had formerly slighted the service of the altar, yet now he courts the protection of it. Many who, in the day of their security, neglect the great salvation, under the arrest of the terrors of the Lord, would gladly be beholden to Christ and his merit, and, when it is too late, will catch hold of the horns of that altar.

IV. His humble address to Solomon for mercy. By those who brought Solomon tidings where he was, he sent a request for his life; (v. 51.) Let king Solomon swear to me that he will not slay his servant. He owns Solomon for his prince, and himself his servant; dares not justify himself, but makes supplication to his judge. It was a great change with him; he that, in the morning, was grasping at a crown, is, before night, begging for his life. Then Adonijah reigns, now Adonijah trembles, and cannot think himself safe, unless Solomon promise, with an oath, not to put him to death.

V. The orders Solomon gave concerning him. He discharged him, upon his good behaviour, v. 52, 53. He considers he is his brother; it was the first offence, perhaps: being so soon made sensible of his error, and then not persisting in his rebellion, he might prove, not only a peaceable, but a serviceable subject, and therefore, if he will conduct himself well for the future, what is past shall be pardoned: but, if he be found disaffected, turbulent, and aspiring, this offence shall be remembered against him, he shall be called up upon his former conviction, (as our law speaks,) and execution shall be awarded against him. Thus the son of David receives those to mercy, that have been rebellious: if they will return to their allegiance, and be faithful to their Sovereign, their former crimes shall not be mentioned against them; but if still they continue in the interests of the world and the flesh, that will be their ruin. Adonijah is sent for, and told upon what terms he stands, which he signifies his grateful submission to, and then is bid to go to his house, and live retired there. Solomon not only gave him his life, but his estate, thus establishing his throne by mercy.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, we have David setting, and Solomon, at the same time, rising. 1. The conclusion of David's reign with his life. 1. The charge he gives to Solomon upon his death-bed, in general, to serve God; (v. 1. . 4.) in particular, concerning Joab, Barzillai, and Shimei, v. 5. . 9. 2. His death and burial, and the years of his reign, v. 10, 11. 11. The beginning of Solomon's reign, v. 12. Though he was to be a prince of peace, he began his reign with some remarkable acts of justice, 1. Upon Adonijah, whom he put to death for his aspiring pretensions, v. 13. . 25. 2. Upon Abiathar, whom he deposed from the high priesthood for siding with Adonijah, v. 26, 27. 3. Upon Joab, whom he put to death for his late treason and former murders, v. 28. . 35. 4. Upon Shimei, whom, for cursing David, he confined to Jerusalem, (v. 36. . 38.) and, three years after, for transgressing the rules, put to death, v. 39. . 46.

1. NOW the days of David drew nigh that he should die: and he charged Solomon his son, saying, 2. I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong therefore, and show thyself a man; 3. And keep the charge of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself; 4. That the LORD may continue his word, which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth with all their heart and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (said he) a man on the throne of Israel. 5. Moreover, thou knowest also what Joab the son of Zeruiah did to me, and what he did to the two captains of the hosts of Israel, unto Abner the son of Ner, and unto Amasa the son of Jether, whom he slew, and shed the blood of war in peace, and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loins, and in his shoes that were on his feet. 6. Do therefore according to thy wisdom, and let not his hoar head go down to the grave in peace. 7. But show kindness unto the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, and let them be of those that eat at thy table: for so they came to me when I fled because of Absalom thy brother. 8. And, behold, thou hast with thee Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite of Bahurim, which cursed me with a grievous curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim: but he came down to meet me at Jordan, and I swear to him by the LORD saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword. 9. Now therefore hold him not guiltless; for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him; but his hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood. 10. So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David. 11. And the days that David reigned over Israel were forty years: seven years reigned he in Hebron, and thirty and three years reigned he in Jerusalem.

David, that great and good man, is here a dying man, (v. 1.) and a dead man, v. 10. It is well there is another life after this, for death stains all the glory of this, and lays it in the dust. We have here,

1. The charge and instructions which David, when he was dying, gave to Solomon, his son, and declared successor. He feels himself declining, and is not backward to own it, nor afraid to hear or speak of dying: I go the way of all the earth, v. 2. Heb. I am walking in it. Note, 1. Death is a way; not only a period of this life, but a passage to a better. 2. It is the way of all the earth, of all mankind who dwell on earth, and are themselves earth, and therefore must return to their earth. Even the sons and heirs of heaven must go the way of all the earth, this way needs die; but they walk with pleasure in this way, through the valley of the shadow of death, Ps. 23. 4. Prophets, and even kings, must go this way to brighter light and honour than prophecy or sovereignty. David is going this way, and therefore gives Solomon directions what to do.

(1.) He charges him, in general, to keep God's commandments, and to make conscience of his duty, v. 2. . 4. He prescribes to him, [1.] A good rule to act by, the divine will; "Govern thyself by that." David's charge to him, is, to keep the charge of the Lord his God. The authority of a dying father is much, but nothing to that of a living God. There are great trusts which we are charged with by the Lord our God, let us keep them carefully, as those that must give account; and excellent statutes, which we must be ruled by, let us also keep them. The written word is our rule; Solomon must himself do as was written in the law of Moses. [2.] A good spirit to act with; Be strong, and show thyself a man, though, in years, but a child. Those that would keep the charge of the Lord their God, must put on resolution. [3.] Good reasons for all this; this would effectually conduce, First, To the prosperity of his kingdom; it is the way to prosper in all thou doest, and to succeed with honour and satisfaction in every undertaking. Secondly, To the perpetuity of it; that the Lord may continue, and so confirm, his word which he spake concerning me. Those that rightly value the treasure of the promise, that sacred depositum, cannot but be solicitous to preserve the entail of it, and very desirous that those who come after them, may do nothing to cut it off. Let each, in his own age, successively, keep God's charge, and then God will be sure to continue his word. We never let fall the promise, till we let fall the precept. God had promised David that the Messiah should come from his loins, and that promise was absolute: but the promise, that there should not fail him a man on the throne of Israel, was conditional; if his seed behave themselves as they should. If Solomon, in his day, fulfil the condition, he does his part toward the perpetuating of the promise. The condition is, that he walk before God in all his institutions, in sincerity, with zeal and resolution; and in order hereunto, that he take heed to his way. In order to our constancy in religion, nothing is more necessary than caution and circumspection.

(2.) He gives him directions concerning some particular persons what to do with them, that he might make up his deficiencies, in justice to some, and kindness to others.

[1.] Concerning Joab, v. 5. David was now conscious to himself, that he had not done well to spare him, when he had made himself once and again obnoxious to the law, by the murder of Abner first, and afterwards of Amasa, both of them great men, captains of the hosts of Israel: he slew them treacherously, shed the blood of war in peace: and injuriously to David; Thou knowest what he did to me therein. The murder of a subject is a wrong to the prince, it is a loss to him, and is against the peace of our sovereign lord the king. These murders were particularly against David, reflecting upon his reputation, he being, at that time, in treaty with them, and hazarded his interest, which they were very capable of serving. Magistrates are the avengers of the blood of those they have the charge of. It aggravated Joab's crime, that he was neither ashamed of the sin, nor afraid of the punishment, but daringly wore the girdle and shoes that were stained with innocent blood, in defiance of the justice both of God and the king. David refers him to Solomon's wisdom, (v. 6.) with an intimation that he left him to his justice. Say not, "He has a hoary head, it is a pity it should be cut off, for it will shortly fall of itself;" no, let it not go down to the grave in peace. Though he has been long reprieved, he shall be reckoned with at last; time does not wear out the guilt of any sin, particularly, not of murder.

[2.] Concerning Barzillai's family, whom he orders him to be kind to for Barzillai's sake, who, we may suppose, by this time, was dead, v. 7. When David, upon his death-bed, was remembering the injuries that had been done, he could not forget the kindnesses that had been shown, but leaves it as a charge upon his son to return them. Note, The kindnesses we have received from our friends, must not be buried, either in their graves or our's, but our children must return them to their's. Hence, perhaps, Solomon fetched that rule, (Prov. 27. 10.) Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not. Paul prays for the house of Onesiphorus, who had often refreshed him.

[3.] Concerning Shimei, v. 8, 9. First, His crime is remembered; He cursed me with a grievous curse; the more grievous, because he insulted him when he was in misery, and poured vinegar into his wounds. The Jews say, that one thing which made this a grievous curse, was, that beside all that is mentioned, (2 Sam. 16.) Shimei upbraided him with his descent from Ruth the Moabitess. Secondly, His pardon is not forgotten. David owns he had sworn to him, that he would not himself put him to death; because he seasonably submitted, and cried Peccavi—I have sinned, and he was not willing, especially at that juncture, to use the sword of public justice for the avenging of wrongs done to himself. But, Thirdly, His case, as it now stands, is left with Solomon, as one that knew what was fit to be done, and would do as he found occasion. David intimates to him, that his pardon was not designed to be perpetual, but only a reprieve for David's life; "Hold him not guiltless: do not think him any true friend to thee or thy government, or fit to be trusted; he has no less malice than he had then, though he has more wit to conceal it. He is still a debtor to the public justice, for what he did then; and though I promised him that I would not put him to death, I never promised that my successor should not. His turbulent spirit will soon give thee an occasion, which thou shouldest not fail to take, for bringing of his hoary head to the grave with blood." This proceeded not from personal revenge, but a prudent zeal for the honour of the government, and the covenant God had made with his family, the contempt of which ought not to go unpunished. Even a hoary head, if a guilty and forfeited head, ought not to be any man's protection from justice, The sinner, being a hundred years old, shall be accursed, Isa. 65. 20.

II. David's death and burial, v. 10. He was buried in the city of David; not in the burying place of his father, as Saul was, but in his own city, which he was the founder of. There were set the thrones, and there the tombs, of the house of David. Now, David, after he had served his own generation, by the will of God, fell asleep, and was laid to his fathers, and saw corruption, Acts 13. 36. and see Acts 2. 39. His epitaph may be taken from 2 Sam. 23. 1. Here lies David the son of Jesse, the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel; adding his own words, (Ps. 16. 9.) My flesh also shall rest in hope. Josephus says, that beside the usual magnificence with which his son Solomon buried him, he put into his sepulchre a vast deal of money; and that 1300 years after, (so he reckons,) it was opened by Hircanus the High Priest, in the time of Antiochus, and 3000 talents taken out for the public service. The years of his reign are here computed (v. 11.) to be forty years; the odd six months which he reigned above seven years in Hebron, are not reckoned, but the even sum only.

12. Then sat Solomon upon the throne of David his father; and his kingdom was established greatly. 13. And Adonijah the son of Haggith came to Bath-sheba the mother of Solomon. And she said, Comest thou peaceably? And he said, Peaceably. 14. He said moreover, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And she said, Say on. 15. And he said, Thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign: howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and is become my brother's; for it was his from the Lord. 16. And now I ask one petition of thee, deny me not. And she said unto him, Say on. 17. And he said, Speak, I pray thee, unto Solomon the king, (for he will not say thee nay,) that he give me Abishag the Shunammite to wife. 18. And Bath-sheba said, Well; I will speak for thee unto the king. 19. Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah. And the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand. 20. Then she said, I desire one small petition of thee; I pray thee, say me not nay. And the king said unto her, Ask on, my mother; for I will not say thee nay. 21. And she said, Let Abishag the Shu-nammite be given to Adonijah thy brother to wife. 22. And king Solomon answered and said unto his mother, And why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah? ask for him the kingdom also; for he is mine elder brother; even for him, and for Abiathar the priest, and for Joab the son of Zeruah. 23. Then king Solomon sware by the LORD, saying, God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah have not spoken this word against his own life. 24. Now therefore, as the LORD liveth, which hath established me, and set me on the throne of David my father, who hath made me a house, as he promised, Adonijah shall be put to death this day. 25. And king Solomon sent by the hand of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; and he fell upon him that he died.

Here is,

I. Solomon's accession to the throne, v. 12. He came to it much more easily and peaceably than David did, and much sooner saw his government established. It is happy for a kingdom, when the end of one good reign is the beginning of another, as it was here.

II. His just and necessary removal of Adonijah his rival, in order to the establishment of his throne. Adonijah had made some bold pretensions to the crown, but was soon obliged to let them fall, and throw himself upon Solomon's mercy, who dismissed him upon his good behaviour, and had he been easy, he might have been safe. But here we have him betraying himself into the hands of Solomon's justice, and falling by it; the righteous God leaving him to himself, that he might be punished for his former treason, and that Solomon's throne might be established. Many thus ruin themselves, because they know not when they are well off, nor well done to; and sinners, by presuming on God's patience, treasure up wrath to themselves. Now observe,

1. Adonijah's treasonable project, which was, to marry Abishag, David's concubine; not because he was in love with her, but because, by her, he hoped to renew his claim to the crown, which might stand him in stead, or because it was then looked upon as a branch of the government, to have the wives of the predecessor, 2 Sam. 12. 8. Absalom thought his pretensions much supported by lying with his father's concubines. Adonijah flatters himself, that if he may succeed him in his bed, especially with the best of his wives, he may by that means step up to succeed him in his throne. Restless and turbulent spirits reach high. It was but a small game to play at, as it should seem, yet he hopes to make it an after-game for the kingdom, and now to gain that by a wife, which he could not gain by force.

2. The means he used to compass this. He durst not make suit to Abishag immediately, (he knew she was at Solomon's disposal, and he would justly resent it, if his consent were not first obtained, as even Ish-bosheth did, in a like case, 2 Sam. 3. 7.) nor durst he apply himself immediately to Solomon, knowing that he lay under his displeasure; but he engaged Bath-sheba to be his friend in this matter, who would be forward to believe it a matter of love, and not apt to suspect it a matter of policy. Bath-sheba was surprised to see Adonijah in her apartment, and asked him if he did not come with a design to do her a mischief, because she had been instrumental to crush his late attempt. "No," says he, "I come peaceably, (v. 13.) and to beg a favour;" (v. 14.) that she would use the great interest she had in her son, to gain his consent that he might marry Abishag; (v. 16, 17.) and if he may but obtain this, he will thankfully accept it, (1.) As a compensation for his loss of the kingdom. He insinuates, (v. 15.) "Thou knowest the kingdom was mine, as my father's eldest son, living at the time of his death, and all Israel set their faces on me." That was false, they were but a few that he had on his side; yet thus he would represent himself as an object of compassion, that had been deprived of a crown, and therefore he might well be gratified in a wife: if he may not inherit his father's throne, yet let him have something valuable that was his father's, to keep for his sake, and let it be Abishag. (2.) As his reward for his acquiescence in that loss. He owns Solomon's right to the kingdom. "It was his from the Lord, I was foolish in offering to contest it; and now that it is turned about to him, I am satisfied." Thus he pretends to be well pleased with Solomon's accession to the throne, when he is doing all he can to give him disturbance. His words were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart.

2. Bath-sheba's address to Solomon on his behalf. She promised to speak to the king for him, (v. 18.) and did so, v. 19. Solomon received her with all the respect that was owing to a mother, though he himself was a king; he rose up to meet her, bowed himself to her, and caused her to sit on his right hand, according to the law of the fifth commandment. Children, not only when grown up, but when grown great, must give honour to their parents, and behave dutifully and respectfully toward them. Despise not thy mother, when she is old. As a further instance of the deference he paid to his mother's wisdom and authority, when he understood she had a petition to present to him, he promised not to say her nay. A promise which both he and she understood with this necessary limitation, provided it be just and reasonable, and fit to be granted; but if it were otherwise, he was sure he should convince her that it was so, and that then she would withdraw it. She tells him her errand, at last, (v. 21.) Let Abishag be given to Adonijah thy brother. It was strange that she did not suspect the treason, but more strange that she did not abhor the incest, that was in the proposal: but either she did not take Abishag to be David's wife, because the marriage was not consummated, or she thought it might be dispensed with, to gratify Adonijah, in consideration of his tame submission to Solomon. This was her weakness and folly; it was well that she was not regent. Note, They that have the ear of princes and great men, as it is their wisdom not to be too prodigal of their interest, so it is their duty never to use it for the assistance of sin, or the furtherance of any wicked design. Let not princes be asked that which they ought not to grant. It ill becomes a good man to prefer a bad request, or appear in a bad cause.

4. Solomon's just and judicious rejection of the request. Though his mother herself was the advocate, and called it a small petition, and, perhaps, it was the first that she had troubled him with since he was king, yet he denied it, without violation of the general promise he had made her, v. 20. If Herod had not had a mind to cut off John Baptist's head, he would not have thought himself obliged to do it by a general promise, like this made to Herodias. The best friend we have in the world must not have such an interest in us as to bring us to do a wrong thing, either unjust or unwise. (1.) Solomon convinces his mother of the unreasonableness of the request, and shows her the tendency of it, which before she was not aware of. His reply is somewhat sharp, Ask for him the kingdom also, v. 22. To ask that he may succeed the king in his bed, is, in effect, to ask that he may succeed him in his throne, for that is it he aims at. Probably, he had information, or cause for a strong suspicion, that Adonijah was plotting with Joab and Abiathar to give him disturbance, which warranted him to put this construction upon Adonijah's request. (2.) He convicts and condemns Adonijah for his pretensions, and both with an oath. He convicts him out of his own mouth, v. 23. His own tongue shall fall upon him; and a heavier load a man need not fall under. Bath-sheba may be imposed upon, but Solomon cannot; he plainly sees what he aims at, and concludes, "He has spoken this word against his own life; he is snared in the words of his own lips; now he shows what he would be at." He condemns him to die immediately; He shall be put to death this day, v. 24. God had interposed himself with an oath, that he would establish David's throne, (Ps. 89. 35.) and therefore Solomon pledges the same assurance to secure that establishment, by cutting off the enemies of it. "As God liveth, that establisheth the government, Adonijah shall die, that would unsettle it." Thus the ruin of the enemies of Christ's kingdom is as sure as the stability of his kingdom, and both as sure as the being and life of God, the Founder of it. The warrant is immediately signed for his execution, and no less a man than Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, general of the army, is ordered to be the executioner, v. 25. It is strange that Adonijah may not be heard to speak for himself: but Solomon's wisdom did not see it needful to examine the matter any further; it was plain enough that Adonijah aimed at the crown, and Solomon cannot be safe while he lives. Ambitious turbulent spirits commonly prepare for themselves the instruments of death. Many a head has been lost by catching at a crown.

26. And unto Abiathar the priest said the king, Get thee to Anathoth, unto thine own fields; for thou art worthy of death: but I will not at this time put thee to death, because thou barest the ark of the Lord God before David my father, and because thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was afflicted. 27. So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the LORD; that he might fulfil the word of the LORD, which he spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh. 28. Then tidings came to Joab: (for Joab had turned after Adonijah, though he turned not after Absalom;) and Joab fled unto the tabernacle of the LORD, and caught hold on the horns of the altar. 29. And it was told king Solomon that Joab was fled unto the tabernacle of the LORD; and, behold, he is by the altar. Then Solomon sent Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, saying, Go fall upon him. 30. And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the LORD, and said unto him, Thus saith the king, Come forth. And he said, Nay; but I will die here. And Benaiah brought the king word again, saying, Thus said Joab, and thus he answered me. 31. And the king said unto him, Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him; that thou mayest take away the innocent blood, which Joab shed, from me, and from the house of my father. 32. And the LORD shall return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he, and slew them with the sword, my father David not knowing thereof, to wit, Abner the son of Ner, captain of the host of Israel, and Amasa the son of Jether, captain of the host of Judah. 33. Their blood shall therefore return upon the head of Joab, and upon the head of his seed for ever: but upon David, and upon his seed, and upon his house, and upon his throne, shall there be peace for ever from the LORD. 34. So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him, and slew him; and he was buried in his own house in the wilderness.

Abiathar and Joab were both aiding and abetting in Adonijah's rebellious attempt, and, it is probable, were at the bottom of this new motion made by Adonijah for Abishag, and, it should seem, Solomon knew it, v. 22. This was, in both, an intolerable affront, both to God and to the government; and the worse, because of their high station, and the great influence their examples might have upon many. They therefore come next to be reckoned with: they are both equally guilty of the treason, but, in the judgment passed upon them, a difference is made, and with good reason.

I. Abiathar, in consideration of his old services, is only degraded, v. 26, 27. 1. Solomon convicts him, and by his great wisdom finds him guilty; "Thou art worthy of death, for joining with Adonijah, when thou knewest on whose head God intended to set the crown." 2. He calls to mind the respect he had formerly showed to David his father, and that he had both ministered to him in holy things, had borne before him the ark of the Lord, and also had tenderly sympathized with him in his afflictions, and been afflicted in them all, particularly when he was in exile and distress, both by Saul's persecution, and Absalom's rebellion. Note, Those that show kindness to God's people, shall have it remembered to their advantage, one time or other. 3. For this reason, he spares Abiathar's life, but deposes him from his offices, and confines him to his country-seat at Anathoth, forbids him the court, the city, the tabernacle, the altar, and all intermeddling in public business, with an intimation likewise, that he was upon his good behaviour, and that though he did not put him to death, at this time, he might, another time, if he did not conduct himself well. But, for the present, he was only thrust out from being priest, as rendered unworthy of that high station, by the opposition he had given to that which he knew to be the will of God. Saul, for a supposed crime, had barbarously slain Abiathar's father, and 85 priests, their families, and city; Solomon spares Abiathar himself, though guilty of a real crime: thus was Saul's government ruined, and Solomon's established. As men are to God's ministers, they will find him to them. 4. The depriving of Abiathar was the fulfilling of the threatening against the house of Eli, (1 Sam. 2. 30.) for he was the last High Priest of that family. It was now above 80 years, since the ruin was threatened; but God's judgments, though not executed speedily, will be executed surely.

II. Joab, in consideration of his old sins, is put to death.

1. His guilty conscience sent him to the horns of the altar. He heard that Adonijah was executed, and Abiathar deposed, and therefore, fearing his turn would be next, he flies for refuge to the altar. Many that, in the day of their security, care not for the service of the altar, in the day of their distress, will be glad of the protection of it. Some think Joab designed thereby to devote himself for the future to a constant attendance upon the altar, hoping thereby to obtain his pardon: as some that have lived a dissolute life, all their days, have thought to atone for it, by retiring into a monastery when they are old, leaving the world when it has left them.

2. Solomon orders him to be put to death there for the murder of Abner and Amasa; for these are the crimes upon which he thought fit to ground the sentence, rather than upon his treasonable adherence to Adonijah. Joab was indeed worthy of death for turning after Adonijah, in contempt of Solomon, and his designation to the throne, though he had not turned after Absalom, v. 28. Former fidelity will not serve to excuse for any after treachery, beside that, Joab had merited well of the house of David, to which, and to his country, he had done a great deal of good service in his day, in consideration of which, it is probable, Solomon would have pardoned him his offence against him, (for clemency gives great reputation and establishment to an infant government,) and would have only displaced him, as he did Abiathar; but he must die for the murders he had formerly been guilty of, which his father had charged him to call him to an account for. The debt he owed to the innocent blood that was shed, by answering its cries with the blood of him that shed it, he could not pay himself, but left it to his son to pay it, who having power wherewithal, failed not to do it. On this he grounds the sentence, aggravating the crime, (v. 32.) that he fell upon two men more righteous, and better, than he, that had done him no wrong, nor meant him any, and, had they lived, might probably have done David better service; if the blood shed, be not only innocent, but excellent, the life more valuable than common lives, the crime is the more heinous: that David knew not of it, and yet the case was such, that he would be suspected as privy to it; so that Joab endangered his prince's reputation, in taking away the life of his rivals, which was a further aggravation.

For these crimes, (1.) He must die, and die by the sword of public justice. By man must his blood be shed, and it lies upon his own head, (v. 32.) as their's does, whom he had murdered, v. 33. Woe to the head that lies under the guilt of blood! Vengeance for murder was long in coming upon Joab; but when it did come, it remained the longer, being here entailed upon the head of his seed for ever, (v. 33.) who, instead of deriving honour, as otherwise they might have done, from his heroic actions, derived guilt, and shame, and a curse, from his villanous actions. The seed of such evil doers shall never be renowned. (2.) He must die at the altar, rather than escape. Joab resolved not to stir from the altar, (v. 30.) hoping thereby either to secure himself, or else to render Solomon odious to the people, as a profaner of the holy place, if he should put him to death there. Benaiah made a scruple of either killing him there, or dragging him thence; but Solomon knew the law, that the altar of God should give no protection to wilful murderers; (Exod. 21. 14.) Thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die, may die a sacrifice. In case of such sins, as the blood of beasts would atone for, the altar was a refuge, but not in Joab's case; he therefore orders him to be executed there, if he would not be got thence, to show that he feared not the censure of the people in doing his duty, but would rectify their mistake, and let them know that the administration of justice is better than sacrifice, and that the holiness of any place should never countenance the wickedness of any person. They who, by a lively faith, take hold on Christ and his righteousness, with a resolution, if they perish, to perish there, shall find in him a more powerful protection than Joab found at the horns of the altar. Benaiah slew him, (v. 34.) with the solemnity, no doubt, of a public execution. The law being thus satisfied, he was buried in his own house in the wilderness, privately, like a criminal, not pompously, like a soldier; yet no indignity is done to his dead body; it is not for man to lay iniquity upon the bones, whatever God does.

Lastly, Solomon pleases himself with this act of justice, not as it gratified any personal revenge, but as it was the fulfilling of his father's orders, and a real kindness to himself and his own government. 1. Guilt was hereby removed, v. 31. By returning the innocent blood that had been shed, upon the head of him that shed it, it was taken away from him, and from the house of his father; which implies, that the blood which is not required from the murderer, will be required from the magistrate, at least, there is danger lest it should. They that would have their houses safe and built up, must put away iniquity far from them. 2. Peace was hereby secured (v. 33.) upon David; he does not mean his person, but, as he explains himself in the next words, Upon his seed, his house, and his throne, shall there be peace for ever from the Lord; thus he expresses his desire that it may be so, and his hope that it shall be so. Now that justice is done, and the cry of blood is satisfied, the government will prosper. Thus righteousness and peace kiss each other. Now that such a turbulent man as Joab, is removed, there shall be peace. Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness, Prov. 25. 5. Solomon, in this blessing of peace upon his house and throne, piously looks upward to God as the Author of it, and forward to eternity as the perfection of it; "It shall be peace from the Lord, and peace for ever, from the Lord." The Lord of peace himself give us that peace which is everlasting.

35. And the king put Benaiah the son of Jehoiada in his room over the host; and Zadok the priest did the king put in the room of Abiathar. 36. And the king sent and called for Shimei, and said unto him, Build thee a house in Jerusalem, and dwell there, and go not forth thence any whither. 37. For it shall be, that on the day thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die: thy blood shall be upon thine own head. 38. And Shimei said unto the king, The saying is good: as my lord the king hath said, so will thy servant do. And Shimei dwelt in Jerusalem many days. 39. And it came to pass, at the end of three years, that two of the servants of Shimei ran away unto Achish son of Maachah, king of Gath: and they told Shimei, saying, Behold, thy servants be in Gath. 40. And Shimei arose, and saddled his ass, and went to Gath, to Achish, to seek his servants: and Shimei went, and brought his servants from Gath. 41. And it was told Solomon that Shimei had gone from Jerusalem to Gath, and was come again. 42. And the king sent and called for Shimei, and said unto him, Did I not make thee to swear by the LORD, and protested unto thee, saying, Know for a certain, that on the day thou goest out, and walkest abroad any whither, that thou shalt surely die? and thou saidst unto me, The word that I have heard is good. 43. Why then hast thou not kept the oath of the LORD, and the commandment that I have charged thee with? 44. The king said, moreover, to Shimei, Thou knowest all the wickedness which thine heart is privy to, that thou didst to David my father: therefore the LORD shall return thy wickedness upon thine own head: 45. And king Solomon shall be blessed, and the throne of David shall be established before the LORD for ever. 46. So the king commanded Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; which went out, and fell upon him, that he died. And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon.

Here is,

I. The preferment of Benaiah and Zadok, two faithful friends to Solomon and his government, v. 35. Joab being put to death, Benaiah was advanced to be general of the forces in his room, and Abiathar being deposed, Zadok was made High Priest in his room; and therein was fulfilled that word of God, when he threatened to cut off the house of Eli, (1 Sam. 2. 35.) I will raise me up a faithful priest, and will build him a sure house. Though sacred offices may be disgraced, they shall not be destroyed, by the mal-administration of those that are intrusted with them, nor shall God's work ever stand still for want of hands to carry it on. No wonder that a king, so immediately of God's making, was empowered to make whom he thought fit, High Priest; and he did it in equity, for the ancient right was in Zadok, he being of the family of Eleazar, whereas Eli and his house were of Ithamar.

II. The course that was taken with Shimei. He is sent for, by a messenger, from his house at Bahurim, expecting, perhaps, no better than Adonijah's doom, being conscious of his enmity to the house of David; but Solomon knows how to make a difference of crimes and criminals. David had promised Shimei his life for his time, Solomon is not bound by that promise, and yet will not go directly contrary to it.

1. He confined him to Jerusalem, and forbade him, upon any pretence whatsoever, to go out of the city, any further than the brook Kidron, v. 36, 37. He would not suffer him to continue at his country-seat, lest he should make mischief among his neighbours, but took him to Jerusalem, where he kept him prisoner at large: this might make Shimei's confinement easy to himself, for Jerusalem was beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, the royal city, the holy city; he had no reason to complain of being shut up in such a paradise; it would also make it the more safe for Solomon, for there he would have him under his eye, and be able to watch his motions; and he plainly tells him that if he ever go out of the rules, he shall certainly die for it; this was a fair trial of his obedience, and such a test of his loyalty, as he had no reason to complain of; he has his life upon easy terms, he shall live, if he will but be content to live at Jerusalem.

2. Shimei submits to the confinement, and thankfully takes his life upon those terms; he enters into recognizance, (v. 38.) under the penalty of death, not to stir out of Jerusalem, and owns the saying is good. Even they that perish, cannot but own the conditions of pardon and life unexceptionable, so that their blood, like Shimei's, must rest upon their own heads. Shimei promised with an oath, to keep within his bounds, v. 42.

3. Shimei forfeits his recognizance, which was the thing Solomon expected, and God was righteous in suffering him to do it, that he might now suffer for his old sins. Two of his servants, (it seems, though he was a prisoner, he lived like himself, well attended,) ran from him to the land of the Philistines, v. 39. Thither he pursued them, and thence brought them back to Jerusalem, v. 40. For the keeping of it private, he saddled his ass himself, probably went in the night, and came home, he thought, undiscovered. "Seeking his servants," (says Bishop Hall,) "he lost himself; these earthly things either are, or should be, our servants; how commonly do we see men run out of the bounds set by God's law, to hunt after them, till their souls incur a fearful judgment!"

4. Solomon judges the forfeiture. Information is given him, that Shimei had transgressed, v. 41. The king sends for him, and, (1.) Charges him with the present crime, (v. 42, 43.) that he had put a great contempt upon the authority and wrath both of God and the king: that he had broken the oath of the Lord, and disobeyed the commandment of his prince; and by this, it appeared what manner of spirit he was of, that he would not be held by the bonds of gratitude or conscience: had he represented to Solomon the urgency of the occasion, and begged leave to go, perhaps Solomon might have given him leave; but to presume either upon his ignorance or his connivance, was to affront him in the highest degree. (2.) He condemns him for his former crime, cursing David, and throwing stones at him in the day of his affliction: the wickedness which thy heart is privy to, v. 44. There was no need to examine witnesses for the proof of the fact, his own conscience was instead of a thousand witnesses; that wickedness which men's own hearts alone are privy to, is enough, if duly considered, to fill them with confusion, in expectation of its return upon their own heads; for if the heart be privy to it, God is greater than the heart. Others knew of Shimei's cursing David, but Shimei himself knew of the wicked principles of hatred and malice against David, which he displayed in cursing him, and that his submission was but feigned and forced. (3.) He blessed himself and his government; (v. 45.) King Solomon shall be blessed, notwithstanding Shimei's impotent curses, which perhaps, in fury and despair, he now vented freely. Let them curse, but bless Thou. And the throne of David shall be established, by taking away those that would undermine it. It is a comfort, in reference to the enmity of the church's enemies, that, how much soever they rage, it is a vain thing they imagine, Christ's throne is established, and they cannot shake it. (4.) He gives orders for the execution of Shimei immediately, v. 46. All judgment is committed to the Lord Jesus, and though he be King of peace, he will be found to be a King of righteousness; and this will shortly be his word of command concerning all his enemies, that will not have him to reign over them, Bring them forth, and slay them before me; the reproaches of them that blasphemed him, will fall on themselves, to their eternal condemnation.

CHAP. III.

Solomon's reign looked bloody in the foregoing chapter, but the necessary acts of justice must not be called cruelty; in this chapter, it appears with another face; we must not think the worse of God's mercy to his subjects, for his judgments on rebels. We have here, I. Solomon's marriage to Pharaoh's daughter, v. 1. II. A general view of his religion, v. 2.. 4. III. A particular account of his prayer to God for wisdom, and the answer to that prayer, v. 5.. 15. IV. A particular instance of his wisdom in deciding the controversy between the two harlots, v. 16.. 28. And very great he looks here, both at the altar, and on the bench, and therefore on the bench, because at the altar.

I. AND Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter, and brought her into the city of David, until he had made an end of building his own house, and the house of the LORD, and the wall of Jerusalem round about. 2. Only the people sacrificed in high places, because there was no house built unto the name of the LORD until those days. 3. And Solomon loved the LORD, walking in the statutes of David his father: only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places. 4. And the king went to Gibeon to sacrifice there; for that was the great high place: a thousand burnt-offerings did Solomon offer upon that altar.

We are here told concerning Solomon,

I. Something that was unquestionably good, for which he is to be praised, and in which he is to be imitated. 1. He loved the Lord, v. 3. Particular notice was taken of God's love to him, 2 Sam. 12. 24. he had his name from it, Jedidiah, beloved of the Lord; and here we find he returned that love, as John, the beloved disciple, was most full of love. Solomon was a wise man, a rich man, a great man; yet the brightest encomium of him, is that which is the character of all the saints, even the poorest, He loved the Lord; he loved the worship of the Lord, so the Chaldee; all that love God, love his worship, love to hear from him, and speak to him, and so to have communion with him. 2. He walketh in the statutes of David his father, that is, in the statutes that David gave him, ch. 2. 2, 3. 1 Chron. 28. 9, 10. (his dying father's charge was sacred, and as a law to him;) or in God's statutes, which David his father walked in before him; he kept close to God's ordinances, carefully observed them, and diligently attended them: they that truly love God, will make conscience of walking in his statutes. 3. He was very free and generous in what he did for the honour of God; when he offered sacrifice, he offered like a king, in some proportion to his great wealth, a thousand burnt-offerings, v. 4. Where God sows plentifully, he expects to reap accordingly; and those that truly love God and his worship, will not grudge the expenses of their religion. We may be tempted to say, To what purpose is this waste? Might not these cattle have been given to the poor? But we must never think that wasted, which is laid out in the service of God. It seems strange, how so many beasts should be burnt upon one altar in one feast, though it continued seven days; but the fire on the altar is supposed to be more quick and devouring than common fire, for it represented that fierce and mighty wrath of God, which fell upon the sacrifices, that the offerers might escape; Our God is a consuming fire. Bishop Patrick quotes it as a tradition of the Jews, that the smoke of the sacrifices ascended directly in a straight pillar, and was not scattered, otherwise it would have choked those that attended, when so many sacrifices were offered as were here.

II. Here is something, concerning which it may be doubted, whether it were good or no.

1. His marrying of Pharaoh's daughter, v. 1. We will suppose she was proselyted, else it had not been lawful; yet, if so, surely it was not advisable; he that loved the Lord, should, for his sake, have fixed his love upon one of the Lord's people; unequal matches of the sons of God with the daughters of men, have often been of pernicious consequence; yet some think that he did this with the advice of his friends, that she was a sincere convert, (for the gods of the Egyptians were not reckoned among the strange gods, which his strange wives drew him into the worship of, ch. 11. 5, 6,) and that the book of Canticles, and the 45th Psalm, were penned on this occasion, by which these nuptials were made typical of the mystical espousals of the church to Christ, especially the Gentile church.

2. His worshipping in the high places, and thereby tempting the people to do so too, v. 2, 3. Abraham built his altars on mountains, (Gen. 12. 8.—22. 2.) and worshipped in a grove; (Gen. 21. 33.) thence the custom was derived, and was proper, till the divine law confined them to one place, Dent. 12. 5, 6. David kept to the ark, and did not care for the high places; but Solomon, though, in other things, he walked in the statutes of his father, in this, came short of him; he showed thereby a great zeal for sacrificing, but to obey had been better: this was an irregularity, though there was as yet no house built; there was a tent pitched, to the name of the Lord, and the ark ought to have been the centre of their unity; it was so by divine institution, from it the high places separated; yet while they worshipped God only, and, in other things, according to the rule, he graciously overlooked their weakness, and accepted their services: it is owned that Solomon loved the Lord, though he burnt incense in high places; and let not man be more severe than God is.

5. In Gibeon the LORD appeared to Solomon in a dream by night: and God said, Ask what I shall give thee. 6. And Solomon said, Thou hast showed unto thy servant David my father great mercy, according as he walked before thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with thee; and thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that thou hast given him a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day. 7. And now, O LORD my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father; and I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in. 8. And thy servant is in the midst of thy people which thou hast chosen, a great people, that cannot be numbered nor counted for multitude. 9. Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad: for who is able to judge this thy so great a people? 10. And the speech pleased the LORD, that Solomon had asked this thing. 11. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life; neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies; but hast asked for thyself understanding to discern judgment; 12. Behold, I have done according to thy word: lo, I have given thee a wise and understanding heart; so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall any arise like unto thee. 13. And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour; so that there shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days. 14. And if thou wilt walk in my ways, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as thy father David did walk, then I will lengthen thy days. 15. And Solomon awoke; and, behold, it was a dream. And he came to Jerusalem, and stood before the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and offered up burnt-offerings, and offered peace-offerings, and made a feast to all his servants.

We have here an account of a gracious visit which God made to Solomon, and the communion he had with God in it, which puts a greater honour upon Solomon than all the wealth and power of his kingdom did.

1. The circumstances of this visit, v. 5. 1. The place—it was in Gibeon, that was the great high place, and should have been the only one, because there the tabernacle and the brazen altar were, 2 Chron. 1. 3. There Solomon offered his great sacrifices, and there God owned him more than in any other of the high places; the nearer we come to the rule in our worship, the more reason we have to expect the tokens of God's presence; where God records his name, there he will meet us, and bless us. 2. The time—it was by night, the night after he had offered that generous sacrifice, v. 4. The more we abound in God's work, the more comfort we may expect in him; if the day has been busy for him, the night will be easy in him. Silence and retirement befriend our communion with God: his kindest visits are often in the night, Ps. 17. 3. 3. The manner—it was in a dream when he was asleep, his senses locked up, that God's access to his mind might be the more free and immediate; in this way, God used to speak to the prophets, (Numb. 12. 6.) and to private persons, for their own benefit, Job 33. 15, 16. These divine dreams, no doubt, distinguished themselves from those in which there are divers vanities, Eccl. 5. 7.

II. The gracious offer God made him of the favour he should choose, whatever it were, v. 5. He saw the glory of God shine about him, and heard a voice, saying, Ask what I shall give thee. Not that God was indebted to him for his sacrifices, but thus he would testify his acceptance of them, and signify to him what great mercy he had in store for him, if he were not wanting to himself. Thus he would try his inclinations, and put an honour upon the prayer of faith. God, in like manner, condescends to us, and puts us in the ready way to be happy, by assuring us that we shall have what we will, for the asking, John 16. 23. 1 John 5. 15. What would we more? Ask, and it shall be given you.

III. The pious request Solomon, hereupon, made to God. He readily laid hold on this offer; why do we neglect the like offer made to us, like Ahaz, who said, I will not ask? Isa. 7. 12. Solomon prayed in his sleep, God's grace assisting him; yet it was a lively prayer. What we are most in care about, and which makes the greatest impression upon us when we are awake, commonly affects us when we are asleep; and by our dreams, sometimes, we may know what our hearts are upon, and how our pulse beats. Plutarch makes virtuous dreams one evidence of increase in virtue. Yet this must be attributed to a higher source. Solomon's making of such an intelligent choice as this, when he was asleep, and the powers of reason were least active, showed that it came purely from the grace of God, which wrought in him these gracious desires. If his reins thus instruct him in the night season, he must bless the Lord who gave him counsel, Ps. 16. 7. Now, in this prayer,

1. He acknowledges God's great goodness to his father David, v. 6. He speaks honourably of his father's piety, that he had walked before God in uprightness of heart, drawing a veil over his faults. It is to be hoped that those who praise their godly parents, will imitate them. But he speaks more honourably of God's goodness to his father, the mercy he had showed to him while he lived, in giving him to be sincerely religious, and then recompensing his sincerity; and the great kindness he had kept for him, to be bestowed on his family when he was gone, in giving him a son to sit on his throne. Children should give God thanks for his mercies to their parents; for the sure mercies of David. God's favours are then doubly sweet, when we observe them transmitted to us through the hands of those that have gone before us. The way to get the entail perpetuated, is, to bless God that it has hitherto been preserved.

2. He owns his own insufficiency for the discharge of that great trust to which he was called, v. 7, 8. And here is a double plea to enforce his petition for wisdom. (1.) That his place required it, as he was successor to David: "Thou hast made me king instead of David, who was a very wise, good man; Lord, give me wisdom, that I may keep up what he wrought, and carry on what he began;" and as he was ruler over Israel, "Lord, give me wisdom to rule well, for they are a numerous people, that will not be managed without much care. They are thy people, which thou hast chosen, and therefore to be ruled for thee; and the more wisely they are ruled, the more glory thou wilt have from them." (2.) That he wanted it; as one that had an humble sense of his own deficiency, he pleads, Lord, I am but a little child; so he calls himself, a child in understanding, though his father called him a wise man, ch. 2. 9. "I know not how to go out, or come in, as I should, nor to do so much as the common daily business of the government, much less what to do in a critical juncture." Note, Those who are employed in public stations, ought to be very sensible of the weight and importance of their work, and their own insufficiency for it; and then they are qualified for receiving divine instruction. St. Paul's question (Who is sufficient for these things?) is much like Solomon's here, Who is able to judge this thy so great a people? v. 9. Absalom, who was a fool, wished himself a judge; Solomon, who was a wise man, trembles at the undertaking, and suspects his own fitness for it. The more knowing and considerate men are, the better acquainted they are with their own weakness, and the more jealous of themselves.

3. He begs of God to give him wisdom; (v. 2.) Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart. He calls himself God's servant; pleased with that relation to God, (Ps. 116. 16.) and pleading it with him; "I am devoted to thee, and employed for thee; give me that which is requisite to the services in which I am employed." Thus his good father prayed, and thus he pleaded; (Ps. 119. 125.) I am thy servant, give me understanding. An understanding heart is God's gift, Prov. 2. 6. We must pray 'or it, (James 1. 5.) and pray for it with application to our particular calling, and the various occasions we have for it; as Solomon, Give me an understanding, not to please my own curiosity with, or puzzle my neighbours, but to judge thy people. That is the best knowledge, which will be serviceable to us in doing our duty; and such that knowledge is, which enables us to discern between good and bad, right and wrong, sin and duty, truth and falsehood, so as not to be imposed upon by false colours, in judging either of others' actions, or of our own.

4. The favourable answer God gave to his request. It was a pleasing prayer; (v. 10.) The speech pleased the Lord. God is well pleased with his own work in his people; the desires of his own kindling, the prayers of his Spirit's indicting. By this choice Solomon made it appear that he desired to be good more than great, and to serve God's honour more than to advance his own. Those are accepted of God, who prefer spiritual blessings to temporal, and are more solicitous to be found in the way of their duty, than in the way to preferment. But that was not all; it was a prevailing prayer, and prevailed for more than he asked. (1.) God gave him wisdom, v. 12. He fitted him for all that great work to which he had called him; gave him such a right understanding of the law which he was to judge by, and the cases he was to judge of, that he was unequalled, for a clear head, a solid judgment, and a piercing eye. Such an insight, and such a foresight, never was prince so blessed with. (2.) He gave him riches and honour over and above into the bargain, (v. 13.) and it was promised that he should as much exceed his predecessors, his successors, and all his neighbours, in these, as in wisdom. These also are God's gift, and are promised to all that seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, as far as is good for them, Matth. 6. 33. Let young people learn to prefer grace to gold, because godliness has the promise of the life that now is, but the life that now is, has not the promise of godliness. How completely blessed was Solomon, that had both wisdom and wealth! He that has wealth and power without wisdom and grace, is in danger of doing hurt with it; he that has wisdom and grace without wealth and power, is not capable of doing so much good with it, as he that has both. Wisdom is good, is so much the better with an inheritance, Eccl. 7. 11. But if we make sure of wisdom and grace, those will either bring outward prosperity with them, or sweeten the want of it. God promised Solomon riches and honour, absolutely, but long life, upon condition; (v. 14.) If thou wilt walk in my ways, as David did, then will I lengthen thy days: he failed in the condition; and therefore, though he had riches and honour, he did not live so long to enjoy them, as, in the course of nature, he might have done. Length of days is Wisdom's right-hand blessing, typical of eternal life; but it is in her left hand that riches and honour are, Prov. 3. 16. Let us see here, [1.] That the way to obtain spiritual blessings, is, to be importunate for them; to wrestle with God in prayer for them, as Solomon did for wisdom, asking that only, as the one thing needful. [2.] That the way to obtain temporal blessings, is, to be indifferent to them, and to refer ourselves to God concerning them. Solomon has wisdom given him, because he did ask it, and wealth, because he did not.

5. The grateful return Solomon made for the visit God was pleased to make him, v. 15. He awoke, we may suppose, in a transport of joy; awoke, and his sleep was sweet to him, as the prophet speaks; (Jer. 31. 26.) being satisfied of God's favour, he was satisfied with it, and he began to think, what he should render unto the Lord. He had made his prayer at the high place at Gibeon, and there God had graciously met him; but he comes to Jerusalem, to give thanks before the ark of the covenant, blaming himself, as it were, that he had not prayed there, the ark being the token of God's presence, and wondering that God had met him any where else. God's passing by our mistakes, should persuade us to amend them. There he, (1.) Offered a great sacrifice to God. We must give God praise for his gifts in the promise, though not yet fully performed. David used to praise God's word, as well as his works, (Ps. 56. 10. and particularly, 2 Sam. 7. 18.) and Solomon trod in his steps. (2.) He made a great feast upon the sacrifice, that those about him, might rejoice with him in the grace of God.

16. Then came there two women, that were harlots, unto the king, and stood before him. 17. And the one woman said, O my lord, I and this woman dwell in one house; and I was delivered of a child with her in the house. 18. And it came to pass, the third day after that I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also: and we were together; there was no stranger with us in the house, save we two in the house. 19. And this woman's child died in the night; because she overlaid it. 20. And she arose at midnight, and took my son from beside me, while thine handmaid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child in my bosom. 21. And when I arose in the morning to give my child suck, behold, it was dead; but when I had considered it in the morning, behold, it was not my son which I did bear. 22. And the other woman said, Nay; but the living is my son, and the dead is thy son. And this said, No; but the dead is thy son, and the living is my son. Thus they spake before the king. 23. Then said the king, The one saith, This is my son that liveth, and thy son is the dead: and the other saith, Nay; but thy son is the dead, and my son is the living. 24. And the king said, Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king. 25. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other. 26. Then spake the woman whose the living child was unto the king, (for her bowels yearned upon her son,) and she said, O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it. But the other said, Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it. 27. Then the king answered and said, Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it: she is the mother thereof. 28. And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king: for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment.

An instance is here given of Solomon's wisdom, to show that the grant lately made him, had a real effect upon him: the proof is fetched, not from the mysteries of state, and the policies of the council-board, though there, no doubt, he excelled, but from the trial and determination of a cause between party and party, which princes, though they devolve them upon their judges, must not think it below them to take cognizance of. Observe,

I. The case opened, not by lawyers, but by the parties themselves, though they were women, which made it the easier to such a piercing eye as Solomon had, to discern between right and wrong by their own showing. These two women were harlots, kept a public-house, and their children, some think, were born of fornication, because here is no mention of their husbands. It is probable, the cause had been heard in the inferior courts, before it was brought before Solomon, and had been found special, the judges being unable to determine it, that Solomon's wisdom in deciding it, at last, might be the more taken notice of. These two women lived in a house together, were each of them delivered of a son, within three days of one another, v. 17, 18. They were so poor, that they had no servant or nurse to be with them; so slighted, because harlots, that they had no friend or relation to accompany them. One of them overlaid her child, and, in the night, exchanged it with the other, (v. 19, 20.) who was soon aware of the cheat put upon her, and appealed to public justice to be righted, v. 21. See, 1. What anxiety is caused by little children, how uncertain their lives are, and to how many dangers they are continually exposed. The age of infancy is the valley of the shadow of death; and the lamp of life, when first lighted, is easily blown out. It is a wonder of mercy, that so few perish in the perils of nursing. 2. How much better it was, in those times, with children born in fornication, than, commonly, it is now. Harlots then loved their children, nursed them, and were loath to part with them: whereas now, they are often sent to a distance, abandoned, or killed. But thus it is foretold, that in the last days perilous times should come, when people should be without natural affection, 2 Tim. 3. 3.

II. The difficulty of the case. The question was, Who was the mother of this living child, which was brought into court, to be finally adjudged either to the one, or to the other? Both mothers were vehement in their claims, and showed deep concern about it. Both were peremptory in their asseverations; "It is mine," says one; "Nay, it is mine," says the other. Neither will own the dead child, though it would be cheaper to bury that, than to maintain the other; but it is the living one they strive for. The living child is therefore the parents' joy, because it is their hope; and may not the dead children be so? See Jer. 31. 17. Now the difficulty of the case was, that there was no evidence on either side. The neighbours, though it is probable that some of them were present at the birth and circumcision of the children, yet had not taken so much notice of them, as to be able to distinguish them.* To put the parties to the rack, would have been barbarous; not she who had justice on her side, but she who was most hardy, would have had the judgment in her favour. Little stress is to be laid on extorted evidence. Judges and juries have need of wisdom, to find out truth, when it thus lies hid.

III. The determination of it. Solomon, having patiently heard what both sides had to say, sums up the evidence, v. 23. And now the whole court is in expectation, what course Solomon's wisdom will take to find out the truth. One knows not what to say to it; another, perhaps, would determine it by lot; Solomon calls for a sword, and gives orders to divide the living child between the two contenders. Now, 1. This seemed a ridiculous decision of the case, and a brutal cutting of the knot which he could not untie. "Is this," think the sages of the law, "the wisdom of Solomon?" They could not conjecture what he aimed at in it. The hearts of kings, such kings, are unsearchable, Prov. 25. 3. There was a law concerning the dividing of a living ox and a dead one, (Exod. 21. 35.) but that did not reach this case. But, 2. It proved an effectual discovery of the truth. Some think that Solomon did himself discern it, before he made this experiment, by the countenance of the women, and their way of speaking; but by this, he gave satisfaction to all the company, and silenced the pretender. To find out the true mother, he could not try which the child loved best, and must therefore try which loved the child best; both pretended to a motherly affection, but the sincerity of it will be tried, when the child is in danger. (1.) She that knew the child was not her own, but, in contending for it, stood upon a point of honour, was well content to have it divided. She that had overlaid her own child, cared not what became of this, so that the true mother might not have it. Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it. By this it appeared that she knew her own title to be bad, and feared Solomon would find it so, though she little suspected she was betraying herself, but thought Solomon in good earnest. If she had been the true mother, she had forfeited her interest in the child, by agreeing so readily to this bloody decision. But, 2. She that knew the child was her own, rather than the child should be butchered, gives it up to her adversary. How feelingly does she cry out, O, my Lord! give her the living child, v. 26. "Let me see it her's, rather than not see it at all." By this tenderness toward the child, it appeared that she was not the careless mother that had overlaid the dead child, but was the true mother of the living one, that could not endure to see its death, having compassion on the son of her womb. "The case is plain," says Solomon, "what need of witnesses? Give her the living child; for you all see, by this undissembled compassion, she is the mother of it." Let parents show their love to their children, by taking care of them, especially, by taking care of their souls, and, with a holy violence, snatching them as brands out of the burning. They are most likely to have the comfort of children, that do their duty to them. Satan pretends to the heart of man, but by this it appears that he is only a pretender, that he would be content to divide with God, whereas the rightful Sovereign of the heart will have all or none.

Lastly, We are told what a great reputation Solomon got among his people, by this and other instances of his wisdom, which would have a great influence upon the ease of his government; they feared the king, (v. 28.) highly revered him, durst not, in any thing, oppose him, and were afraid of doing an unjust thing; for they knew, if ever it came before him, he would certainly discover it, for they saw the wisdom of God was in him, that is, that wisdom which God had promised to endue him with. This made his face to shine, (Eccl. 8. 1.) this strengthened him, (Eccl. 7. 19.) this was better to him than weapons of war, (Eccl. 9. 18.) for this, he was both feared and loved.

CHAP. IV.

An instance of the wisdom of God granted to Solomon, we had in the close of the foregoing chapter. In this, we have an account of his wealth and prosperity, which was the other branch of the promise there made him. We have here, 1. The magnificence of his court; his ministers of state, (v. 1. 6.) and the purveyors of his household, (v. 7. 19.) and their office, v. 27, 28. II. The provision for his table, v. 22, 23. III. The extent of his dominion, v. 21, 24. IV. The numbers, ease, and peace, of his subjects, v. 20, 25. V. His stables, v. 26. VI. His great reputation for wisdom and learning, v. 29. 34. Thus great was Solomon, but our Lord Jesus was greater than he, (Matth. 12. 42.) though he took upon him the form of a servant. For, Divinity in its lowest humiliations, infinitely transcends royalty in its highest elevations.

1. SO king Solomon was king over all Israel. 2. And these were the princes which he had; Azariah the son of Zadok the priest; 3. Elihoreph and Ahiah, the sons of Shisha, scribes; Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud, the recorder. 4. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the host; and Zadok and Abiathar were the priests; 5. And Azariah the son of Nathan was over the officers; and Zabud the son of Nathan was principal officer, and the king's friend; 6. And Ahishar was over the household; and Adoniram the son of Abda was over the tribute. 7. And Solomon had twelve officers over all Israel, which provided victuals for the king and his household: each man his month in a year made provision. 8. And these are their names: The son of Hur, in mount Ephraim. 9. The son of Dekar, in Makaz, and in Shaal-bim, and Beth-shemesh, and Elon-beth-hanan. 10. The son of Hesei, in Aruboth; to him pertained Sochoh, and all the land of Hepher. 11. The son of Abinadab, in all the region of Dor; which had Taphath the daughter of Solomon to wife. 12. Baana, the son of Ahilud; to him pertained Taanach and Megiddo, and all Beth-shean, which is by Zartanah beneath Jezreel, from Beth-shean to Abel-meholah, even unto the place that is beyond Jokneam. 13. The son of Geber, in Ramoth-gilead; to him pertained the towns of Jair the son of Manasseh, which are in Gilead: to him also pertained the region of Argob, which is in Bashan, threescore great cities, with walls and brazen bars. 14. Abinadab the son of Iddo had Mahanaim. 15. Ahimaaz was in Naphtali; he also took Basmath the daughter of Solomon to wife. 16. Baanah the son of Hushai was in Asher and in Aloth. 17. Jehoshaphat the son of Paruah in Issachar. 18. Shimei the son of Elah in Benjamin. 19. Geber the son of Uri was in the country of Gilead, in the country of Sihon king of the Amorites, and of Og king of Bashan; and he was the only officer which was in the land.

Here is,

I. Solomon upon his throne: (v. 1.) So king Solomon was king; that is, he was confirmed and established king over all Israel, and not, as his successors, only over two tribes. He was a king, he did the work and duty of a king, with the wisdom God had given him. Those preserve the name and honour of their place, that mind the business of it, and make conscience of it.

II. The great officers of his court; in the choice of which, no doubt, his wisdom much appeared. It is observable, 1. That several of them are the same that were in his father's time. Zadok and Abiathar were then priests, (2 Sam. 20. 25.) so they were now; only then, Abiathar had the precedence, now, Zadok; Jehoshaphat was then recorder, or keeper of the great seal, so he was now. Benaiah, in his father's time, was a principal man in military affairs, and so he was now. Shisha was his father's scribe, and his sons were his, v. 3. Solomon, though a wise man, would not affect to seem wiser than his father in this matter. When sons come to inherit their father's wealth, honour, and power, it is a piece of respect to their memory, ceteris paribus—where it can properly be done, to employ those whom they employed, and trust those whom they trusted. Many pride themselves in being the reverse of their good parents. 2. The rest were priests' sons. His prime minister of state, was, Azariah the son of Zadok the priest. Two others of the first rank were the sons of Nathan the prophet, v. 5. In preferring them, he testified the grateful respect he had for their good father, whom he loved in the name of a prophet.

III. The purveyors for his household, whose business it was to send in provisions from several parts of the country, for the king's tables and cellars, (v. 7.) and for his stables, v. 27, 28. That thus, 1. His house might always be well furnished, at the best hand. Let great men learn hence good house-keeping, and yet good husbandry in their house-keeping; to be generous in spending according to their ability, but prudent in providing. It is the character of the virtuous woman, that she bringeth her food from afar, (Prov. 31. 14.) not far-fetched and dear-bought, but the contrary, every thing bought where it is cheapest. 2. That thus he himself, and those who immediately attended him, might be eased of a great deal of care, and the more closely apply themselves to the business of the state, not troubled about much serving; provisions for that being got ready to their hand. 3. That thus all the parts of the kingdom might be equally benefited, by the taking off of the commodities that were the productions of their country, and the circulating of the coin. Industry would hereby be encouraged, and consequently wealth increased, even in those tribes that lay most remote from the court. The providence of God extends itself to all places of his dominions; (Ps. 103. 22.) so should the prudence and care of princes. 4. The dividing of this trust into so many hands, was prudent, that no one man might be continually burthened with the care of it, nor grow exorbitantly rich with the profit of it; but that Solomon might have those, in every district, who, having a dependence upon the court, would be serviceable to him and his interest, as there was occasion.

These commissioners of the victualling-office, not for the army or navy, (Solomon was engaged in no war,) but for the household, are here named; several of them only by their surnames, as great men commonly call their servants; Ben-hur, Ben-dekar, &c.: though several of them have also their proper names prefixed. Two of them married Solomon's daughters, Ben-Abinadab, (v. 11.) and Ahimaaz; (v. 15.) and no disparagement to them, to marry men of business. Better match with the officers of their father's court that were Israelites, than with the sons of princes that were strangers to the cove- rant of promise. The son of Geber was in Ramoth-gilead, (v. 13.) and Geber himself was in the country of Sihon and Og, which included that and Mahanaim, v. 19. He is therefore said to be the only officer in that land, because the other two, mentioned v. 13, 14, depended on him, and were subordinate to him.

20. Judah and Israel were many, as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking, and making merry. 21. And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life. 22. And Solomon's provision for one day was thirty measures of fine flour, and threescore measures of meal, 23. Ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred sheep, besides harts, and roe-bucks, and fallow deer, and fatted fowl. 24. For he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphshah even to Azzah, over all the kings on this side the river: and he had peace on all sides round about him. 25. And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, all the days of Solomon. 26. And Solomon had forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen. 27. And those officers provided victual for king Solomon, and for all that came unto king Solomon's table, every man in his month: they lacked nothing. 28. Barley also and straw for the horses and dromedaries brought they unto the place where the officers were, every man according to his charge.

Such a kingdom, and such a court, sure never any prince had, as Solomon's is here described to be.

I. Such a kingdom. Never did the crown of Israel shine so bright, as it did when Solomon wore it; never in his father's days, never in the days of any of his successors; nor was that kingdom ever so glorious a type of the kingdom of the Messiah, as it was then. The account here given of it, is such as fully answers the prophecies which we have concerning it, Ps. 72. which is a psalm for Solomon, but with reference to Christ.

The territories of this kingdom were large, and its tributaries many: so it was foretold, that he should have dominion from sea to sea, Ps. 72. 8. . . 11. Solomon reigned not only over all Israel, who were his subjects by choice, but over all the neighbouring kingdoms, who were his subjects by constraint. All the princes from the river Euphrates north-east, to the border of Egypt south-west, not only added to his honour, by doing him homage, and holding their crowns from him, but added to his wealth, by serving him, and bringing him presents, v. 21. David, by his successful wars, compelled them to this subjection, and Solomon, by his admirable wisdom, made it easy and reasonable; for it is fit that the fool should be servant to the wise in heart. If they gave him presents, he gave them instructions, and still taught the people knowledge; not only his own people, but those of other nations; and wisdom is better than gold. He had peace on all sides, v. 24. None of all the nations that were subject to him, offered to shake off his yoke, or give him any disturbance; but, rather, thought themselves happy in their dependence upon him. Herein, his kingdom typified the Messiah's; for to him it is promised that he shall have the heathen for his inheritance, and that princes shall worship him, Isa. 49. 6, 7.—53. 12.

2. The subjects of this kingdom, and its inhabitants, were many and cheerful. (1.) They were numerous, and the country exceedingly populous; (v. 20.) Judah and Israel were many, and that good land sufficient to maintain them all. They were as the sand of the sea in multitude. Now was fulfilled the promise made to Abraham, concerning the increase of his seed; (Gen. 22. 17.) as well as that concerning the extent of their dominion, Gen. 15. 18. This was their strength and beauty, the honour of their prince, the terror of their enemies, and an advancement of the wealth of the nation. If they grew so numerous that the place was any where too strait for them, they might remove with advantage into the countries that were subject to them. God's spiritual Israel are many, at least, they will be so, when they come all together, Rev. 7. 9. (2.) They were easy; they dwelt safely, or, with confidence and assurance; (v. 25.) not jealous of their king, or of his officers; not disaffected either to him, or to one another, nor under any apprehension of danger from enemies foreign or domestic. They were happy, and knew it; safe, and willing to think themselves so. They dwelt every man under his vine and fig-tree. Solomon invaded no man's property, took not to himself their vineyards and oliveyards, as sometimes was the manner of the king, (1 Sam. 8. 19.) but what they had, they could call their own: he protected every man in the possession and enjoyment of his property. They that had vines and fig-trees, ate the fruit of them themselves; and so great was the peace of the country, that they might, if they pleased, dwell as safely under the shadow of them, as within the walls of a city. Or, because it was usual to have vines by the sides of their houses, (Ps. 128. 3.) they are said to dwell under their vines. (3.) They were cheerful in the use of their plenty, eating and drinking, and making merry, v. 20. Solomon did not only keep a good table himself, but enabled all his subjects, according to their rank, to do so too, and taught them that God gave them their abundance, that they might use it soberly and pleasantly, not that they might hoard it up. There is nothing better than for a man to eat the labour of his hands, (Eccl. 2. 24.) and that, with a merry heart, Eccl. 9. 7. His father, in the Psalms, had led his people into the comforts of communion with God, and now he led them into the comfortable use of the good things of this life. This pleasant posture of Israel's affairs, extended, in place, from Dan to Beer-sheba; no part of the country was exposed, or, upon any account, uneasy; and it continued a long time, all the days of Solomon, without any material interruption. Go where you would, you might see all the marks of plenty, peace and satisfaction. The spiritual peace, and joy, and holy security, of all the faithful subjects of the Lord Jesus, were typified by this. The kingdom of God is not, as Solomon's was, meat and drink, but, what is infinitely better, righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

II. Such a court Solomon kept, as can scarcely be paralleled. We may guess at the vast number of his attendants, and the great resort that was to him, by the provision that was made daily for his table. Of bread so many measures of flour and meal, as, it is computed, would richly serve 3000 men; Carel-lus computes above 48000 men; and the provision of flesh (v. 23.) is rather more, in proportion. What vast quantities were here of beef, mutton, and venison, and the choicest of all fatted things, as some read that which we translate fatted fowl! Ahasuerus, once in his reign, made a great feast, to show the riches of his kingdom, Esth. 1. 3, 4. But it was much more the honour of Solomon, that he kept a constant table, and a very noble one; not of dainties, or deceitful meats, (he himself witnessed against them, Prov. 23. 3.) but substantial food, for the entertainment of those who came to hear his wisdom. Thus Christ fed those whom he taught, five thousand at a time, more than ever Solomon's table would entertain at once: all believers have in him a continual feast. Herein, he far outdoes Solomon, that he feeds all his subjects, not with the bread that perishes, but with that which endures to eternal life.

It added much, both to the strength and glory of Solomon's kingdom, that he had such abundance of horses, 40,000 for chariots, and 12,000 for his troops. A thousand horse, perhaps, in every tribe, for the preserving of the public peace, v. 26. God had commanded that their king should not multiply horses, (Deut. 17. 16.) nor, according to the account here given, considering the extent and wealth of Solomon's kingdom, did he multiply horses in proportion to his neighbours; for we find even the Philistines bringing into the field 30,000 chariots, (1 Sam. 13. 6.) and the Syrians, at least, 40,000 horse, 2 Sam. 10. 18. The same officers that provided for his house, provided also for his table, v. 27, 28. Every one knew his place, and work, and time; and so this great court was kept without confusion. Solomon, that had vast incomes, lived at a vast expense; and perhaps wrote that, with application to himself, (Ecc. 5. 11.) When goods increase, they are increased that eat them; and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes, unless withal they have the satisfaction of doing good with them?

29. And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea-shore. 30. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt. 31. For he was wiser than all men; than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol: and his fame was in all nations round about. 32. And he spake three thousand proverbs: and his songs were a thousand and five. 33. And he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. 34. And there came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from all kings of the earth, which had heard of his wisdom.

Solomon's wisdom was more his glory than his wealth; a general account of that we have here.

I. The fountain of his wisdom. God gave it him, v. 29. He owns it himself, (Prov. 2. 6.) The Lord giveth wisdom. He gives the powers of reason, (Job 38. 36.) preserves and improves them. The ordinary advances of them are owing to his providence, and sanctification of them, to his grace; and this extraordinary pitch at which they arrived in Solomon, to a special grant of his favour to him, in answer to his prayer.

II. The fulness of it. He had wisdom and understanding, exceeding much; great knowledge of distant countries, and the histories of former times; a quickness of thought, strength of memory, and clearness of judgment, such as never any man had. It is called largeness of heart, for the heart is often put for the intellectual powers. He had a vast compass of knowledge, could take things entire, and had an admirable faculty of laying things together. Some, by his largeness of heart, understand his courage and boldness, and that great assurance with which he delivered his dictates and determinations. Or, it may be meant of his disposition to do good with it. He was very free and communicative of his knowledge; had the gift of utterance, as well as wisdom; was as free of his learning as he was of his meat; and grudged neither to any that were about him. Note, It is very desirable that those who have large gifts of any kind, should have large hearts to use them for the good of others; and this is from the hand of God, Ecc. 3. 24. He shall enlarge the heart, Ps. 119. 32.

The greatness of Solomon's wisdom is illustrated by comparison. Chaldea and Egypt were nations famous for learning; thence the Greeks borrowed their's; but the greatest scholars of these nations, came short of Solomon, v. 30. If nature excels art, much more does grace. The knowledge which God gives by special favour, goes beyond that which man gets by his own labour. Some wise men there were in Solomon's time, who were in great repute; particularly, Heman, and others who were Levites, and employed by David in the temple music, 1 Chron. 15. 19. Heman was his seer in the word of God, 1 Chron. 25. 5. Chalcol and Darda were own brothers, and they also were noted for learning and wisdom, but Solomon excelled them all; (v. 30.) he out-did them, and confounded them; his counsel was much more valuable.

III. The fame of it. It was talked of in all nations round about. His great wealth and glory made his wisdom much more illustrious, and gave him those opportunities of showing it, which they cannot have, that live in poverty and obscurity. The jewel of wisdom may receive great advantage by the setting of it.

IV. The fruits of it; by these the tree is known: he did not bury his talent, but showed his wisdom.

1. In his compositions. Those in divinity, written by divine inspiration, are not mentioned here, for they are extant, and will remain to the world's end, monuments of his wisdom; and are, as other parts of scripture, of use to make us wise unto salvation. But beside those, it appears by what he spake, or dictated to be written from him, (1.) That he was a moralist, and a man of great prudence, for he spake three thousand proverbs, wise sayings, apophthegms, of admirable use for the conduct of human life. The world is much governed by proverbs, and was never better furnished with useful ones, than by Solomon. Whether those proverbs of Solomon that we have, were any part of the 3000, is uncertain. (2.) That he was a poet, and a man of great wit. His songs were a thousand and five, of which only one is extant, because that only was divinely inspired, which is therefore called his Song of songs. His wise instructions were communicated by proverbs, that they might be familiar to them he designed to teach, and ready on all occasions; by songs, that they might be pleasant, and move the affections. (3.) That he was a natural philosopher, and a man of great learning, and insight into the mysteries of nature: from his own and others' observations and experience, he wrote of plants and animals, (v. 33.) descriptions of their natures and qualities, and (some think) of the medicinal use of them.

2. In his conversation. There came persons from all parts, who were more inquisitive after knowledge than their neighbours, to hear the wisdom of Solomon, v. 34. Kings that had heard of it, sent their ambassadors to hear it, and to bring them instructions from it. Solomon's court was the staple of learning, and the rendezvous of philosophers, that is, the lovers of wisdom, who all came to light their candle at his lamp, and to borrow from him. Let those who magnify the modern learning above that of the ancients, produce such a treasure of knowledge, any where in these latter ages, as that was, which Solomon was master of; yet this puts an honour upon human learning, that Solomon was praised for it, and recommends it to the great men of the earth, as well worthy their diligent search. But, lastly, Solomon was, herein, a type of Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; and hid for use, for he is made of God to us, wisdom.

CHAP. V.

The great work which Solomon was raised up to do, was, the building of the temple; his wealth and wisdom were given him, to qualify him for that. In this, especially, he was to be a type of Christ, for He shall build the temple of the Lord, Zech. 6. 12. In this chapter, we have an account of the preparations he made for that and his other buildings. Gold and silver his good father had prepared in abundance, but timber and stone he must get ready; and about these we have him treating with Hiram king of Tyre. I. Hiram congratulated him on his accession to the throne, v. 1. II. Solomon signified to him his design to build the temple, and desired him to furnish him with workmen, v. 2..6. III. Hiram agrees to do it, v. 7..9. IV. Solomon's work is, accordingly, well done, and Hiram's workmen well paid, v. 10..13.

1. AND Hiram king of Tyre sent his servants unto Solomon; (for he had heard that they had anointed him king in the room of his father;) for Hiram was ever a lover of David. 2. And Solomon sent to Hiram, saying, 3. Thou knowest how that David my father could not build a house unto the name of the LORD his God, for the wars which were about him on every side, until the LORD put them under the soles of his feet. 4. But now the LORD my God hath given me rest on every side, so that there is neither adversary nor evil occurrent. 5. And, behold, I purpose to build a house unto the name of the LORD my God, as the LORD spake unto David my father, saying, Thy son whom I will set upon thy throne in thy room, he shall build a house unto my name. 6. Now therefore command thou that they hew me cedar-trees out of Lebanon; and my servants shall be with thy servants: and unto thee will I give hire for thy servants, according to all that thou shalt appoint: for thou knowest that there is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like unto the Sidonians. 7. And it came to pass, when Hiram heard the words of Solomon, that he rejoiced greatly, and said, Blessed be the LORD this day, which hath given unto David a wise son over this great people. 8. And Hiram sent to Solomon, saying, I have considered the things which thou sentest to me for: and I will do all thy desire concerning timber of cedar, and concerning timber of fir. 9. My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea; and I will convey them by sea in floats unto the place that thou shalt appoint me, and will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them: and thou shalt accomplish my desire in giving food for my household.

We have here an account of the amicable correspondence between Solomon and Hiram. Tyre was a famous trading city, that lay close upon the sea, in the border of Israel; its inhabitants, (as should seem,) none of the devoted nations, nor ever at enmity with Israel; and therefore David never offered to destroy them, but lived in friendship with them. It is said here of Hiram their king, that he was ever a lover of David; and we have reason to think he was a worshipper of the true God, and had him self renounced, though he could not reform the idolatry of his city. David's character will win the affections of those that are without. Here is,

I. Hiram's embassy of compliment to Solomon, v. 1. He sent, as is usual among princes, to condole with him on the death of David, and to renew his alliances with him upon his succession to the government. It is good keeping up friendship and communion with the families in which religion is uppermost.

II. Solomon's embassy of business to Hiram, sent, it is likely, by messengers of his own. In wealth, honour and power, Hiram was very much inferior to Solomon, yet Solomon has occasion to be beholden to him, and begs his favour. Let us never look with disdain on those below us, because we know not how soon we may need them. Solomon, in his letter to Hiram, acquaints him,

1. With his design to build a temple to the honour of God. Some think that temples among the heathen took their first rise and copy from the tabernacle which Moses erected in the wilderness, and that there were none before that; however, there were many houses built in honour of the false gods, before this was built in honour of the God of Israel, so little is external splendour a mark of the true church. Solomon tells Hiram, (who was himself no stranger to the affair,) (1.) That David's wars were an obstruction to him, that he could not build this temple, though he designed it, v. 3. They took up much of his time, and thoughts, and cares; were a constant expense to him, and a constant employment of his subjects; so that he could not do it so well as it must be done, and therefore, it not being essential to religion, he must leave it to be done by his successor. See what need we have to pray, that God will give peace in our time, because, in time of war, the building of the gospel-temple commonly goes slowly on. (2.) That peace gave him an opportunity to build it, and therefore he resolved to set about it immediately. God has given me rest both at home and abroad, and there is no adversary; (v. 4.) no Satan, so the word is; no instrument of Satan to oppose it, or to divert us from it. Satan does all he can, to hinder temple-work, (1 Thess. 2. 18. Zech. 3. 1.) but when he is bound, (Rev. 20. 2.) we should be busy. When there is no evil occurrent, then let us be vigorous and zealous in that which is good, and get it forward. When the churches have rest, let them be edified, Acts 9. 31.

Days of peace and prosperity present us with a fair gale, which we must account for, if we improve not. As God's providence excited Solomon to think of building the temple, by giving him wealth and leisure, so his promise encouraged him. God had told David, that his son should build him a house; (v. 5.) he will take it as a pleasure to be thus employed, and will not lose the honour designed him by that promise. It may stir us up much to good undertakings, to be assured of good success in them. Let God's promise quicken our endeavours.

2. With his desire that Hiram would assist him herein. Lebanon was the place whence timber must be had, a noble forest in the north of Canaan, particularly expressed in the grant of that land to Israel, all Lebanon, Josh. 13. 5. So that Solomon was proprietor of all its productions; the cedars of Lebanon are spoken of as, in a special manner, the planting of the Lord, (Ps. 104. 16.) being designed for Israel's use, and particularly for temple-service. But Solomon owns that though the trees were his, the Israelites could not skill to hew timber like the Sidonians, who were Hiram's subjects. Canaan was a land of wheat and barley, (Deut. 8. 8.) which employed Israel in the affairs of husbandry, so that they were not at all versed in manufactures: in them, the Sidonians excelled. Israel, in the things of God, are a wise and understanding people; and yet, in curious arts, inferior to their neighbours: true piety is a much more valuable gift of heaven than the highest degree of ingenuity. Better be an Israelite skilful in the law, than a Sidonian skilful to hew timber. But, the case being thus, Solomon courts Hiram to send him workmen, and promises, (v. 6.) both to assist them, My servants shall be with thy servants, to work under them; and to pay them, Unto thee will I give hire for thy servants; for the labourer, even in church-work, though it be indeed its own wages, is worthy of his hire. The evangelical prophet, foretelling the glory of the church in the days of the Messiah, seems to allude to this story, Isa. 60. where he prophesies, (1.) That the sons of strangers (such were the Tyrians and Sidonians) should build up the wall of the gospel-temple, v. 10. Ministers were raised up among the Gentiles, for the edifying of the body of Christ. (2.) That the glory of Lebanon should be brought to it to beautify it, v. 13. All external endowments and advantages should be made serviceable to the interests of Christ's kingdom.

3. Hiram's reception of, and return to, this message.

(1.) He received it with great satisfaction to himself. He rejoiced greatly, (v. 7.) that Solomon trod in his father's steps, and carried on his designs, and was likely to be so great a blessing to his kingdom. Hiram's generous spirit rejoiced in this, and not only in the prospect he had of making an advantage to himself by Solomon's employing him. What he had the pleasure of, he gave God the praise of; Blessed be the Lord, which has given to David (who was himself a wise man) a wise son, to rule over this great people. See here, [1.] With what pleasure Hiram speaks of Solomon's wisdom, and the extent of his dominion; let us learn not to envy others either those secular advantages, or those endowments of the mind, wherein they excel us. [2.] What a great comfort it is to those who wish well to the Israel of God, to see religion and wisdom kept up in families from one generation to another, especially in great families, and those that have great influence on others: where it is so, God must have the glory of it. If to godly parents be given a godly seed, (Mal. 2. 15.) it is a token for good, and a happy indication, that the entail of the blessing shall not be cut off.

lomon, granting him what he desired, and showing himself very forward to assist him in this great and good work to which he was laying his hand. We have here his articles of agreement with Solomon concerning this affair, in which we may observe Hiram's prudence. [1.] He deliberated upon the proposal, before he returned an answer; (v. 8.) I have considered the things. It is common for those that make bargains rashly, afterward to wish them unmade again. The virtuous woman considers a field, and then buys it, Prov. 31. 16. Those do not lose time, who take time to consider. [2.] He descended to particulars in the articles, that there might be no misunderstanding afterward, to occasion a quarrel. Solomon had spoken of hewing the trees, (v. 6.) and Hiram agrees to what he desired concerning that; (v. 8.) but nothing had been said concerning carriage; that matter therefore must be settled. Land-carriage would be very troublesome and chargeable, he therefore undertakes to bring all the timber down from Lebanon by sea; a coasting voyage. Conveyance by water is a great convenience to trade, for which, God is to have praise, who taught man that discretion. Observe what a punctual bargain Hiram made; Solomon must appoint the place where the timber shall be delivered, and thither Hiram will undertake to bring it, and be responsible for its safety. As the Sidonians excelled the Israelites in timber-work, so they did in sailing, for Tyre and Sidon were situate at the entry of the sea; (Ezek. 27. 3.) they therefore were fittest to take care of the water-carriage: Tractant fabrilia fabri—Every artist has his trade assigned. And, lastly, if Hiram undertake for the work, and do all Solomon's desire concerning the timber, (v. 8.) he justly expects that Solomon shall undertake for the wages; "Thou shalt accomplish my desire in giving food for my household, (v. 9.) not only for the workmen, but for my own family." If Tyre supplies Israel with craftsmen, Israel will supply Tyre with corn, Ezek. 27. 17. Thus, by the wise disposal of Providence, one country has need of another, and is benefited by another, that there may be mutual correspondence and dependence, to the glory of God, our common Parent.

10. So Hiram gave Solomon cedar-trees, and fir-trees, according to all his desire. 11. And Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil: thus gave Solomon to Hiram year by year. 12. And the Lord gave Solomon wisdom, as he promised him; and there was peace between Hiram and Solomon; and they two made a league together. 13. And king Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty thousand men. 14. And he sent them to Lebanon, ten thousand a month by courses; a month they were in Lebanon, and two months at home: and Adoniram was over the levy. 15. And Solomon had threescore and ten thousand that bare burdens, and fourscore thousand hewers in the mountains: 16. Besides the chief of Solomon's officers which were over the work, three thousand and three hundred, which ruled over the people that wrought in the work. 17. And the king commanded, and they brought great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones, to lay the foundation of the house. 18. And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them, and the stone-squarers: so they prepared timber and stones to build the house.

Here is,

I. The performance of the agreement between Solomon and Hiram; each of the parties made good its engagement. 1. Hiram delivered Solomon the timber, according to his bargain, v. 10. The trees were Solomon's; but, perhaps, Materiam superabat opus—The workmanship was of more value than the article. Hiram is therefore said to deliver the trees. 2. Solomon conveyed to Hiram the corn which he had promised him, v. 11. Thus let justice be followed, (as the expression is, Deut. 16. 20.) justice on both sides, in every bargain.

II. The confirmation of the friendship that was between them hereby. God gave Solomon wisdom; (v. 12.) that was more and better than any thing Hiram did or could give him; but this made Hiram love him, and enabled Solomon to improve his kindness, so that they were both willing to ripen their mutual love into a mutual league, that it might be lasting. It is wisdom to strengthen our friendship with those we find to be honest and fair, lest new friends prove not so firm and so kind as old ones.

III. The labourers whom Solomon employed in preparing materials for the temple. 1. Some were Israelites, who were employed in the more easy and honourable part of the work, felling trees, and helping to square them, in conjunction with Hiram's servants; for this he appointed 30,000, but employed only 10,000 at a time, so that, for one month's work, they had two months' vacation, both for rest, and for the despatch of their own affairs at home, v. 13, 14. It was temple-service, yet Solomon takes care that they shall not be over-worked; great men ought to consider that their servants must rest as well as they. 2. Others were captives of other nations, who were to bear burthens, and to hew stone; (v. 15.) and we read not that these had their resting times as the other had, for they were doomed to servitude. 3. There were some employed as directors and overseers, (v. 16.) 3,300 that ruled over the people, and they were as necessary and useful in their place as the labourers in their's. Here were many hands and many eyes employed; for preparation was now to be made, not only for the temple, but for all the rest of Solomon's buildings, both at Jerusalem and here in the forest of Lebanon, and in other places of his dominion, of which see, ch. 9. 17-19. He speaks of the vastness of his undertakings, (Eccl. 2. 4.) I made me great works, which required this vast number of workmen.

IV. The laying of the foundation of the temple; for that is the building his heart is chiefly upon, and therefore he begins with that, v. 17, 18. It should seem, Solomon was himself present, and president, at the founding of the temple, and that the first stone (as has been usual in famous buildings) was laid with some solemnity. Solomon commanded, and they brought costly stones for the foundation; he would do every thing like himself, generously, and therefore would have some of the costliest stones laid, or buried rather, in the foundation, though, being out of sight, worse might have served. Christ, who is laid for a Foundation, is an elect and precious Stone; (Isa. 28. 16.) and the foundations of the church are said to be laid with sapphires, Isa. 54. 11. Compare Rev. 21. 19. That sincerity which is our gospel-perfection, obliges us to lay our foundation firm, and to bestow most pains on that part of our religion which lies out of the sight of men.

CHAP. VI.

Great and long preparation had been making for the building of the temple, and here, at length, comes an account of the building of it; a noble piece of work it was, one of the wonders of the world, and, taken in its spiritual significance, one of the glories of the church. Here is, I. The time when it was built, (v. 1.) and how long it was in the building, v. 37, 38. II. The silence with which it was built, v. 7. III. The dimensions of it, v. 2, 3. IV. The message God sent to Solomon, when it was in the building, v. 11. . 13. V. The particulars; windows, (v. 4.) chambers, (v. 5, 6, 8. . 10.) the walls and flooring, (v. 14. . 18.) the oracle, (v. 19. . 22.) the cherubims, (v. 23. . 30.) the doors, (v. 31. . 35.) and the inner court, v. 36. Many learned men have well bestowed their pains in expounding the description here given of the temple according to the rules of architecture, and solving the difficulties which, upon search, they find in it; but, in that matter having nothing new to offer, we will not be particular or curious; it was then well understood, and every man's eyes that saw this glorious structure, furnished him with the best critical exposition of this chapter.

I. AND it came to pass, in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month Zif, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the LORD. 2. And the house which king Solomon built for the LORD, the length thereof was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof twenty cubits, and the height thereof thirty cubits. 3. And the porch before the temple of the house, twenty cubits was the length thereof, according to the breadth of the house; and ten cubits was the breadth thereof before the house. 4. And for the house he made windows of narrow lights. 5. And against the wall of the house he built chambers round about, against the walls of the house round about, both of the temple and of the oracle: and he made chambers round about. 6. The nethermost chamber was five cubits broad, and the middle was six cubits broad, and the third was seven cubits broad: for without in the wall of the house he made narrowed rests round about, that the beams should not be fastened in the walls of the house. 7. And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither: so that there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron, heard in the house while it was in building. 8. The door for the middle chamber was in the right side of the house: and they went up with winding stairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third. 9. So he built the house, and finished it; and covered the house with beams and boards of cedar. 10. And then he built chambers against all the house, five cubits high: and they rested on the house with timber of cedar.

Here,

I The temple is called the house of the Lord, (v.

1.) because it was, 1. Directed and modelled by him. Infinite Wisdom was the architect, and gave David the plan or pattern by the Spirit, not by word of mouth only, but, for the greater certainty and exactness, in writing, (1 Chron. 28. 11, 12, 19.) as he had given to Moses in the mount a draught of the tabernacle. 2. Dedicated and devoted to him and to his honour, to be employed in his service; so his, as never any other house was, for he manifested his glory in it, (so as never in any other,) in a way agreeable to that dispensation; for when there were carnal ordinances, there was a worldly sanctuary, Heb. 9. 1, 10. This gave it its beauty of holiness, that it was the house of the Lord, which far transcended all its other beauties.

II. The time when it began to be built, is exactly set down. 1. It was just 480 years after the bringing of the children of Israel out of Egypt; allowing 40 years to Moses, 17 to Joshua, 299 to the Judges, 40 to Eli, 40 to Samuel and Saul, 40 to David, and 4 to Solomon, before he began the work, we have just the sum of 480. So long it was, after that holy state was founded, before that holy house was built, which, in less than 430 years, was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar; it was thus deferred, because Israel had, by their sins, rendered themselves unworthy of this honour, and because God would show how little he values external pomp and splendor in his service; he was in no haste for a temple. David's tent, which was clean and convenient, though it was neither stately nor rich, nor, for aught that appears, ever consecrated, is called the house of the Lord, (2 Sam. 12. 20.) and served as well as Solomon's temple; yet, when God gave Solomon great wealth, he put it into his heart thus to employ it, and graciously accepted him, chiefly, because it was to be a shadow of good things to come, Heb. 9. 9. 2. It was in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, the three first years being taken up in settling the affairs of his kingdom, that he might not find any embarrassment from them in this work. It is not time lost, which is spent in composing ourselves for the work of God, and disentangling ourselves from every thing which might distract or divert us; during this time, he was adding to the preparations which his father had made, (1 Chron. 22. 14.) hewing the stone, squaring the timber, and getting every thing ready, so that he is not to be blamed for slackness in deferring it so long; we are truly serving God, when we are preparing for his service, and furnishing ourselves for it.

III. The materials are brought in, ready for their place; (v. 7.) so ready, that there was neither hammer nor axe heard in the house, while it was building. In all this building, Solomon prescribes it as a rule of prudence, to prepare the work in the field, and afterward build, Prov. 24. 27. But here, it seems, the preparation was, more than common, full and exact, to that degree, that, when the several parts came to be put together, there was nothing defective to be added, nothing amiss to be amended; it was to be the temple of the God of peace, and therefore no iron tool must be heard in it. Quietness and silence both become and befriend religious exercises. God's work should be done with as much care, and as little noise as may be. The temple was thrown down with axes and hammers; and they that did it, roared in the midst of the congregation; (Ps. 74. 4, 6.) but it was built up in silence. Clamour and violence, often hinder, but never further, the work of God.

IV. The dimensions are laid down, (v. 2, 3.) according to the rules of proportion. Some observe that the length and breadth were just double to that of the tabernacle. Now that Israel was grown more numerous, the place of their meeting needed to be enlarged; (Isa. 54. 1, 2.) and now that they were grown richer, they were the better able to enlarge it. Where God sows plentifully, he expects to reap so.

V. An account of the windows, (v. 4.) they were broad within, and narrow without, margin. Such should the eyes of our mind be, reflecting nearer on ourselves than on other people, looking much within, to judge ourselves, but little without, to censure our brethren. The narrowness of the lights intimated the darkness of that dispensation, in comparison with the gospel-day.

The chambers are described, (v. 5, 6.) in which the utensils of the tabernacle were carefully laid up, the priests dressed and undressed themselves, and left the clothes in which they ministered; probably, in some of these chambers they feasted upon the holy things, they served as vestries. Solomon was not so intent upon the magnificence of the house, as to neglect the conveniences that were requisite for the offices thereof, that every thing might be done decently and in order; care was taken that the beams should not be fastened in the walls to weaken them, v. 6. Let not the church's strength be impaired, under pretence of adding to its beauty or convenience.

11. And the word of the LORD came to Solomon, saying, 12. Concerning this house which thou art in building, if thou wilt walk in my statutes, and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them; then will I perform my word with thee, which I spake unto David thy father: 13. And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will not forsake my people Israel. 14. So Solomon built the house, and finished it.

Here is,

1. The word God sent to Solomon, when he was engaged in building the temple; God let him know that he took notice of what he was doing, the house he was now building, v. 12. None employ themselves for God, without having his eye upon them; I know thy works, thy good works. He assured him that if he would proceed and persevere in obedience to the divine law, and keep in the way of duty and the true worship of God, the divine loving-kindness should be drawn out both to himself, (I will perform my word with thee,) and to his kingdom, "Israel shall be ever owned as my people; I will dwell among them, and not forsake them." This word God sent him, probably, by a prophet; (1.) That, by the promise, he might be encouraged and comforted in his work: perhaps, sometimes the great care, expense, and fatigue of it, made him ready to wish he had never begun it; but this would help him through the difficulties of it, that the promised establishment of his family and kingdom would abundantly recompense all his pains. An eye to the promise will carry us cheerfully through our work; and those who wish well to the public, will think nothing too much that they can do, to secure and perpetuate to it the tokens of God's presence. (2.) That, by the condition annexed, he might be awakened to consider that though he built the temple ever so strong, the glory of it would soon depart, unless he and his people continued to walk in God's statutes. God plainly lets him know that all this charge which he and his people were at, in erecting this temple, would neither excuse them from obedience to the law of God, nor shelter them from his judgments, in case of disobedience: keeping God's command ments is better, and more pleasing to him, than building churches.

2. The work Solomon did for God. So he built the house; (v. 14.) so animated by the message God had sent him, so admonished not to expect that God should own his building, unless he were obedient to his laws; "Lord, I proceed upon these terms, being firmly resolved to walk in thy statutes." The strictness of God's government will never drive a good man from his service, but quicken him in it. Solomon built and finished, he went on with it, and God went along with him till it was completed; it is spoken, both to God's praise and his: he grew not weary of the work, met not with any obstructions, (as Ezra 4. 24.) did not out-build his property, nor do it by halves, but, having begun to build, was both able and willing to finish, for he was a wise builder.

15. And he built the walls of the house within with boards of cedar, both the floor of the house and the walls of the ceiling: and he covered them on the inside with wood, and covered the floor of the house with planks of fir. 16. And he built twenty cubits on the sides of the house, both the floor and the walls, with boards of cedar: he even built them for it within, even for the oracle, even for the most holy place. 17. And the house, that is, the temple before it, was forty cubits long. 18. And the cedar of the house within was carved with knops and open flowers: all was cedar; there was no stone seen. 19. And the oracle he prepared in the house within, to set there the ark of the covenant of the LORD. 20. And the oracle in the forepart was twenty cubits in length, and twenty cubits in breadth, and twenty cubits in the height thereof: and he overlaid it with pure gold; and so covered the altar which was of cedar. 21. So Solomon overlaid the house within with pure gold: and he made a partition by the chains of gold before the oracle; and he overlaid it with gold. 22. And the whole house he overlaid with gold, until he had finished all the house: also the whole altar that was by the oracle he overlaid with gold. 23. And within the oracle he made two cherubims of olive-tree, each ten cubits high. 24. And five cubits was the one wing of the cherub, and five cubits the other wing of the cherub: from the uttermost part of the one wing unto the uttermost part of the other were ten cubits. 25. And the other cherub was ten cubits: both the cherubims were of one measure and one size. 26. The height of the one cherub was ten cubits, and so was it of the other cherub. 27. And he set the cherubims within the inner house: and they stretched forth the wings of the cherubims, so that the wing of the one touched the one wall, and the wing of the other cherub touched the other wall; and their wings touched one another in the midst of the house. 28. And he overlaid the cherubims with gold. 29. And he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubims and palm-trees and open flowers, within and without. 30. And the floor of the house he overlaid with gold, within and without. 31. And for the entering of the oracle he made doors of olive-tree: the lintel and side-posts were a fifth part of the wall. 32. The two doors also were of olive-tree; and he carved upon them carvings of cherubims and palm-trees and open flowers, and overlaid them with gold, and spread gold upon the cherubims and upon the palm-trees. 33. So also made he for the door of the temple, posts of olive-tree, a fourth part of the wall. 34. And the two doors were of fir-tree: the two leaves of the one door were folding, and the two leaves of the other door were folding. 35. And he carved thereon cherubims and palm-trees and open flowers; and covered them with gold fitted upon the carved work. 36. And he built the inner court with three rows of hewed stone, and a row of cedar-beams. 37. In the fourth year was the foundation of the house of the LORD laid, in the month Zif: 38. And in the eleventh year, in the month Bul, (which is the eighth month,) was the house finished throughout all the parts thereof, and according to all the fashion of it. So was he seven years in building it.

Here is,

I. The wainscot of the temple described; it was of cedar, (v. 15.) which was strong and durable, and of a very sweet smell; the wainscot was curiously carved with knops (like eggs or apples) and flowers, no doubt, as the fashion then was, v. 18.

II. The gilding; it was not like our's, washed over, but the whole house, all the inside of the temple, (v. 22.) even the floor, (v. 30.) he overlaid with gold, and the most holy place with pure gold, v. 21. Solomon would refuse no expense necessary to make it every way sumptuous; gold was under foot there, as it should be in all the living temples, the abundance of it lessened its worth.

III. The oracle, or speaking place, (for so the word signifies,) the holy of holies, so called, because from thence God spake to Moses, and perhaps to the High Priest, when he consulted with the breast-plate of judgment; in this place, the ark of the covenant was to be set, v. 19. Solomon made every thing new, and more magnificent than it had been, except the ark, which was still the same that Moses made, with its mercy-seat and cherubims; that was the token of God's presence, which is always the same with his people, whether they meet in tent or temple, and changes not with their condition.

IV. The cherubims. Beside those at the ends of the mercy seat, which covered the ark, 1. Solomon set up two more, very large ones, images of young men, (as some think,) with wings made of olive-wood, and all overlaid with gold, v. 23, &c. This most holy place was much larger than that in the tabernacle, and therefore the ark would seem lest in it, and the dead wall would have been unsightly, if it had not been thus adorned. 2. He carved cherubims upon all the walls of the house, v. 29. The heathen set up images of their Gods, and worshipped them; these were designed to represent the servants and attendants of the God of Israel, the holy angels, not to be themselves worshipped, (See thou do it not,) but to show how great He is, whom we are to worship.

V. The doors. The following doors that led into the oracle, were but a fifth part of the wall; (v. 31.) those into the temple were a fourth part; (v. 33.) but both were beautified with cherubims engraven on them, v. 32, 35.

VI. The inner court, in which the brazen altar was, and at which the priests ministered; this was separated from the court, where the people were, by a low wall, three rows of hewn stone topped with a cornice of cedar, (v. 36.) that over it the people might see what was done, and hear what the priests said to them, for, when under that dispensation, they were not kept wholly either in the dark, or at a distance.

Lastly, The time spent in this building; it was but seven years and a half from the founding to the finishing of it, v. 38. Considering the vastness and elegance of the building, and the many appurtenances to it, which were necessary to fit it for use, it was soon done; Solomon was in earnest in it, had money enough, had nothing to divert him from it, and many hands made quick work; he finished it (as the margin reads it) with all the appurtenances thereof, and with all the ordinances thereof; not only built the place, but set forward the work which it was built for.

Let us now see what was typified by this temple.

1. Christ is the true Temple, he himself spake of the temple of his body, John 2. 21. God himself prepared him his body, Heb. 10. 5. In him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, as the Shechinah in the temple; in him meet all God's spiritual Israel; through him we have access with confidence to God; all the angels of God, those blessed cherubims, have a charge to worship him.

2. Every believer is a living temple, in whom the Spirit of God dwells, 1 Cor. 3. 16. Even the body is such by virtue of its union with the soul, 1 Cor. 6. 19. We are not only wonderfully made, by the divine providence, but more wonderfully made anew, by the divine graces; this living temple is built upon Christ as its Foundation, and will be perfect in due time.

3. The gospel-church is the mystical temple; it grows to a holy temple in the Lord, (Eph. 2. 21.) enriched and beautified with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, as Solomon's temple with gold and precious stones; only Jews built the tabernacle, but Gentiles join with them in building the temple; even strangers and foreigners are built up, a habitation of God, Eph. 2. 19. 22. The temple was divided into the holy place, and the most holy, the courts of it into the outer and inner; so, there is the visible and the invisible church: the door into the temple was wider than that into the oracle; many enter into possession, that come short of salvation. This temple is built firm, upon a Rock, not to be taken down, as the tabernacle of the Old Testament was. The temple was long in preparing, but was built at last; the top-stone of the gospel-church will, at length, be brought forth with shoutings, and it is a pity that there should be the clashing of axes and hammers in the building of it. Angels are ministering spirits, attending the church on all sides, and all the members of it.

4. Heaven is the everlasting temple; there the church will be fixed, no longer moveable; the streets of the new Jerusalem, in allusion to the flooring of the temple, are said to be of pure gold,

Rev. 21. 21. The cherubims there, always attend the throne of glory. The temple was uniform, and in heaven there is the perfection of beauty and harmony. In Solomon's temple, there was no noise of axes and hammers, every thing is quiet and serene in heaven; all that shall be stones in that building, must, in the present state of probation and preparation, be fitted and made ready for it, must be hewn and squared by divine grace, and so made meet for a place there.

CHAP. VII.

As, in the story of David, one chapter of wars and victories follows another, so, in the story of Solomon, one chapter of this building follows another. In this chapter, we have, 1. His fitting up several buildings for himself and his own use, v. 1. 12. 11. His furnishing the temple which he had built for God, 1. With two pillars, v. 13. 22. 2. With a molten sea, v. 23. 26. 3. With ten basins of brass, (v. 27. 37.) and ten lavers upon them, v. 38, 39. 4. With all the other utensils of the temple, v. 40. 50. 5. With the things that his father had dedicated, v. 51. The particular description of these things was not needless when it was written, nor is it now useless.

1. BUT Solomon was building his own house thirteen years, and he finished all his house. 2. He built also the house of the forest of Lebanon; the length thereof was a hundred cubits, and the breadth thereof fifty cubits, and the height thereof thirty cubits, upon four rows of cedar pillars, with cedar beams upon the pillars. 3. And it was covered with cedar above upon the beams, that lay on forty-five pillars, fifteen in a row. 4. And there were windows in three rows, and light was against light in three ranks. 5. And all the doors and posts were square, with the windows: and light was against light in three ranks. 6. And he made a porch of pillars; the length thereof was fifty cubits, and the breadth thereof thirty cubits: and the porch was before them; and the other pillars and the thick beam were before them. 7. Then he made a porch for the throne, where he might judge, even the porch of judgment: and it was covered with cedar from one side of the floor to the other. 8. And his house where he dwelt had another court within the porch, which was of the like work. Solomon made also a house for Pharaoh's daughter, whom he had taken to wife, like unto this porch. 9. All these were of costly stones, (according to the measures of hewed stones, sawed with saws,) within and without, even from the foundation unto the coping, and so on the outside toward the great court. 10. And the foundation was of costly stones, even great stones; stones of ten cubits, and stones of eight cubits. 11. And above were costly stones, (after the measures of hewed stones,) and cedars. 12. And the great court round about was with three rows of hewed stones, and a row of cedar beams, both for the inner court of the house of the LORD, and for the porch of the house.

Never had any man so much of the spirit of building as Solomon had, never man built to better purpose; he began with the temple, built for God first, and then all his other buildings were comfortable. The surest foundations of a lasting prosperity are those which are laid in an early piety. Matth. 6. 38.

1. He built a house for himself, (v. 1.) where he dwelt, v. 8. His father had built a good house; but it was no reflection upon his father for him to build a better, in proportion to the estate wherewith God had blessed him; much of the comfort of this life is connected with an agreeable house. He was thirteen years building this house, whereas he built the temple in little more than seven years; not that he was more exact, but less eager and intent, in building his own house, than in building God's; he was in no haste for his own palace, but impatient till the temple was finished, and fit for use; thus we ought to prefer God's honour before our own ease and satisfaction.

2. He built the house of the forest at Lebanon, (v. 2.) supposed to be a country-seat near Jerusalem, so called from the pleasantness of its situation, and the trees that encompassed it. I rather incline to think that it was a house built in the forest of Lebanon itself, whither (though far distant from Jerusalem) Solomon (having so many chariots and horses, and those dispersed into chariot-cities, which, probably, were his stages) might frequently retire with ease; it does not appear that his throne, mentioned v. 7. was at the house of the forest of Lebanon, and it was not at all improper to put his shields there as in a magazine. Express notice is taken of his buildings, not only in Jerusalem, but in Lebanon; (ch. 9. 19.) and we read of the tower of Lebanon, which looks toward Damascus, (Cant. 7. 4.) which, probably, was part of this house. A particular account is given of this house: That, being built in Lebanon, a place famed for cedars, the pillars, and beams, and roof, were all cedar, (v. 2, 3.) and, being designed for pleasant prospects, there were three tier of windows on each side, light against light, (v. 4, 5.) or, as it may be read, prospect against prospect. Those whose lot is cast in the country, may be well reconciled to a country-life by this, that some of the greatest princes have thought those the most pleasant of their days, which they have spent in their country retirements.

3. He built piazzas before one of his houses, either that at Jerusalem, or that in Lebanon, which were very famous, a porch of pillars, (v. 6.) either for an exchange, or a guard-house, or for those to walk in, that attended him about business, till they could have audience, or for state and magnificence. He himself speaks of Wisdom's building her house, and hewing out her seven pillars, (Prov. 9. 1.) for the shelter of those that, three verses before, (ch. 8. 34.) are said to watch daily at her gates, and to wait at the posts of her door.

4. At his house, where he dwelt in Jerusalem, he built a great hall, or porch of judgment, where was set the throne, or king's bench, for the trial of causes, in which he himself was appealed to, (Placita coram ipso rege tenenda—Causes were to be adjusted in the king's presence.) and this was richly wainscoted with cedar, from the floor to the roof, v. 7. He had there also another court within the porch, nearer his house, of smaller work, for his attendants to walk in, v. 8.

5. He built a house for his wife, where she kept her court, v. 8. It is said to be like the porch, because built of cedar like it, though not in the same form; this, no doubt, was nearer adjoining to his own palace, yet perhaps if it had been as near as it ought to have been, Solomon would not have multiplied wives as he did.

The wonderful magnificence of all these buildings is taken notice of, v. 9, &c. All the materials were the best of their kind; the foundation stones were costly for their size, four or five yards square, or, at least, so many yards long, (v. 10.) and the stones of the building, costly for the workmanship, hewn and sawn, and, in all respects, finely wrought, v. 9, 11. The court of his own house was like that of the temple; (v. 12. compare ch. 6. 36.) so well did he like the model of God's courts, that he made his own by it.

13. And king Solomon sent, and fetched Hiram out of Tyre. 14. He was a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali, and his father was a man of Tyre, a worker in brass: and he was filled with wisdom and understanding, and cunning to work all works in brass. And he came to king Solomon, and wrought all his work. 15. For he cast two pillars of brass, of eighteen cubits high apiece; and a line of twelve cubits did compass either of them about. 16. And he made two chapters of molten brass, to set upon the tops of the pillars: the height of the one chapter was five cubits, and the height of the other chapter was five cubits: 17. And nets of chequer-work, and wreaths of chain-work, for the chapters which were upon the top of the pillars; seven for the one chapter, and seven for the other chapter. 18. And he made the pillars, and two rows round about upon the one net-work, to cover the chapters that were upon the top, with pomegranates: and so did he for the other chapter. 19. And the chapters that were upon the top of the pillars were of lily-work in the porch, four cubits. 20. And the chapters upon the two pillars had pomegranates also above, over against the belly which was by the net-work: and the pomegranates were two hundred, in rows round about upon the other chapter. 21. And he set up the pillars in the porch of the temple: and he set up the right pillar, and called the name thereof Jachin; and he set up the left pillar, and called the name thereof Boaz. 22. And upon the top of the pillars was lily-work: so was the work of the pillars finished. 23. And he made a molten sea, ten cubits from the one brim to the other: it was round all about, and his height was five cubits; and a line of thirty cubits did compass it round about. 24. And under the brim of it round about there were knops compassing it, ten in a cubit, compassing the sea round about: the knops were cast in two rows, when it was cast. 25. It stood upon twelve oxen, three looking toward the north, and three looking toward the west, and three looking toward the south, and three looking toward the east: and the sea was set above upon upon them, and all their hinder parts were inward. 26. And it was a hand-breadth thick, and the brim thereof was wrought like the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies: it contained two thousand baths. 27. And he made ten bases of brass: four cubits was the length of one base, and four cubits the breadth thereof, and three cubits the height of it. 28. And the work of the bases was on this manner: they had borders, and the borders were between the ledges: 29. And on the borders that were between the ledges were lions, oxen, and cherubims: and upon the ledges there was a base above: and beneath the lions and oxen were certain additions made of thin work. 30. And every base had four brazen wheels, and plates of brass; and the four corners thereof had undersetters: under the laver were undersetters molten, at the side of every addition. 31. And the mouth of it, within the chapter and above, was a cubit: but the mouth thereof was round, after the work of the base, a cubit and a half; and also upon the mouth of it were gravings with their borders, foursquare, not round. 32. And under the borders were four wheels; and the axle-trees of the wheels were joined to the base, and the height of a wheel was a cubit and half a cubit. 33. And the work of the wheels was like the work of a chariot-wheel; their axle-trees, and their naves, and their felloes, and their spokes, were all molten. 34. And there were four undersetters to the four corners of one base: and the undersetters were of the very base itself. 35. And in the top of the base was there a round compass of half a cubit high: and on the top of the base, the ledges thereof, and the borders thereof, were of the same. 36. For on the plates of the ledges thereof, and on the borders thereof, he graved cherubims, lions, and palm-trees, according to the proportion of every one, and additions round about. 37. After this manner he made the ten bases: all of them had one casting, one measure, and one size. 38. Then made he ten lavers of brass: one laver contained forty baths; and every laver was four cubits: and upon every one of the ten bases one laver. 39. And he put five bases on the right side of the house, and five on the left side of the house; and he set the sea on the right side of the house eastward, over against the south. 40. And Hiram made the lavers, and the shovels, and the basins. So Hiram made an end of doing all the work that he made king Solomon for the house of the LORD; 41. The two pillars, and the two bowls of the chapters that were on the top of the two pillars; and the two net-works, to cover the two bowls of the chapters which were upon the top of the pillars; 42. And four hundred pomegranates for the two net-works, even two rows of pomegranates for one net-work, to cover the two bowls of the chapters that were upon the pillars; 43. And the ten bases, and ten lavers on the bases, 44. And one sea, and twelve oxen under the sea; 45. And the pots, and the shovels, and the basins: and all these vessels, which Hiram made to king Solomon for the house of the LORD, were of bright brass. 46. In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them, in the clay ground between Succoth and Zarthan. 47. And Solomon left all the vessels unweighed, because they were exceeding many: neither was the weight of the brass found out.

We have here an account of the brass-work about the temple; there was no iron about the temple, but we find David preparing for the temple iron for things of iron, 1 Chron. 29. 2. What those things were, we are not told, but some of the things of brass are here described, and the rest mentioned.

I. The brasier whom Solomon employed to pre-side in this part of the work, was, Hiram, or Huram, (2 Chron. 4. 11.) who was, by his mother's side, an Israelite, of the tribe of Naphtali, by his father's side, a man of Tyre, v. 14. If he had the ingenuity of a Tyrian, and the affection of an Israelite to the house of God, (the head of a Tyrian, and the heart of an Israelite,) it was happy that the blood of the two nations mixed in him, thereby he was qualified for the work to which he was designed. As the tabernacle was built with the wealth of Egypt, so the temple with the wit of Tyre. God will serve himself by the common gifts of the children of men.

II. The brass he made use of, was, the best he could get; all the brazen vessels were of bright brass, (v. 45.) good brass, so the Chaldee, that which was strongest, and looked finest; God, who is the best, must be served and honoured with the best.

III. The place where all the brazen vessels were cast, was, the plain of Jordan, because the ground there was stiff and clayey, fit to make mould of, for the casting of the brass; (v. 46.) and Solomon would not have this meaner work done in or near Jerusalem.

IV. The quantity was not accounted for, the vessels were unnumbered, (so it may be read, v. 47.) as well as unweighed, because they were exceeding many, and it would have been an endless thing to keep the account of them; neither was the weight of the brass, when it was delivered to the workmen, searched or inquired into; so honest were the workmen, and such great plenty of brass they had, that there was no danger of wanting: we must ascribe it to Solomon's care, that he provided so much, not to his carelessness, that he kept no account of it.

V. Some particulars of the brass-work are described.

1. Two brazen pillars, which were set up in the porch of the temple; (v. 21.) whether under the cover of the porch, or in the open air, is not certain; it was between the temple and the court of the priests. These pillars were neither to hang gates upon nor to rest any building upon, but purely for ornament and significancy. (1.) What an ornament they were, we may gather from the account here given of the curious work that was about them, chequer-work, chain-work, net-work, lily-work; and pomegranates in rows, and all of bright brass; and framed, no doubt, according to the best rules of proportion, to please the eye. (2.) Their significance is intimated in the names given them; (v. 21.) Jachin—He will establish; and Boaz—In him is strength. Some think they were intended for memorials of the pillar and cloud of fire, which led Israel through the wilderness: I rather think them designed for memorandums to the priests, and others that came to worship at God's door, [1.] To depend upon God only, and not upon any sufficiency of their own, for strength and establishment in all their religious exercises. When we come to wait upon God, and find our hearts wandering and unfixed, then, by faith, let us fetch in help from heaven: Jachin—God will fix this roving mind; It is a good thing that the heart be established with grace. We find ourselves weak and unable for holy duties, but this is our encouragement, Boaz—In him is our strength, who works in us both to will and to do. I will go in the strength of the Lord God. Spiritual strength and stability are to be had at the door of God's temple, where we must wait for the gifts of grace, in the use of the means of grace. [2.] It was a memorandum to them, of the strength and establishment of the temple of God among them. Let them keep close to God and duty, and they should never lose their dignities and privileges, but the grant should be confirmed and perpetuated to them. The gospel-church is what God will establish, and what he will strengthen, and what the gates of hell can never prevail against. But with respect to this temple, when it was destroyed, particular notice is taken of the destroying of these pillars, (2 Kings 25. 13, 17.) which had been the tokens of its establishment, and would have been so, if they had not forsaken God.

2. A brazen sea; a very large vessel, above five yards diameter, and which contained above 500 barrels of water for the priests' use, in washing themselves, conducting the sacrifices, and keeping the courts of the temple clean, v. 23, &c. It stood raised upon the figures of twelve oxen in brass, so high, that either they must have stairs to climb up to it, or cocks at the bottom to draw water from it. The Gibeonites, or Nethinim, who were to draw water for the house of God, had the care of filling it. Some think Solomon made the images of oxen to support this great cistern, in contempt of the golden calf, which Israel had worshipped, that (as Bishop Patrick expresses it) the people might see there was nothing worthy of adoration in those figures: they were fitter to make posts of, than to make gods of. Yet this prevailed not to prevent Jeroboam's setting up the calves for deities. In the court of the tabernacle, there was only a laver of brass provided to wash in, but in the court of the temple, a sea of brass; intimating that by the gospel of Christ, much fuller preparation is made for our cleansing, than was by the law of Moses. That had a laver, this a sea; a fountain opened, Zech. 13. 1.

3. Ten bases, or stands, or settles, of brass, on which were put ten lavers, to be filled with water for the service of the temple, because there would not be room at the molten sea for all that had occasion to wash there. The bases on which the lavers were fixed, are very largely described here, v. 27, &c. They were curiously adorned, and set upon wheels, that the lavers might be removed as there was occasion; but, ordinarily, they stood in two rows, five on one side of the court, and five on the other, v. 39. Each laver contained forty baths, that is, about ten barrels, v. 38. They must be very clean that bear the vessels of the Lord. Spiritual priests and spiritual sacrifices must be washed in the laver of Christ's blood, and of regeneration. We must wash often, for we daily contract pollution; cleanse our hands, and purify our hearts. Plentiful provision is made for our cleansing; so that if we have our lot for ever among the unclean, it will be our own fault.

4. Beside these, there was a vast number of brass pots made to boil the flesh of the peace-offerings in, which the priests and offerers were to feast upon before the Lord; (see 1 Sam. 2. 14.) also shovels, wherewith they took out the ashes of the altar. Some think the word signifies flesh-hooks, with which they took meat out of the pot. The basins also were made of brass, to receive the blood of the sacrifices. These are put for all the utensils of the brazen altar, Exod. 38. 3. While they were about it, they made abundance of them, that they might have a good stock by them, when those that were first in use, wore out, and went to decay. Thus Solomon, having wherewithal, provided for posterity.

48. And Solomon made all the vessels that pertained unto the house of the Lord: the altar of gold, and the table of gold, whereupon the show-bread was, 49. And the candlesticks of pure gold, five on the right side, and five on the left, before the oracle, with the flowers, and the lamps, and the tongs, of gold; 50. And the bowls, and the snuffers, and the basins, and the spoons, and the censers, of pure gold; and the hinges of gold, both for the doors of the inner house, the most holy place, and for the doors of the house, to wit, of the temple. 51. So was ended all the work that king Solomon made for the house of the Lord. And Solomon brought in the things which David his father had dedicated; even the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, did he put among the treasures of the house of the Lord.

Here is,

1. The making of the gold-work of the temple, which, it seems, was done last, for with it the work of the house of God ended. All within doors was gold, and all made new, except the ark, with its mercy-seat and cherubims, the old ones being either melted down, or laid by—the golden altar, table, and candlestick, with all their appurtenances. The altar of incense was still one, for Christ and his intercession are so: but he made ten golden tables, 2 Chron. 4. 8. (though here mention is made of that one only, on which the show-bread was, v. 48. which we may suppose larger than the rest, and to which the rest were as sideboards,) and ten golden candlesticks, (v. 49.) intimating the much greater plenty both of spiritual food and heavenly light, which the gospel blesses us with, than the law of Moses did, or could afford. Even the hinges of the doors were of gold, (v. 50.) that every thing might be alike magnificent, and bespeak Solomon's generosity. Some suggest that every thing was made thus splendid in God's temple, to keep the people from idolatry, for none of the idol-temples were so rich and fine as this: but how little the expedient availed, the event showed.

2. The bringing in of the dedicated things, which his father had devoted to the honour of God, v. 51. What was not expended in the building and furniture, was laid up in the treasury, for repairs, exigencies, and the constant charge of the temple-service. What the parents have dedicated to God, the children ought by no means to alienate or recall; they should cheerfully confirm what was intended for pious and charitable uses, that they may, with their estates, inherit the blessing.

CHAP. VIII.

The building and furniture of the temple were very glorious, but the dedication of it exceeds in glory, as much as prayer and praise, the work of saints, exceed the casting of metal, and the graving of stones, the work of the craftsman. The temple was designed for the keeping up of the correspondence between God and his people; and here we have an account of the solemnity of their first meeting there. I. The representatives of all Israel were called together, (v. 1, 2.) to keep a feast to the honour of God, for fourteen days, v. 65. II. The priests brought the ark into the most holy place, and fixed it there, v. 3. . . 9. III. God took possession of it by a cloud, v. 10, 11. IV. Solomon, with thankful acknowledgment to God, informed the people touching the occasion of their meeting, v. 12. . . 21. V. In a long prayer, he recommended to God's gracious acceptance all the prayers that should be made in or toward this place, v. 22. . . 53. VI. He dismissed the assembly with a blessing, and an exhortation, v. 54. . . 61. VII. He offered abundance of sacrifices, on which he and his people feasted, and so parted, with great satisfaction, v. 62. . . 66. These were Israel's golden days; days of the Son of man in type.

I. THEN Solomon assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel, unto king Solomon in Jerusalem, that they might bring up the ark of the covenant of the LORD out of the city of David, which is Zion. 2. And all the men of Israel assembled themselves unto king Solomon at the feast, in the month Ethanim, which is the seventh month. 3. And all the elders of Israel came, and the priests took up the ark. 4. And they brought up the ark of the LORD, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle, even those did the priests and the Levites bring up. 5. And king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel, that were assembled unto him, were with him before the ark, sacrificing sheep and oxen, that could not be told nor numbered for multitude. 6. And the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the LORD unto his place, into the oracle of the house, to the most holy place, even under the wings of the cherubims. 7. For the cherubims spread forth their two wings over the place of the ark, and the cherubims covered the ark, and the staves thereof, above. 8. And they drew out the staves, that the ends of the staves were seen out in the holy place before the oracle, and they were not seen without: and there they are unto this day. 9. There was nothing in the ark, save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb, when the LORD made a covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt. 10.

And it came to pass, when the priests were come out of the holy place, that the cloud filled the house of the LORD, 11. So that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud: for the glory of the LORD had filled the house of the LORD.

The temple, though richly beautified, while without the ark, was like a body without a soul, or a candlestick without a candle, or (to speak more properly) a house without an inhabitant. All the cost and pains bestowed on this stately structure are lost, if God do not accept them; and unless he please to own it, as the place where he will record his name, it is, after all, but a ruinous heap; when therefore all the work is ended, (ch. 7. 51.) the one thing needful is yet behind, and that is, the bringing in of the ark. This therefore is the end which must crown the work, and which here we have an account of the doing of with great solemnity.

I. Solomon presides in this service, as David did in the bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem; and neither of them thought it below him to follow the ark, or to lead the people in their attendance on it. Solomon glories in the title of the preacher, (Eccl. 1. 1.) and the master of assemblies, Eccl. 12. 11. This great assembly he summons, (v. 1.) and he is the centre of it, for to him they all assemble, (v. 2.) at the feast of the seventh month, namely, the feast of tabernacles, which was appointed on the fifteenth day of that month, Lev. 23. 34. David, like a very good man, brings the ark to a convenient place, near him; Solomon, like a very great man, brings it to a magnificent place. As every man has received the gift, so let him minister; and let children proceed in God's service there where their parents left off.

II. All Israel attend the service; their judges, and the chief of their tribes and families; all their officers, civil and military; and (as they speak in the north) the heads of their clans. A convention of these might well be called an assembly of all Israel; these came together, on this occasion, 1. To do honour to Solomon, and to return him the thanks of the nation for all the good offices he had done, in kindness to them. 2. To do honour to the ark, to pay respect to it, and testify their universal joy and satisfaction in its settlement. The advancement of the ark in external splendor, though it has often proved too strong a temptation to its hypocritical followers, yet, because it may prove an advantage to its true interests, is to be rejoiced in (with trembling) by all that wish well to it. Public mercies call for public acknowledgments. They that appeared before the Lord, did not appear empty, for they all sacrificed sheep and oxen innumerable, v. 5. The people, in Solomon's time, were very rich, very easy, and very cheerful, and therefore it was fit that, on this occasion, they should consecrate not only their cheerfulness, but a part of their wealth, to God and his honour.

III. The priests do their part of the service. In the wilderness, the Levites were to carry the ark, because then there were not priests enough to do it; but here, (it being the last time that the ark was to be carried,) the priests themselves did it, as they were ordered to do, when it surrounded Jericho. We are here told, 1. What was in the ark; nothing but the two tables of stone, (v. 9.) a treasure far exceeding all the dedicated things both of David and Solomon. The pot of manna, and Aaron's rod, were by the ark, but not in it. 2. What was brought up with the ark, (v. 4.) the tabernacle of the congregation. It is probable that that which Moses set up in the wilderness, which was in Gibeon, and that which David pitched in Zion, were both brought to the temple, to which they did, as it were, surrender all their holiness, merging it in that of the temple; which must, henceforward be the place where God must be sought unto. Thus will all the church's holy things on earth, that are so much its joy and glory, be swallowed up in the perfection of holiness above. 3. Where it was fixed in its place, the place appointed for its rest after all its wanderings, (v. 6.) in the oracle of the house, whence they expected God to speak to them, even in the most holy place, which was made so by the presence of the ark, under the wings of the great cherubim, which Solomon set up, (ch. 6. 27.) signifying the special protection of angels, which God's ordinances and the assemblies of his people are taken under. The staves of the ark were drawn out, so as to be seen from under the wings of the cherubims, to direct the High Priest to the mercy-seat, over the ark, when he went in, once a year, to sprinkle the blood there; so that still they continued of some use, though there was no longer occasion for them to carry it by them.

IV. God graciously owns what is done, and testifies his acceptance of it, v. 10, 11. The priests might come into the most holy place, till God manifested his glory there; but, thenceforward, none might, but at their peril, approach the ark, except the High Priest, on the day of atonement. Therefore it was not till the priests were come out of the oracle, that the Shechinah took possession of it, in a cloud, which filled not only the most holy place, but the temple, so that the priests who burnt incense at the golden altar, could not bear it. By this visible emanation of the divine glory, 1. God put an honour upon the ark, and owned it as a token of his presence. The glory of it had been long diminished and eclipsed by its frequent removes, the meanness of its lodging, and its being exposed too much to common view; but God will now show that it is as dear to him as ever, and he will have it looked upon with as much veneration as it was when Moses first brought it into his tabernacle. 2. He testifies his acceptance of the building and furnishing of the temple, as good service done to his name and his kingdom among men. 3. He struck an awe upon this great assembly; and, by what they saw, confirmed their belief of what they read in the books of Moses, concerning the glory of God's appearances to their fathers, that hereby they might be kept close to the service of the God of Israel, and fortified against temptations to idolatry. 4. He showed himself ready to hear the prayer Solomon was now about to make; and not only so, but took up his residence in this house, that all his praying people might there be encouraged to make their applications to him. But the glory of God appeared in a cloud, a dark cloud, to signify, (1.) The darkness of that dispensation, in comparison with the light of the gospel, by which, with open face, we behold, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord. (2.) The darkness of our present state, in comparison with the vision of God, which will be the happiness of heaven, where the Divine Glory is unveiled. Now we can only say what he is not, but then we shall see him as he is.

12. Then spake Solomon, The LORD said that he would dwell in the thick darkness. 13. I have surely built thee a house to dwell in, a settled place for thee to abide in for ever. 14. And the king turned his face about, and blessed all the congregation of Israel: (and all the congregation of Israel stood:) 15. And he said, Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, which spake with his mouth unto David my father, and hath with his hand fulfilled it, saying, 16. Since the day that I brought forth my people Israel out of Egypt, I chose no city out of all the tribes of Israel to build a house, that my name might be therein; but I chose David to be over my people Israel. 17. And it was in the heart of David my father to build a house for the name of the LORD God of Israel. 18. And the LORD said unto David my father, Whereas it was in thine heart to build a house unto my name, thou didst well that it was in thine heart: 19. Nevertheless thou shalt not build the house; but thy son, that shall come forth out of thy loins, he shall build the house unto my name. 20. And the LORD hath performed his word that he spake; and I am risen up in the room of David my father, and sit on the throne of Israel, as the LORD promised, and have built a house for the name of the LORD God of Israel. 21. And I have set there a place for the ark, wherein is the covenant of the LORD, which he made with our fathers, when he brought them out of the land of Egypt.

Here,

I. Solomon encourages the priests, who came out of the temple from their ministration, much astonished at the dark cloud that overshadowed them. The disciples of Christ feared, when they entered into the cloud, though it was a bright cloud; (Luke 9. 34.) so did the priests, when they found themselves wrapt in a thick cloud. To silence their fears, 1. He reminds them of that which they could not but know, that this was a token of God's presence; (v. 12.) The Lord said, he would dwell in the thick darkness. It is so far from being a token of his displeasure, that it is an indication of his favour; for he had said, I will appear in a cloud, Lev. 16. 2. Note, Nothing is more effectual to reconcile us to dark dispensations, than to consider what God hath said, and to compare his word and works together; (as Lev. 10. 3.) This is that which the Lord hath said. God is light, (1 John 1. 5.) and he dwells in light; (1 Tim. 6. 16.) but he dwells with men in the thick darkness, makes that his pavilion, because they could not bear the dazzling brightness of his glory. Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself. Thus our holy faith is exercised, and our holy fear increased; where God dwells in light, faith is swallowed up in vision, and fear in love. 2. He himself bids it welcome, as worthy of all acceptance; and since God, by this cloud, came down to take possession, he does, in a few words, solemnly give him possession; (v. 13.) Surely I come, says God. "Amen," says Solomon, "Even so, come, Lord." The house is thine own, entirely thine own, I have surely built it for thee, and furnished it for thee; it is for ever thine own, a settled place for thee to abide in for ever; it shall never be alienated or converted to any other use; the ark shall never be removed from it, never unsettled again." It is Solomon's joy, that God has taken possession; and it is his desire, that he would keep possession. Let not the priests therefore dread that in which Solomon so much triumphs.

II. He instructs the people, and gives them a plain account concerning this house, which they now saw God take possession of. He spoke briefly to the priests, to satisfy them; (a word to the wise;) but turned his face about (v. 14.) from them to the congregation that stood in the outer court, and addressed himself to them largely.

1. He blessed them. When they saw the dark cloud enter the temple, they were astonished at it, and afraid lest the thick darkness should be utter darkness to them; the amazing sight, such as they had never seen in their days, we may suppose, drove every man to his prayers, and the vainest minds were made serious by it. Solomon therefore set in with their prayers, and blessed them all; as one having authority, (for the less is blessed of the better;) in God's name, he spake peace to them, and a blessing; like that with which the angel blessed Gideon, when he was in a fright, upon a like occasion; (Judg. 6. 22, 23.) Peace be unto thee; fear not, thou shalt not die. Solomon blessed them, that is, he pacified them, and freed them from the consternation they were in. To receive this blessing, they all stood up, in token of reverence, and readiness to hear and accept it. It is a proper posture to be in, when the blessing is pronounced.

2. He informed them concerning this house which he had built, and was now dedicating. He begins his account with a thankful acknowledgment of the good hand of his God upon him hitherto: Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, v. 15. What we have the pleasure of, God must have the praise of. He thus engaged the congregation to lift up their hearts in thanksgivings to God, which would help to still the tumult of spirit which, probably, they were in. "Come," says he, "let God's awful appearances not drive us from him, but draw us to him; Let us bless the Lord God of Israel." Thus Job, under a dark scene, blessed the name of the Lord. Solomon here blessed God, (1.) For his promise which he spake with his mouth to David. (2.) For the performance; that he had now fulfilled it with his hand. We have then the best sense of God's mercies, and most grateful both to ourselves and to our God, when we run up those streams to the fountain of the covenant, and compare what God does with what he has said.

Solomon is now making a solemn surrender or dedication of this house unto God, delivering it to God by his own act and deed. Grants and conveyances commonly begin with recitals of what has been before done, leading to what is now done: accordingly, here is a recital of the special causes and considerations moving Solomon to build this house.

[1.] He recites the want of such a place. It was necessary that this should be premised; for, according to the dispensation they were under, there must be one place, in which they must expect God to record his name. If, therefore, there were any other chosen, this would be usurpation. But he shows, from what God himself had said, that there was no other, (v. 16.) I chose no city to build a house in for my name; therefore there is occasion for the building of this.

[2.] He recites David's purpose to build such a place. God chose the person first that should rule his people, (I chose David, v. 16.) and then put it into his heart to build a house for God's name, v. 17. It was not a project of his own, for the magnifying of himself; but his good father, of blessed memory, laid the first design of it, though he lived not to lay the first stone.

[3.] He recites God's promise concerning himself: God approved his father's purpose; (v. 18.) Thou didst well that it was in thine heart. Note, Sincere intentions to do good shall be graciously approved and accepted of God, though Providence prevent our putting of them in execution. The desire of a man is his kindness. See 2 Cor. 8. 12. God accepted David's good will, yet would not permit him to do the good work, but reserved the honour of it for his son, (v. 19.) He shall build the house to my name; so that what he had done, was not of his own head, nor for his own glory; but the work itself was according to his father's design, and his doing of it was according to God's designation.

[4.] He recites what he himself had done, and with what intention; I have built a house, not for my own name, but for the name of the Lord God of Israel, (v. 20.) and set there a place for the ark, v. 21. Thus all the right, title, interest, claim, and demand, whatsoever, which he or his had, or might have, in or to this house, or any part of its appurtenances, he resigns, surrenders, and gives up, to God for ever. It is for his name, and his ark. In this, says he, the Lord hath performed his word that he spake. Note, Whatever good we do, we must look upon it as the performance of God's promise to us, rather than the performance of our promises to him. The more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him; for our sufficiency is of him, and not of ourselves.

22. And Solomon stood before the altar of the LORD, in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands toward heaven: 23. And he said, LORD God of Israel, there is no god like thee, in heaven above, or on earth beneath, who keepest covenant and mercy with thy servants that walk before thee with all their heart; 24. Who hast kept with thy servant David my father that thou promisedst him: thou spakest also with thy mouth, and hast fulfilled it with thine hand, as it is this day. 25. Therefore now, LORD God of Israel, keep with thy servant David my father that thou promisedst him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in my sight to sit on the throne of Israel; so that thy children take heed to their way, that they walk before me, as thou hast walked before me. 26. And now, O God of Israel, let thy word, I pray thee, be verified, which thou spakest unto thy servant David my father. 27. But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven, and heaven of heavens, cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded! 28. Yet have thou respect unto the prayer of thy servant, and to his supplication, O LORD my God, to hearken unto the cry and to the prayer which thy servant prayeth before thee to-day: 29. That thine eyes may be open toward this house night and day, even toward the place of which thou hast said, My name shall be there; that thou mayest hearken unto the prayer which thy servant shall make toward this place. 30. And hearken thou to the supplication of thy servant, and of thy people Israel when they shall pray toward this place: and hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place:

and when thou hearest, forgive. 31. If any man trespass against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him to cause him to swear, and the oath come before thine altar in this house: 32. Then hear thou in heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, condemning the wicked, to bring his way upon his head; and justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness. 33. When thy people Israel be smitten down before the enemy, because they have sinned against thee, and shall turn again to thee, and confess thy name, and pray, and make supplication unto thee in this house: 34. Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy people Israel, and bring them again unto the land which thou gavest unto their fathers. 35. When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; if they pray toward this place, and confess thy name, and turn from their sin, when thou afflictest them: 36. Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, that thou teach them the good way wherein they should walk, and give rain upon thy land which thou hast given to thy people for an inheritance. 37. If there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or if there be caterpillar; if their enemy besiege them in the land of their cities, whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness, there be; 38. What prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all thy people Israel, which shall know every man the plague of his own heart, and spread forth his hands toward this house: 39. Then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest; (for thou, even thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men;) 40. That they may fear thee all the days that they live in the land which thou gavest unto our fathers. 41. Moreover, concerning a stranger that is not of thy people Israel, but cometh out of a far country for thy name's sake; 42. (For they shall hear of thy great name, and of thy strong hand, and of thy stretched-out arm;) when he shall come and pray toward this house: 43. Hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for; that all people of the earth may know thy name, to fear thee, as do thy people Israel; and that they may know that this house, which I have builded, is called by thy name. 44. If thy people go out to battle against their enemy, whithersoever thou shalt send them, and shall pray unto the LORD toward the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house that I have built for thy name: 45. Then hear thou in heaven their prayer and their supplication, and maintain their cause. 46. If they sin against thee, (for there is no man that sinneth not,) and thou be angry with them, and deliver them to the enemy, so that they carry them away captives unto the land of the enemy, far or near; 47. Yet if they shall bethink themselves in the land whither they were carried captives, and repent, and make supplication unto thee in the land of them that carried them captives, saying, We have sinned, and have done perversely, we have committed wickedness. 48. And so return unto thee with all their heart, and with all their soul, in the land of their enemies which led them away captive, and pray unto thee toward their land which thou gavest unto their fathers, the city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name: 49. Then hear thou their prayer and their supplication in heaven thy dwelling-place, and maintain their cause, 50. And forgive thy people that have sinned against thee, and all their transgressions wherein they have transgressed against thee, and give them compassion before them who carried them captive, that they may have compassion on them: 51. For they be thy people, and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest forth out of Egypt, from the midst of the furnace of iron: 52. That thine eyes may be open unto the supplication of thy servant, and unto the supplication of thy people Israel, to hearken unto them in all that they call for unto thee; 53. For thou didst separate them from among all the people of the earth, to be thine inheritance, as thou spakest by the hand of Moses thy servant, when thou broughtest our fathers out of Egypt, O Lord God.

Solomon having made a general surrender of this house to God, which God had signified his acceptance of by taking possession, next follows Solomon's prayer; in which he makes a more particular declaration of the uses of that surrender, with all humility and reverence, desiring that God would agree thereto. In short, it is his request that this temple might be deemed and taken, not only for a house of sacrifice, (no mention is made of that in all this prayer, that was taken for granted,) but a house of prayer for all people: and herein it was a type of the gospel-church: see Isa. 56. 7. compared with Matth. 21. 13. Therefore Solomon opened this house, not only with an extraordinary sacrifice, but with an extraordinary prayer.

I. The person that prayed this prayer, was great. Solomon did not appoint one of the priests to do it, or one of the prophets, but did it himself, in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, v. 22.

1. It was well that he was able to do it; a sign that ne had made a good improvement of the pious education which his parents gave him. With all his learning, it seems, he learnt to pray well, and knew how to express himself to God in a suitable manner, pro re nata—on the spur of the occasion, without a prescribed form. In the crowd of his philosophical transactions, his proverbs, and songs, he did not forget his devotions. He was a gainer by prayer, (ch. 3. 11, &c.) and, we may suppose, gave himself much to it, so that he excelled, as we find here, in praying gifts. 2. It was well that he was willing to do it, and not shy of performing divine service before so great a congregation: he was far from thinking it any disparagement to him, to be his own chaplain, and the mouth of the assembly to God; and shall any think themselves too great to do this office for their own families? Solomon, in all his other glory, even on his ivory throne, looked not so great as he did now. Great men should thus support the reputation of religious exercises, and so honour God with their greatness. Solomon was herein a type of Christ, the great Intercessor for all over whom he rules.

II. The posture in which he prayed, was very reverent, and expressive of humility, seriousness, and fervency in prayer. He stood before the altar of the Lord; intimating that he expected the success of his prayer in the virtue of that sacrifice which should be offered up in the fulness of time, typified by the sacrifices offered at that altar. But when he addressed himself to prayer, 1. He kneeled down, as appears, v. 54. where he is said to rise from his knees; compare 2 Chron. 6. 13. Kneeling is the most proper posture for prayer, Eph. 3. 14. The greatest of men must not think it below them, to kneel before the Lord their Maker. Mr. Herbert says, "Kneeling never spoiled silk stockings." 2. He spread forth his hands toward heaven; and, as it should seem by v. 54. continued so, to the end of the prayer, hereby expressing his desire toward, and expectations from, God, as a Father in heaven. He spread forth his hands, as it were to offer up the prayer from an open enlarged heart, and to urge it into heaven; and also to receive the mercy thence, with both arms, which he prayed for. Such outward expressions of the fixedness and fervour of devotion, ought not to be despised or ridiculed.

III. The prayer itself was very long, and yet perhaps longer than is here recorded. At the throne of grace, we have liberty of speech, and should use our liberty. It is not making long prayers, but making them for a pretence, that Christ condemns.

In this excellent prayer, Solomon does, as we should in every prayer:

1. He gives glory to God. This he begins with, as the most proper act of adoration. He addresses himself to God as the Lord God of Israel, a God in covenant with them. And, (1.) He gives him the praise of what he is, in general; the best of beings in himself; "There is no God like thee, none of the powers in heaven or earth to be compared with thee;" and the best of masters to his people, "who keepest covenant and mercy with thy servants; not only as good as thy word, in keeping covenant, but better than thy word, in keeping mercy, doing that for them, which thou hast not given them an express promise of, provided they walk before thee with all their heart, are zealous for thee, with an eye to thee." (2.) He gives him thanks for what he had done, in particular, for his family; (v. 24.) Thou hast kept with thy servant David, as with thy other servants, that which thou promisedst him. The promise was a great favour to him, his support and joy, and now, performance is the crown of it: Thou hast fulfilled it, as it is this day. Fresh experiences of the truth of God's promises, call for enlarged praises.

2. He sues for grace and favour from God.

(1.) That God would perform to him and his the mercy which he had promised, v. 25, 26. Observe how this comes in: he thankfully acknowledges the performance of the promise, in part; hitherto, God had been faithful to his word, "Thou hast kept with thy servant David that which thou promisedst him; so far, that his son fills his throne, and has built the intended temple; therefore now keep with thy servant David that which thou hast further promised him, and which yet remains to be fulfilled in its season." Note, The experiences we have of God's performing his promises, should encourage us to depend upon them, and plead them with God: and those who expect further mercies, must be thankful for former mercies. Hitherto, God has helped, 2 Cor. 1. 10. Solomon repeats the promise, (v. 25.) There shall not fail thee a man to sit on the throne, not omitting the condition, so that thy children take heed to their way; for we cannot expect God's performance of the promise, but upon our performance of the condition: and then he humbly begs this entail, (v. 26.) Now, O God of Israel, let thy words be verified. God's promises (as we have often observed) must be both the guide of our desires, and the ground of our hopes and expectations, in prayer. David had prayed, (2 Sam. 7. 25.) Lord, do as thou hast said. Note, Children should learn of their godly parents how to pray, and plead, in prayer.

(2.) That God would have respect to this temple which he had now taken possession of, and that his eyes might be continually open towards it, v. 29. That he would graciously own it, and so put an honour upon it. To this purpose, he premises, [1.] An humble admiration of God's gracious condescension; (v. 27.) "But will God indeed dwell on the earth?" Can we imagine that a Being, infinitely high, and holy, and happy, should stoop so low, as to let it be said of him, that he dwells upon the earth, and blesses the worms of the earth with his presence? The earth, that is corrupt, and overspread with sin! Cursed, and reserved to fire! Lord, how is it?" [2.] An humble acknowledgment of the incapacity of the house he had built, though very capacious, to contain God. The heaven of heavens cannot do that, for no place can include him, who is present in all places; even this house is too little, too mean to be the residence of Him that is infinite in being and glory. Note, When we have done the most we can for God, we must acknowledge the infinite distance and disproportion between us and him, between our services and his perfections.

This premised, he prays, in general, First, That God would graciously hear and answer the prayer he was now praying, v. 28. It was an humble prayer, the prayer of thy servant; an earnest prayer, such a prayer as is a cry; a prayer made in faith, "before thee, as the Lord, and my God; Lord, hearken to it; have respect to it, not as the prayer of Israel's king," (no man's dignity in the world, or titles of honour, will recommend him to God,) "but as the prayer of thy servant." Secondly, That God would, in like manner, hear and answer all the prayers that should, at any time hereafter, be made in or toward this house which he had now built, and of which God had said, My name shall be there; (v. 29.) his own prayers, Hearken to the prayers which thy servant shall make; and the prayers of all Israel, and of every particular Israelite, v. 30. Hear it in heaven, that is indeed thy dwelling-place, of which this is but a figure; and when thou hearest, forgive the sin that separates between them and God, even the iniquity of their holy things. 1. He supposes that God's people would ever be a praying people; he resolves to adhere to that duty himself. 2. He directs them to have an eye, in their prayers, to that place where God was pleased to manifest his glory, so as he did not any where else on earth. None but priests might come into that place; but when they worshipped in the courts of the temple, it must be with an eye toward it; not as the object of their worship, (that were idolatry,) but as an instituted medium of their worship, helping the weakness of their faith, and typifying the mediation of Jesus Christ, who is the true Temple, to whom we must have an eye in every thing wherein we have to do with God. They that were at a distance, looked toward Jerusalem, for the sake of the temple, even when it was in ruins, Dan. 6. 10. 3. He begs that God would hear the prayers, and forgive the sins, of all that look this way in their prayers: not as if he thought all the devout prayers offered up to God by those who had no knowledge of this house, or regard to it, were therefore rejected; but he desired that the sensible tokens of the divine presence with which this house was blessed, might always give sensible encouragement and comfort to believing petitioners.

More particularly, he here puts divers cases in which he supposed application would be made to God by prayer, in or toward this house of prayer.

(1.) If God were appealed to by an oath for the determining of any controverted right between man and man, and the oath were taken before this altar, he prayed that God would, some way or other, discover the truth, and judge between the contending parties, v. 31, 32. He prays that, in difficult matters, this throne of grace might be a throne of judgment, from which God would right the injured that believably appealed to it, and punish the injurious that presumptuously appealed to it. It was usual to swear by the temple and altar, Matth. 23. 16, 18. Which corruption perhaps took its rise from this supposition of an oath taken, not by the temple or altar, but at or near them, for the greater solemnity.

(2.) If the people of Israel were groaning under any national calamity, or any particular Israelite under any personal calamity, he desires that the prayers they should make in or toward this house, might be heard and answered.

[1.] In case of public judgments; war, (v. 33.) want of rain, (v. 35.) famine or pestilence; (v. 37.) and he ends, with any plague or sickness; for no calamity befalls other people, which may not befall God's Israel. Now he supposes, First, That the cause of the judgment would be sin, and nothing else: if they be smitten before the enemy, if there be no rain, it is because they have sinned against thee: that is it that makes all the mischief. Secondly, That the consequence of the judgment would be, that they would cry to God, and make supplication to him, in or toward that house. Those that slighted him before, would solicit him then; Lord, in trouble have they visited thee: In their affliction they will seek me early, and earnestly. Thirdly, That the condition of the removal of the judgment was something more than bare praying for it. He could not, he would not, ask that their prayer might be answered, unless they did also turn from their sin, (v. 35.) and turn again to God; (v. 33.) that is, unless they did truly repent and reform. On no other terms may we look for salvation, in this world or the other. But, if they did thus qualify themselves for mercy, he prays, 1. That God would hear from heaven, his holy temple above, to which they must look, through this temple. 2. That he would forgive their sin; for judgments are then only removed in mercy, when sin is pardoned. 3. That he would teach them the good way wherein they should walk, by his Spirit, with his word and prophets; and thus they might be both profited by their trouble, (for blessed is the man whom God chastens and teaches;) and prepared for deliverance; which then comes in love, when it finds us brought back to the good way of God and duty. 4. That he would then remove the judgment, and redress the grievance, whatever it is; not only accept the prayer, but give in the mercy prayed for.

"If any man of Israel has an errand to thee, here let him find thee, here let him find favour with thee." He does not mention particulars; so numerous, so various, are the grievances of the children of men: First, He supposes that the complainants themselves would very sensibly feel from their own burthen, and would open that case to God, which otherwise they kept to themselves, and did not make any man acquainted with. They shall know every man the plague of his own heart, what it is that pains him; and shall spread their hands, that is, spread their case, as Hezekiah spread the letter, in prayer, toward this house; whether the trouble be of body or mind, they shall represent it before God. Inward burthens seem especially meant; sin is the plague of our own heart, our indwelling corruptions are our spiritual diseases: every Israelite indeed endeavours to know these, that he may mortify them, and watch against the risings of them. These he complains of, this is the burthen he groans under; O wretched man that I am! These drive him to his knees, drive him to the sanctuary; lamenting these, he spreads forth his hands in prayer. Secondly, He refers all cases of this kind, that should be brought hither, to God. 1. To his omniscience; "Thou, even thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men, not only the plagues of their hearts, their several wants and burthens," (these he knows, but he will know them from us,) "but the desire and intent of the heart, the sincerity or hypocrisy of it. Thou knowest which prayer comes from the heart, and which from the lips only." The hearts of kings are not unsearchable to God. 2. To his justice; Give to every man according to his ways; and he will not fail to do so, by the rules of grace, not the law, for then we are all undone. 3. To his mercy; Hear, and forgive, and do, (v. 39.) that they may fear thee all their days, v. 40. This use we should make of the mercy of God to us in hearing our prayers, and forgiving our sins, we should thereby be engaged to fear him while we live: Fear the Lord and his goodness; there is forgiveness with him, that he may be feared.

[3.] The case of the stranger that is not an Israelite, is next mentioned; a proselyte that comes to the temple to pray to the God of Israel, being convinced of the folly and wickedness of worshipping the gods of his country. First, He supposes that there would be many such; (v. 41, 42.) that the fame of God's great works which he had wrought for Israel, by which he proved himself to be above all gods, nay, to be God alone, would reach to distant countries; they that live remote, shall hear of thy strong hand, and thy stretched-out arm; and this will bring all thinking considerate people to pray toward this house, that they may obtain the favour of a God that is able to do them a real kindness. Secondly, He begs that God would accept and answer the proselyte's prayer; (v. 43.) Do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for. Thus early, thus ancient, were the indications of favour toward the sinners of the Gentiles; as there was then one law for the native and for the stranger, (Exod. 12. 49.) so there was one gospel for both. Thirdly, Herein, he aims at the glory of God, and the propagating of the knowledge of him. "O let the stranger, in a special manner, speed well in his address, that he may carry away with him to his own country a good report of the God of Israel; that all people may know thee and fear thee, (and, if they know thee aright, they will fear thee,) as do thou people Israel." So far is Solomon from monopolizing the knowledge and service of God, and wishing to have them confined to Israel only, (which was the envious desire of the Jews in the days of Christ and his apostles,) that he prays that all people might fear God as Israel did. Would to God, that all the children of men might receive the adoption, and be made God's children. Father, thus glorify thy name.

[4.] The case of an army going forth to battle, is next recommended by Solomon to the divine favour. It is supposed that the army is encamped at a distance, somewhere a great way off, sent by divine order against the enemy, v. 44. "When they are ready to engage, and consider the perils and doubtful issues of battle, and put up a prayer to God for protection and success, with their eye toward this city and temple, then hear their prayer, encourage their hearts, strengthen their hands, cover their heads, and so maintain their cause, and give them victory." Soldiers in the field must not think it enough that they who tarry at home, pray for them, but must pray for themselves, and they are here encouraged to hope for a gracious answer. Praying should always go along with fighting.

[5.] The case of poor captives, is the last that is here mentioned, as a proper object of divine compassion. First, He supposes that Israel would sin. He knew them, and himself, and the nature of man, too well to think this a foreign supposition; for there is no man that sinneth not, that does not enough to justify God in the severest rebukes of his providence; no man but what is in danger of falling into gross sin, and will, if God leave him to himself. Secondly, He supposes what may well be expected, if Israel revolt from God, that God will be angry with them, and deliver them into the hand of their enemies, to be carried captive into a strange country, v. 46. Thirdly, He then supposes that they will bethink themselves, will consider their ways; for afflictions put men upon consideration; and when once they are brought to consider, they will repent and pray, will confess their sins, and humble themselves, saying, We have sinned, and have done perversely; (v. 47.) and will return to God in the land of their enemies, whom they had forsaken in their own land. Fourthly, He supposes that in their prayers they will look toward their own land, the holy land, Jerusalem the holy city, and the temple the holy house, and directs them so to do, (v. 48.) for his sake, who gave them that land, chose that city, and to whose honour that house was built. Fifthly, He prays that then God would hear their prayers, forgive their sins, plead their cause, and incline their enemies to have compassion on them, v. 49, 50. God has all hearts in his hand, and can, when he pleases, turn the strongest stream the contrary way, and make those to pity his people, who have been their most cruel persecutors. See this prayer answered, Ps. 106. 46. He made them to be pitied of all those that carried them captive, which, if it did not enlarge them, yet eased their captivity. Sixthly, He pleads their relation to God, and his interest in them; "They are thy people, whom thou hast taken into thy covenant, and under thy care and conduct; thine inheritance, from which, more than from any other nation, thy rent and tribute of glory issue and arise; (v. 51.) separated from among all people to be so, and by distinguishing favours appropriated to thee," v. 53.

Lastly, After all these particulars, he concludes with this general request, that God would hearken to all his praying people in all that they call unto him for, v. 52. No place, now under the gospel, can be imagined to add any acceptableness to the prayers made in or toward it, as the temple then did; that was a shadow, the substance is Christ; whatever we ask in his name, it shall be given us.

54. And it was so, that when Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer and supplication unto the LORD, he arose from before the altar of the LORD, from kneeling on his knees with his hands spread up to heaven. 55. And he stood, and blessed all the congregation of Israel with a loud voice, saying, 56. Blessed be the LORD, that hath given rest unto his people Israel, according to all that he promised: there hath not failed one word of all his good promise, which he promised by the hand of Moses his servant. 57. The LORD our God be with us, as he was with our fathers: let him not leave us, nor forsake us; 58. That he may incline our hearts unto him, to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, which he commanded our fathers. 59. And let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the LORD, be nigh unto the LORD our God day and night, that he maintain the cause of his servant, and the cause of his people Israel at all times, as the matter shall require; 60. That all the people of the earth may know that the LORD is God, and that there is none else. 61. Let your heart, therefore, be perfect with the LORD your God, to walk in his statutes, and to keep his commandments, as at this day.

Solomon, after his sermon in Ecclesiastes, gives us the conclusion of the whole matter; so he does here, after this long prayer; it is called his blessing of the people, v. 55. He pronounced it standing, that he might be the better heard, and because he blessed as one having authority; never were words more fully spoken, or more pertinently; never was congregation dismissed with that which was more likely to affect them and abide with them.

I. He gives God the glory of the great and kind things he had done for Israel, v. 56. He stood up to bless the congregation, (v. 55.) but begins with blessing God, for we must, in every thing, give thanks. Do we expect God should do well for us and our's? Let us take all occasions to speak well of him and his. He blesses God who has given, he does not say wealth, and honour, and power, and victory, to Israel; but rest, as if that were a blessing more valuable than any of those: let not those who have rest, undervalue that blessing then, though they want some other. He compares the blessings God had bestowed upon them, with the promises he had given them, that God might have the honour of his faithfulness, and the truth of that word of his, which he has magnified above all his name. 1. He refers to the promises given by the hand of Moses, as he did (v. 15, 24.) to those which were made to David; there were promises given by Moses, as well as precepts: it was long ere God gave Israel the promised rest, but they had it at last, after many trials; the day will come, when God's spiritual Israel will rest from all their labours. 2. He does, as it were, write a receipt in full on the back of these bonds, There has not failed one word of all his good promises; this discharge he gives in the name of all Israel, to the everlasting honour of the divine faithfulness, and the everlasting encouragement of all those that build upon the divine promises.

II. He blesses himself and the congregation, expressing his earnest desire and hope of these four things. 1. The presence of God with them, that is all in all to the happiness of a church and nation, and of every particular person. This great congregation was now shortly to scatter, and it was not likely that they would ever be all together again in this world; Solomon therefore dismisses them with this blessing, The Lord be present with us, and that will be comfort enough, when we are absent from each other; the Lord our God be with us, as he was with our fathers; (v. 57.) let him not leave us, let him be to us to-day, and to our's for ever, what he was to those that went before us." 2. The power of his grace upon them; "Let him be with us, and continue with us, not that he may enlarge our coasts, and increase our wealth, but that he may incline our hearts to himself, to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments," v. 58. Spiritual blessings are the best blessings, which we should covet earnestly, to be blessed with: our hearts are naturally averse to our duty, and apt to decline from God; it is his grace that inclines them, grace that must be obtained by prayer. 3. An answer to the prayer he had now made, "Let these my words be nigh unto the Lord our God day and night, v. 59. Let a gracious return be made to every prayer that shall be made here, and that will be a continual answer to this prayer." What Solomon here asks for his prayer, is still granted in the intercession of Christ, which his supplication was a type of; that powerful prevailing intercession is before the Lord our God day and night, for our great Advocate attends continually to this very thing, and we may depend upon him to maintain our cause, (against the adversary that accuses us day and night, Rev. 12. 10.) and the common cause of his people Israel, at all times, upon all occasions, as the matter shall require, so as to speak for us the word of the day in its day, as the original here reads it, from which we shall receive grace sufficient, suitable, and seasonable, in every time of need. 4. The glorifying of God in the enlargement of his kingdom among men. Let Israel be thus blessed, thus favoured; not that all people may become tributaries to us, (Solomon sees his kingdom as great as he desires,) but that all people may know that the Lord is God, and he only, and may come and worship him, v. 60. With this Solomon's prayers, like the prayers of his father, David the son of Jesse, are ended; (Ps. 72. 19, 20.) Let the whole earth be filled with his glory: we cannot close our prayers with a better summary than this, Father, glorify thy name.

III. He solemnly charges his people to continue and persevere in their duty to God; having spoken to God for them, he here speaks from God to them, and those only would fare the better for his prayers that were made better by his preaching; his admonition, at parting, is, "Let your heart be perfect with the Lord our God; (v. 61.) let your obedience be universal without dividing, upright without dissembling, and constant without declining;" this is evangelical perfection.

62. And the king, and all Israel with him, offered sacrifice before the LORD. 63. And Solomon offered a sacrifice of peace-offerings, which he offered unto the LORD, two and twenty thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep. So the king and all the children of Israel dedicated the house of the LORD. 64. The same day did the king hallow the middle of the court that was before the house of the LORD: for there he offered burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings; because the brazen altar that was before the LORD was too little to receive the burnt-offerings and meat-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings. 65. And at that time Solomon held a feast, and all Israel with him, a great congregation, from the entering in of Hamath unto the river of Egypt, before the LORD our God, seven days and seven days, even fourteen days. 66. On the eighth day he sent the people away: and they blessed the king, and went unto their tents joyful and glad of heart, for all the goodness that the LORD had done for David his servant, and for Israel his people.

We read before, that Judah and Israel were eating and drinking, and very cheerful, under their own vines and fig-trees; here we have them so in God's courts; now they found Solomon's words true concerning Wisdom's ways, that they are ways of pleasantness.

1. They had abundant joy and satisfaction, while they attended at God's house, for there, (1.) Solomon offered a great sacrifice, 22,000 oxen, and 120,000 sheep, enough to have drained the country of cattle, if it had not been a very fruitful land. The heathen thought themselves very generous when they offered sacrifices by hundreds, (hecatombs they called them,) but Solomon outdid them, he offered them by thousands. When Moses dedicated his altar, the peace-offerings were twenty-four bullocks; rams, goats, and lambs, 180; (Numb. 7. 88.) then the people were poor, but now that they were increased in wealth, more was expected from them; where God sows plentifully, he must reap accordingly. All these sacrifices could not be offered in one day, but in the several days of the feast; thirty oxen a day served Solomon's table, but thousands shall go to God's altar; few are thus minded, to spend more on their souls than on their bodies. The flesh of the peace-offerings which belonged to the offerer, it is likely, Solomon treated the people with; Christ fed those who attended him. The brazen altar was not large enough to receive all these sacrifices, so that, to serve the present occasion, they were forced to offer many of them in the middle of the court, v. 64. Some think, on altars, altars of earth or stone, erected for the purpose, and taken down when the solemnity was over; others think, on the bare ground: they that will be generous in serving God, need not stint themselves for want of room and occasion to be so. (2.) He kept a feast, the feast of tabernacles, as it should seem, after the feast of dedication, and both together lasted fourteen days; (v. 65.) yet they said not, Behold, what a weariness is it!

2. They carried this joy and satisfaction with them to their own houses. When they were dismissed, they blessed the king, (v. 66.) applauded him, admired him, and returned him the thanks of the congregation, and then went to their tents, joyful and glad of heart, all easy and pleased; God's goodness was the matter of their joy, so it should be of our's at all times; they rejoiced in God's blessing, both on the royal family and on the kingdom; thus should we go home, rejoicing, from holy ordinances, and go on our way, rejoicing for God's goodness to our Lord Jesus, (of whom David his servant was a type,) in the advancement and establishment of his throne, pursuant to the covenant of redemption, and to all believers, his spiritual Israel, in their sanctification and consolation, pursuant to the covenant of grace; if we rejoice not herein always, it is our own fault.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter, we have, I. The answer which God, in a vision, gave to Solomon's prayer, and the terms he settled with him, v. 1. . 9. II. The interchanging of grateful kindnesses between Solomon and Hiram, v. 10. . 14. III. His workmen and buildings, v. 15. . 24. IV. His devotion, v. 25. V. His trading navy, v. 26. . 28.

1. AND it came to pass, when Solomon had finished the building of the house of the LORD, and the king's house, and all Solomon's desire which he was pleased to do, 2. That the LORD appeared to Solomon the second time, as he had appeared unto him at Gibeon. 3. And the LORD said unto him, I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication that thou hast made before me: I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever; and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually. 4. And if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart, and in uprightness, to do according to all that I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments; 5. Then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever, as I promised to David thy father, saying, There shall not fail thee a man upon the throne of Israel. 6. But if you shall at all turn from following me, you or your children, and will not keep my commandments and my statutes which I have set before you, but go and serve other gods, and worship them; 7. Then will I cut off Israel out of the land which I have given them: and this house, which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight; and Israel shall be a proverb and a by-word among all people: 8. And at this house, which is high, every one that passeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss; and they shall say, Why hath the LORD done thus unto this land, and to this house? 9. And they shall answer, Because they forsook the LORD their God, who brought forth their fathers out of the land of Egypt, and have taken hold upon other gods, and have worshipped them, and served them: therefore hath the LORD brought upon them all this evil.

God had given a real answer to Solomon's prayer, and tokens of his acceptance of it immediately, by the fire from heaven which consumed the sacrifices; (as we find, 2 Chron. 7. 1.) but here we have a more express and distinct answer to it. Observe,

I. In what way God gave him this answer; he appeared to him, as he had done at Gibeon, in the beginning of his reign, in a dream or vision, v. 2. The comparing of it with that, intimates that it was the very night after he had finished the solemnities of his festival, for so that was, 2 Chron. 1. 6, 7. And then v. 1. speaking of Solomon's finishing all his buildings, which was not till many years after the dedication of the temple, must be read thus, Solomon finished; (as it is 2 Chron. 7. 11.) and v. 2. must be read, and the Lord had appeared.

II. The purport of this prayer.

1. He assures him of his special presence in the temple he had built, in answer to the prayer he had made; (v. 3.) I have hallowed this house. Solomon had dedicated it, but it was God's prerogative to hallow it, to sanctify or consecrate it; men cannot make a place holy, yet what we, in sincerity, devote to God, we may hope he will graciously accept of, as his; and his eyes and his heart shall be upon it. Apply it to persons, the living temples; those whom God hallows or sanctifies, whom he sets apart for himself, have his eye, his heart, his love and care, and this, perpetually.

2. He shows him that he and his people were, for the future, upon their good behaviour; let them not be secure now, as if they might live as they please, now that they have the temple of the Lord among them, Jer. 7. 4. No, this house was designed to protect them in their allegiance to God, but not in their rebellion or disobedience: God deals plainly with us, sets before us good and evil, the blessing and the curse, and lets us know what we must trust to. God here tells Solomon,

(1.) That the establishment of his kingdom depended upon the constancy of his obedience; (v. 4, 5.) "If thou wilt walk before me as David did, who left thee a good example, and encouragement enough to follow it, (an advantage thou wilt be accountable for, if thou do not improve it,) if thou wilt walk as he did, in integrity of heart and uprightness," (for that is the main matter, no religion but sincerity,) "then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom, and not otherwise;" for on that condition the promise was made, Ps. 132. 12. If we perform our part of the covenant, God will not fail to perform his; if we improve the grace God has given us, he will confirm us to the end. Let not the children of godly parents expect the entail of the blessing, unless they tread in the steps of those that are gone before them to heaven, and keep up the virtue and piety of their ancestors.

(2.) That the ruin of his kingdom would be the certain consequence of his or his children's apostasy from God; (v. 6.) "But know thou, and let thy family and kingdom know it, and be admonished by it, that if you shall altogether turn from following me," (so it is thought it should be read,) "if you forsake my service, desert mine altar, and go and serve other gods," (for that was the covenant-breaking sin,) "if you or your children break off from me, this house will not save you." But, [1.] Israel, though a holy nation, will be cut off, (v. 7.) by one judgment after another, till they become a proverb and a by-word, and the most despicable people under the sun, though now the most honourable: this supposes the destruction of the royal family, though it is not particularly threatened; the king is, of course, undone, if the kingdom be. [2.] The temple, though a holy house, which God himself had hallowed for his name, should be abandoned and laid desolate, v. 8, 9. This house which is high; they prided themselves in the stateliness and magnificence of the structure, but let them know that it is not so high as to be out of the reach of God's judgments, if they vilify it so as to exchange it for groves and idol-temples, and yet, at the same time, magnify it so as to think it secures the favour of God to them, though they ever so much corrupt themselves. This house which is high; they that now pass by it.

are astonished at the bulk and beauty of it; the richness, contrivance, and workmanship, are admired by all spectators, and it is called a stupendous fabric; but if you forsake God, its height will make its fall the more amazing, and they that pass by will be as much astonished at its ruins, while the guilty, self-condemned, self-condemned, Israelites, will be forced to acknowledge, with shame, that they themselves were the ruin of it; for when it shall be asked, Why hath the Lord done thus to this house? they cannot but answer, It was because they forsook the Lord their God. See Deut. 29. 24, 25. Their sin will be read in their punishment, they deserted the temple, and therefore God deserted it; they profaned it with their sins, and laid it common, and therefore God profaned it with his judgments, and laid it waste: God gave Solomon fair warning of this, now that he had newly built and dedicated it, that he and his people might not be high-minded, but fear.

10. And it came to pass at the end of twenty years, when Solomon had built the two houses, the house of the LORD, and the king's house, 11. (Now Hiram the king of Tyre had furnished Solomon with cedar-trees, and fir-trees, and with gold, according to all his desire,) that then Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities in the land of Galilee. 12. And Hiram came out from Tyre to see the cities which Solomon had given him; and they pleased him not. 13. And he said, What cities are these which thou hast given me, my brother? And he called them the land of Cabul unto this day. 14. And Hiram sent to the king sixscore talents of gold.

What agreement was made between Solomon and Hiram, when the building-work was to be begun, we read before, ch. 5. Here we have an account of their fair and friendly parting, when the work was done.

1. Hiram made good his bargain to the utmost; he had furnished Solomon with materials for his buildings, according to all his desire, (v. 11.) and with gold, v. 14. So far was he from envying Solomon's growing greatness and reputation, and being jealous of him, that he helped to magnify him; Solomon's power, with Solomon's wisdom, needs not to be dreaded by any of his neighbours; God honours him, therefore Hiram will.

2. Solomon, no doubt, made good his bargain, and gave Hiram food for his household, as was agreed, ch. 5. 9. But here we are told that, over and above that, he gave him twenty cities, (small ones we may suppose, like those mentioned here, v. 19.) in the land of Galilee, v. 11. It should seem, these were not allotted to any of the tribes of Israel, (for the border of Asher came up to them, Josh. 19. 27. which intimates that it did not include them,) but continued in the hands of the natives, till Solomon made himself master of them, and then made a present of them to Hiram; it becomes those that are great and good, to be generous. Hiram came to see these cities, and did not like them; (v. 12.) They pleased him not. He called the country the land of Cabul, a Phenician word, (says Josephus,) which signifies displeasing; v. 13. He therefore returned them back to Solomon, (as we find, 2 Chron. 8. 2.) who repaired them, and then caused the children of Israel to inhabit them; which intimates that, before, they did not; but when Solomon received back what he had given, no doubt, he honourably gave Hiram an equivalent in something else. But what shall we think of this? Did Solomon act meanly, in giving Hiram what was not worth his acceptance? Or, was Hiram humour-some, and hard to please? I am willing to believe otherwise: the country was truly valuable, and the cities in it, but not agreeable to Hiram's genius; the Tyrians were merchants, trading men, that lived in fine houses, and became rich by navigation, but knew not how to value a country that was fit for corn and pasture, that was business that lay out of their way; and therefore Hiram desired Solomon to take them again, he knew not what to do with them, and if he would please to gratify him, let it be in his own element, by becoming his partner in trade, as we find he did, v. 27. Hiram, that was used to the clean streets of Tyre, could by no means agree with the miry lanes in the land of Cabul, whereas the best lands have commonly the worst roads through them: see how the providence of God suits both the accommodation of this earth to the various dispositions of men, and the dispositions of men to the various accommodations of the earth, and all for the good of mankind in general; some take delight in husbandry, and wonder what pleasure sailors can take on a rough sea; others take as much delight in navigation, and wonder what pleasure husbandmen can take in a dirty country, like the land of Cabul; it is so in many other instances, in which we may observe the wisdom of Him whose all souls are, and all lands.

15. And this is the reason of the levy which king Solomon raised, For to build the house of the LORD, and his own house and Millo, and the wall of Jerusalem, and Hazor, and Megiddo, and Gezer. 16. For Pharaoh king of Egypt had gone up and taken Gezer, and burnt it with fire, and slain the Canaanites that dwelt in the city, and given it for a present unto his daughter, Solomon's wife. 17. And Solomon built Gezer, and Beth-horon the nether, 18. And Baalath, and Tadmor in the wilderness, in the land, 19. And all the cities of store that Solomon had, and cities for his chariots, and cities for his horsemen, and that which Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem, and in Lebanon, and in all the land of his dominion. 20. And all the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, which were not of the children of Israel, 21. Their children that were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel also were not able utterly to destroy, upon those did Solomon levy a tribute of bond-service unto this day. 22. But of the children of Israel did Solomon make no bondmen: but they were men of war, and his servants, and his princes, and his captains, and rulers of his chariots, and his horsemen. 23. These were the chief of the officers that were over Solomon's work, five hundred and fifty, which bare rule over the people that wrought in the work. 24. But Pharaoh's daughter came up out of the city of David unto her house which Solomon had built for her: then did he build Millo. 25. And three times in a year did Solomon offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon the altar which he built unto the LORD, and he burnt incense upon the altar that was before the LORD. So he finished the house. 26. And king Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-geber, which is beside Eloth, on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom. 27. And Hiram sent in the navy his servants, ship-men that had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon. 28. And they came to Ophir, and fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to king Solomon.

We have here a further account of Solomon's greatness:

I. His buildings. He raised a great levy both of men and money, because he projected a great deal of building, which would both employ many hands, and put him to a vast expense, v. 15. And he was a wise builder, who sat down first, and counted the cost, and would not begin to build, till he found himself able to finish. Perhaps there was some complaint of the heaviness of the taxes, which the historian excuses from the greatness of his undertakings; he raised it not for war, (as other princes,) which would spend the blood of his subjects, but for building, which would require only their labour and purses. Perhaps David observed Solomon's genius to lie toward building, and foresaw he would have his head and hands full of it, when he penned that song of degrees for Solomon, which begins, Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it; (Ps. 127. 1.) directing him to acknowledge God in all his ways, and, by prayer, and faith in his providence, to take him along with him in all his designs of this kind. And Solomon verily began his work at the right end, for he built God's house first, and finished that before he began his own; and then God blessed him, and he prospered in all his other buildings: if we begin with God, he will go on with us; let the first-fruits be his, and the after-fruits will the more comfortably be our's, Matth. 6. 33. Solomon built a church first, and then he was enabled to build houses, and cities, and walls. Those consult not their own interest, that defer to the last what they design for pious uses.

The further order in Solomon's buildings is observable: God's house first, for religion; then his own, for his own convenience; then a house for his wife, to which she removed, as soon as it was ready for her; (v. 24.) then Millo, the Town-house, or Guild-hall; then the wall of Jerusalem, the royal city; then some cities of note and strength in the country, which were decayed and unfortified, Hazor, Megiddo, &c. As he rebuilt these at his own charge, the inhabitants would be not only his subjects, but his tenants, which would increase the revenues of the crown for the benefit of his successors; among the rest, he built Gezer, which Pharaoh took out of the hands of the Canaanites, and made a present of to his daughter, Solomon's wife, v. 16. See how God maketh the earth to help the woman; Solomon was not himself a warlike prince, but the king of Egypt that was, took cities for him to build; then he built cities for convenience, for store, for his chariots, and for his horsemen, v. 19. And, lastly, he built for pleasure in Lebanon, for his hunting perhaps, or other diversions there; let piety begin, and profit proceed, and leave pleasure to the last.

2. His workmen and servants. In doing such great works, he must needs employ abundance of workmen. The honour of great men is borrowed from their inferiors, who do that which they have the credit of.

1. Solomon employed those which remained of the conquered and devoted nations, in all the slavish work, v. 20, 21. We may suppose that they renounced their idolatry, and submitted to Solomon's government, so that he could not, in honour, utterly destroy them, and they were so poor, that he could not levy money on them, therefore he served himself of their labour. Herein he observed God's law, (Lev. 25. 44.) Thy bondmen shall be of the heathen; and fulfilled Noah's curse upon Canaan, A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren, Gen. 9. 25.

2. He employed Israelites in the more creditable services, v. 22, 23. Of them he made no bondmen, for they were God's freemen; but he made them soldiers and courtiers, and gave them offices, as he saw them qualified, among his chariots and horsemen, appointing some to support the service of the inferior labourers. Thus he preserved the dignity and liberty of Israel, and honoured their relation to God as a kingdom of priests.

III. His piety and devotion; (v. 25.) Three times in a year, he offered burnt-offerings extraordinary: namely, at the three yearly feasts, the passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, in honour of the divine institution; beside what he offered at other times, both statedly, and upon special occasions. With his sacrifices he burnt incense, not himself, (that was king Uzziah's crime,) but the priest for him, at his charge, and for his particular use. It is said, He offered on the altar which he himself built. He took care to build it, and then, 1. He himself made use of it. Many will assist the devotions of others, that neglect their own. Solomon did not think his building an altar would excuse him from sacrificing, but rather engage him the more to it. 2. He himself had the benefit and comfort of it. Whatever pains we take, for the support of religion, to the glory of God, and the edification of others, we ourselves are likely to have the advantage of it.

IV. His merchandise. He built a fleet of trading ships, at Ezion-geber, (v. 26.) a port on the coast of the Red-sea, the furthest stage of the Israelites, when they wandered in the wilderness, Numb. 33. 35. That wilderness, probably, now began to be peopled by the Edomites, which it was not then. To them this port had belonged, but David having subdued the Edomites, it now pertained to the crown of Judah. The fleet traded to Ophir in the East Indies; supposed to be that which is now called Ceylon. Gold was the commodity traded for: substantial wealth. It should seem, Solomon had, before, been Hiram's partner, or put a venture into his ships, which made him a rich return of 120 talents, (v. 14.) that encouraged him to build a fleet of his own. The success of others, in any employment, should quicken our industry; for in all labour there is profit. Solomon sent his own servants for factors, and merchants, and super-cargoes, but hired Tyrians for sailors, for they had knowledge of the sea, v. 27. Thus one nation needs another; Providence so ordering it, that there may be mutual commerce and assistance: for not only as christians, but as men, we are members one of another. The fleet brought home to Solomon 420 talents of gold, v. 28. Canaan, the holy land, the glory of all lands, had no gold in it: which teaches us that that part of the wealth of this world, which is for hoarding and trading, is not the best part of it, but that which is more immediately for the present support and comfort of life, our own and others; such were the productions of Canaan. Solomon got much by his merchandise, but, it should seem, David got much more by his conquests; what was Solomon's four hundred and twenty talents, to David's hundred thousand talents of gold? 1 Chron. 22. 14.—29. 4. Solomon got much by his merchandise, and yet has directed us to a better trade, within reach of the poorest, having assured us, from his own experience of both, that the merchandise of Wisdom is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold, Prov. 3. 14.

CHAP. X.

Still Solomon looks great, and every thing in this chapter adds to his magnificence. We read nothing indeed of his charity, of no hospitals he built, or alms-houses; he made his kingdom so rich, that it did not need them; yet, no question, many poor were relieved from the abundance of his table. A church he had built, never to be equalled; schools or colleges he need not build any, his own palace is an academy, and his court a rendezvous of wise and learned men, as well as the centre of all the circulating riches of that part of the world. I. What abundance of wisdom there was there, appears from the application the queen of Sheba made to him, and the great satisfaction she had in her entertainment there, (v. 1..13.) and others likewise, v. 24. II. What abundance of wealth there was there, appears here by the gold imported, with other things, yearly, (v. 14, 15.) and in a triennial return, v. 22. Gold presented, (v. 25.) and gold used in targets and shields, (v. 16, 17.) and vessels, v. 21. A stately throne made, v. 18..20. His chariots and horsemen, v. 26. His trade with Egypt, (v. 28, 29.) and the great plenty of silver and cedars among his people, v. 27. So that, putting all together, it must be owned, as it is here said, (v. 23.) that king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches; and for wisdom. Yet what was he to the King of kings? Where Christ is, by his word and Spirit, behold, a greater than Solomon is there.

1. AND when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon, concerning the name of the LORD, she came to prove him with hard questions. 2. And she came to Jerusalem with a very great train, with camels that bare spices, and very much gold, and precious stones: and when she was come to Solomon, she communed with him of all that was in her heart. 3. And Solomon told her all her questions: there was not any thing hid from the king, which he told her not. 4. And when the queen of Sheba had seen all Solomon's wisdom, and the house that he had built, 5. And the meat of his table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel, and his cup-bearers, and his ascent by which he went up unto the house of the LORD; there was no more spirit in her. 6. And she said to the king, It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts and of thy wisdom. 7. Howbeit I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen it; and, behold, the half was not told me: thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard. 8. Happy are thy men, happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and that hear thy wisdom. 9. Blessed be the LORD thy God, which delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel: because the LORD loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee king, to do judgment and justice. 10. And she gave the king a hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of spices very great store, and precious stones: there came no more such abundance of spices as these which the queen of Sheba gave to king Solomon. 11. And the navy also of Hiram, that brought gold from Ophir, brought in from Ophir great plenty of almug-trees, and precious stones. 12. And the king made of the almug-trees pillars for the house of the LORD, and for the king's house, harps also and psalteries for singers: there came no such almug-trees, nor were seen unto this day. 13. And king Solomon gave unto the queen of Sheba all her desire, whatsoever she asked, besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty; so she turned, and went to her own country, she and her servants.

We have here an account of the visit which the queen of Sheba made to Solomon, no doubt, when he was in the height of his piety and prosperity. Our Saviour calls her the queen of the South, for Sheba lay south from Canaan. The common opinion is, that it was in Africa; and the christians in Ethiopia, to this day, are confident that she came from their country, and that Candace was her successor, who is mentioned Acts 8. 27. But it is more probable that she came from the south part of Arabia the Happy. It should seem, she was a queen-regent, sovereign of her country. Many a kingdom had been prevented of its greatest blessings, if a Salique law had been admitted into its constitution. Observe,

I. On what errand the queen of Sheba came; not to treat of trade or commerce, to adjust the limits of their dominions, to court his alliance for their mutual strength, or his assistance against some common enemy, which are the common occasions of the congress of crowned heads, and their interviews: but she came, 1. To satisfy her curiosity; for she had heard of his fame, especially for wisdom, and she came to prove him, whether he was so great a man as he was reported to be, v. 1. Solomon's fleet sailed near the coast of her country, and, probably, might put in there for fresh water: perhaps it was thus that she heard of the fame of Solomon, that he excelled in wisdom all the children of the east, and nothing would serve her, but she would go herself, and know the truth of it. 2. To receive instruction from him; she came to hear his wisdom, and thereby to improve her own, (Matth. 12. 42.) that she might be the better able to govern her own kingdom by his maxims of policy. Those whom God has called to any public employment, particularly in the magistracy and ministry, should by all means possible, be still improving themselves in that knowledge which will more and more qualify them for it, and enable them to discharge their trust well. But, it should seem, that which she chiefly aimed at, was, to be instructed in the things of God; she was religiously inclined, and had heard not only of the fame of Solomon, but concerning the name of the Lord, (v. 1.) the great name of that God whom Solomon worshipped, and from whom he received his wisdom, and with this God she desired to be better acquainted. Therefore does our Saviour mention her inquiries after God, by Solomon, as an aggravation of the stupidity of those who inquire not after God, by our Lord Jesus Christ, though He, having lain in his bosom, was much better able to instruct them.

II. With what equipage she came; with a very great retinue, agreeable to her rank, intending to try Solomon's wealth and generosity, as well as his wisdom, what entertainment he could, and would, give to a royal visitant, v. 2. Yet she came not as one begging, but brought enough to bear her charges, and abundantly to recompense Solomon for his attention to her; nothing mean or common, but gold, and precious stones, and spices, because she came to trade for wisdom, which she would purchase at any rate.

III. What entertainment Solomon gave her; he despised not the weakness of her sex, blamed her not for leaving her own business at home, to come so long a journey, and put herself and him to so much trouble and expense, merely to satisfy her curiosity; but bid her welcome, and all her train; gave her liberty to put all her questions, though some perhaps were frivolous, some captious, and some over-curious; he allowed her to commune with him of all that was in her heart, (v. 2.) and gave her a satisfactory answer to all her questions, (v. 3.) whether natural, moral, political, or divine. Were they designed to try him? He gave them such turns as abundantly satisfied her of his uncommon knowledge. Were they designed for her own instruction? (as we suppose most of them were,) She received abundant instruction from him, and he made things surprisingly easy, which she apprehended insuperably difficult, and satisfied her that there was a divine sentence in the lips of this king. But he informed her, no doubt, with particular care, concerning God, and his law and instituted worship. He had taken it for granted, (ch. 8. 42.) that strangers would hear of his great name, and would come thither to inquire after him; and now that so great a stranger came, we may be sure he was not wanting to assist and encourage her inquiries, and give her a description of the temple, and the officers and services of it, that she might be persuaded to serve the Lord whom she now sought.

IV. How she was affected with what she saw and heard in Solomon's court. Divers things are here mentioned which she admired; the buildings and furniture of his palace; the provision that was made every day for his table. When she saw that, perhaps she wondered where were mouths for all that meat; but when she saw the multitude of his attendants and guests, she was as ready to wonder where was the meat for all those mouths. The orderly sitting of his servants, every one in his place, and the ready attendance of his ministers, without any confusion, their rich liveries, and the propriety with which his cup-bearers waited at table, these things she admired, as adding much to his magnificence. But above all these, the first thing mentioned, is, his wisdom, (v. 4.) of the transcendency of which she had now incontestable proof; and the last thing mentioned, which crowned all, is, his piety, the ascent by which he went up to the house of the Lord, with what gravity and seriousness, and an air of devotion in his countenance, he appeared, when he went to the temple, to worship God; with as much humility then, as majesty at other times. Many of the ancient versions read it, The burnt-offerings which he offered in the house of the Lord: she observed with what a generous bounty he brought his sacrifices, and with what a pious fervour he attended the offering of them; never did she see so much goodness with so much greatness. Every thing was so surprising, that there was no more spirit in her, but she stood amazed; she had never seen the like.

V. How she expressed herself upon this occasion.

1. She owned her expectation far outdone, though it was highly raised by the report she had heard, v. 6, 7. She is far from repenting her journey, or calling herself a fool, for undertaking it, but acknowledges it was well worth her while to come so far, for the sight of that which she could not believe the report of. Usually, things are represented to us, both by common fame and by our own imagination much greater than we find them when we come to examine them; but here the truth exceeded both fame and fancy. Those who, through grace, are brought to experience the delights of communion with God, will say that the one half was not told them of the pleasures of Wisdom's ways, and the advantages of her gates. Glorified saints, much more, will say that it was a true report which they hear of the happiness of heaven, but that the thousandth part was not told them, 1 Cor. 2. 9.

2. She pronounced them happy, that constantly attended him, and waited on him at table; "Hapfhy are thy men, and hapfhy are these thy servants; (v. 8.) they may improve their own wisdom by hearing thine." She was tempted to envy them, and wish herself one of them. Note, It is a great advantage to be in good families, and to have opportunity of frequent converse with those that are wise, and good, and communicative. Many have this happiness, who know not how to value it. With much more reason may we say this of Christ's servants, Blessed are they that dwell in his house, they will be still praising him.

3. She blessed God, the Giver of Solomon's wisdom and wealth, and the Author of his advancement, who had made him king, (1.) In kindness to him, that he might have the larger opportunity of doing good with his wisdom. He delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel, v. 9. Solomon's preferment began in the prophet's calling him Jedidiah, because the Lord loved him, 2 Sam. 12. 25. It more than doubles our comforts, if we have reason to hope they come from God's delight in us. It was his pleasure concerning thee, (so it may be read,) to set thee on the throne; not for thy merit's sake, but because so it seemed good unto him. (2.) In kindness to the people, because the Lord loved Israel for ever, designing them a lasting bliss, long to survive him that laid the foundations of it. "He has made thee king, not that thou mayest live in pomp and pleasure, and do what thou wilt, but to do judgment and justice." This she kindly reminded Solomon of, and, no doubt, he took it kindly. Both magistrates and ministers must be more solicitous to do the duty of their places, than to secure the honours and profits of them. To this she attributes his prosperity, not to his wisdom, for bread is not always to the wise, (Eccl. 9. 11.) but whose doeth judgment and justice, it shall be well with him, Jer. 22. 15. Thus giving of thanks must be made for kings, for good kings, for such kings; they are what God makes them to be.

VI. How they parted. 1. She made a noble present to Solomon, of gold and spices, v. 10. David had foretold concerning Solomon, that to him should be given of the gold of Sheba, Ps. 72. 15. The present of gold and spices which the wise men of the east brought to Christ, was signified by this, Matth. 2. 11. Thus she paid for the wisdom she had learned, and did not think she bought it dear. Let those that are taught of God, give him their hearts, and the present will be more acceptable than this of gold and spices. Mention is made of the great abundance Solomon had of his own, notwithstanding she presented, and he accepted, this gold. What we present to Christ, he needs not, but will have us so to express our gratitude. The almug-trees are here spoken of, (v. 11, 12.) as extraordinary, because, per haps, much admired by the queen of Sheba. 2. Solomon was not behindhand with her. He gave her whatsoever she asked, patterns, we may suppose, of those things that were curious, by which she might make the like; or, perhaps, he gave her his precepts of wisdom and piety in writing, beside that which he gave her of his royal bounty, v. 13. Thus they who apply themselves to our Lord Jesus, will find him not only greater than Solomon, and wiser, but more kind; whatsoever we ask, it shall be done for us; nay, he will, out of his divine bounty, which infinitely exceeds royal bounty, even Solomon's, do for us more than we are able to ask or think.

14 Now the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred threescore and six talents of gold, 15. Besides that he had of the merchant-men, and of the traffic of the spice-merchants, and of all the kings of Arabia, and of the governors of the country. 16. And king Solomon made two hundred targets of beaten gold: six hundred shekels of gold went to one target. 17. And he made three hundred shields of beaten gold; three pound of gold went to one shield: and the king put them in the house of the forest of Lebanon. 18. Moreover, the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold. 19. The throne had six steps, and the top of the throne was round behind: and there were stays on either side on the place of the seat, and two lions stood beside the stays. 20. And twelve lions stood there on the one side and on the other upon the six steps: there was not the like made in any kingdom. 21. And all king Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon. 22. For the king had at sea a navy of Tharshish with the navy of Hiram: once in three years came the navy of Tharshish, bringing gold and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks. 23. So king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches and for wisdom. 24. And all the earth sought to Solomon, to hear his wisdom, which God had put in his heart. 25. And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and garments, and armour, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year. 26. And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem. 27. And the king made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones, and cedars made he to be as the sycamore-trees that are in the vale, for abundance. 28. And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price. 29. And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and a horse for a hundred and fifty: and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means.

We have here a further account of Solomon's prosperity:

I. How he increased his wealth. Though he had much, he still coveted to have more, being willing to try the utmost the things of this world could do, to make men happy. 1. Beside the gold that came from Ophir, (ch. 9. 28.) he brought so much into his country from other places, that the whole amounted, every year, to six hundred and sixty-six talents, (v. 14.) an ominous number; compare Rev. 13. 18, and Ezra 2. 13. 2. He received a great deal, in customs, from the merchants, and in land-taxes, from the countries his father had conquered, and made tributaries to Israel, v. 15. 3. He was Hiram's partner in a Tharshish fleet, of and for Tyre, which imported, once in three years, not only gold, and silver, and ivory, substantial goods, and serviceable, but apes to play with, and peacocks to please the eye with their feathers, v. 22. I wish this may not be an evidence that Solomon and his people, being overcharged with prosperity, by this time, grew childish and wanton. 4. He had presents made him every year, from the neighbouring princes and great men, to engage the continuance of his friendship, not so much because they feared him, or were jealous of him, as because they loved him, and admired his wisdom, had often occasion to consult him as an oracle, and sent him these presents by way of recompense for his advice in politics; and (whether it became his grandeur and generosity or no, we will not inquire) he took all that came, even garments and spices, horses and mules, v. 24, 25. 5. He traded to Egypt for horses, and linen-yarn, (or, as some read it, linen-cloth,) the staple commodities of that country, and had his own merchants or factors whom he employed in this traffic, and who were accountable to him, v. 28, 29. The custom to be paid to the king of Egypt for exported chariots and horses out of Egypt, was very high, but, (as Bishop Patrick understands it) Solomon, having married his daughter, got him to compound for the customs, so that he could bring them up cheaper than his neighbours, which obliged them to buy them of him, which he was wise enough, no doubt, to make his advantage of. This puts an honour upon the trading part of a nation, and sets a tradesman not so much below a gentleman as some place him, that Solomon, one of the greatest men that ever was, thought it no disparagement to him to deal in trade. In all labour there is profit.

II. What use he made of his wealth. He did not hoard it up in his coffers, that he might have it to look upon, and leave behind him. He has, in his Ecclesiastes, so much exposed the folly of hoarding, that we cannot suppose he should himself be guilty of it. No; God that had given him riches, and wealth, and honour, gave him also power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, Eccl. 5. 19.

1. He laid out his gold in fine things for himself, which he might the better be allowed to do, when he had, before, laid out so much in fine things for the house of God. (1.) He made 200 targets, and 300 shields of beaten gold, (v. 16, 17.) not for service, but for state, to be carried before him, when he appeared in pomp. With us, magistrates have swords and maces carried before them, as the Romans their rods and axes, in token of their power to correct and punish the bad, to whom they are to be a terror; but Solomon had shields and targets carried before him, to signify that he took more pleasure in using his power for the defence and protection of the good, to whom he would be a praise. Magistrates are shields of the earth. (2.) He made a stately throne, on which he sat, to give laws to his subjects, audience to ambassadors, and judgment upon appeals, v. 18..20. It was made of ivory, or elephants' teeth, which was very rich; and yet, as if he had so much gold that he knew not what to do with it, he overlaid that with gold, the best gold. Yet, some think, he did not cover the ivory all over, but here and there. He rolled it, flowered it, or inlaid it, with gold. The stays or arms of this stately chair, were supported by the images of lions in gold, so were the steps and paces by which he went up to it, to be a memorandum to him of that courage and resolution wherewith he ought to execute judgment, not fearing the face of man. The righteous, in that post, is bold as a lion. (3.) He made all his drinking-vessels, and all the furniture of his table, even at his country-seat, of pure gold, v. 21. He did not grudge himself what he had, but took the credit and comfort of it, such as it was. That is good, that does us good.

2. He made it circulate among his subjects, so that the kingdom was as rich as the king; for he had no separate interests of his own to consult, but sought the welfare of his people. Those princes are not governed by Solomon's maxims, who think it policy to keep their subjects poor. Solomon was, herein, a type of Christ, who is not only rich himself, but enriches all that are his. Solomon was instrumental to bring so much gold into the country, and disperse it, that silver was nothing accounted of, v. 21. There was such plenty of it in Jerusalem, that it was as the stones; and cedars, that used to be great rarities, were as common as sycamore trees, v. 27. Such is the nature of worldly wealth, plenty of it makes it the less valuable, much more should the enjoyment of spiritual riches lessen our esteem of all earthly possessions. If gold in abundance would make silver to seem so despicable, shall not wisdom, and grace, and the foretastes of heaven, which are far better than gold, make it seem much more so?

Well, thus rich, thus great, was Solomon, and thus did he exceed all the kings of the earth, v. 23. Now let us remember, (1.) That this was he, who, when he was setting out in the world, did not ask for the wealth and honour of it, but asked for a wise and understanding heart. The more moderate our desires are toward earthly things, the better qualified we are for the enjoyment of them, and the more likely to have them. See, in Solomon's greatness, the performance of God's promise, (ch. 3. 13.) and let it encourage us to seek first the righteousness of God's kingdom. (2.) That this was he, who, having tasted all these enjoyments, wrote a whole book, to show the vanity of all worldly things, and the vexation of spirit that attends them, their insufficiency to make us happy, and the folly of setting our hearts upon them; and to recommend to us the practice of serious godliness, as that which is the whole of man, and will do infinitely more toward the making of us easy and happy, than all the wealth and power that he was master of; and which, through the grace of God, is within our reach, when the thousandth part of Solomon's greatness is a thousand times more than we can ever be so vain as to promise ourselves in this world.

CHAP. XI.

This chapter begins with as melancholy a but as almost any we find in all the Bible. Hitherto, we have read nothing of Solomon, but what was great and good; but the lustre both of his goodness, and of his greatness, is here sullied and eclipsed, and his sun sets under a cloud. 1. The glory of his piety is stained by his departure from God, and his duty, in his latter days, by marrying strange wives, and worshipping strange gods, v. 1..8. 11. The glory of his prosperity is stained by God's displeasure against him, and the fruits of that displeasure. 1. He sent him an angry message, v. 9..13. 2. He stirred up enemies, who gave him disturbance; Hadad, v. 14..22. Rezon, v. 23..25. 3. He gave away ten tribes of his twelve, from his posterity after him, to Jeroboam, whom therefore he sought in vain to slay, (v. 26..40.) and this is all that remains here to be told concerning Solomon, except his death and burial; (v. 41..43.) for there is nothing perfect under the sun, but all is so above the sun.

1. BUT king Solomon loved many strange women, (together with the daughter of Pharaoh,) women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites; 2. Of the nations concerning which the LORD said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you: for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods. Solomon clave unto these in love. 3. And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart. 4. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods: and his heart was not perfect with the LORD his God, as was the heart of David his father. 5. For Solomon went after Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites. 6. And Solomon did evil in the sight of the LORD, and went not fully after the LORD, as did David his father. 7. Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem; and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon. 8. And likewise did he for all his strange wives which burnt incense, and sacrificed unto their gods.

This is a sad story, and very surprising, of Solomon's defection and degeneracy.

1. Let us inquire into the occasions and particulars of it. Shall Solomon fall, that was the beauty of Israel, and so great a blessing of his generation? Yes, it is too true, and the scripture is faithful in relating it, and repeating it, and referring it to long after; (Neh. 13. 26.) There was no king like Solomon, who was beloved of his God, yet even him did outlandish women cause to sin: there is the summary of his apostasy; it was the women that deceived him, and was first in the transgression.

1. He doted on strange women, many strange women. Here his revolt began. (1.) He gave himself to women, which his mother had particularly cautioned him against; (Prov. 31. 3.) Give not thy strength unto women; (perhaps alluding to Samson, who lost his strength by giving information of it to a woman;) for it is that which, as much as any thing, destroys kings. His father David's fall began with the lusts of the flesh, which he should have taken warning by. The love of women has cast down many wounded, (Prov. 7. 26.) and many (says Bishop Hall) have had their head broken by their own rib. (2.) He took many women, so many, that, at last, they amounted to 700 wives, and 300 concubines; 1000 in all, and not one good one among them, as he himself owns in his penitential sermon, (Eccl. 7. 28.) for no woman of established virtue would be one of such a set. God had, by his law, particularly forbidden the kings to multiply either horses or wives, Deut. 17. 16, 17. How he broke the former law, in multiplying horses, and having them out of Egypt too, (which was expressly prohibited in that law,) we read, ch. 10. 29. and here, how he broke the latter, (which proved of more fatal consequence,) in multiplying wives. Note, Lesser sins, made bold with, open the door to greater. David had multiplied wives too much, and, perhaps, that made Solomon presume it lawful. Note, If those that are in reputation for religion, in any thing, set a bad example, they know not what a deal of mischief they may do by it, particularly to their own children. One bad act of a good man may be of more pernicious consequence to others, than twenty of a wicked man. Probably, Solomon, when he began to multiply wives, intended not to exceed his father's number; but the way of sin is down-hill, they that are got into it, cannot easily stop themselves. Divine wisdom has appointed one woman for one man, and did so, at first: they who do not think one enough, will not think two or three enough; unbridled lust will be unbounded; and the loosened hind will wander endlessly. But this was not all: (3.) They were strange women, Moabites, Ammonites, &c. of the nations which God had particularly forbidden them to intermarry with, v. 2. Some think it was in policy that he married these foreigners, by them to get intelligence of the state of those countries. I rather fear it was because the daughters of Israel were too grave and modest for him, and those foreigners pleased him with the looseness and wantonness of their dress, and air, and conversation. Or, perhaps, it was looked upon as a piece of state to have his seraglio, as his other treasures, replenished with that which was far-fetched; as if that were too great an honour for the best of his subjects, which would really have been a disgrace to the meanest of them—to be his mistresses. And, (4.) To complete the mischief, Solomon clave unto these in love, v. 2. He not only kept them, but was extravagantly fond of them; set his heart upon them, spent his time among them, thought every thing well they said and did, and despised Pharaoh's daughter, his rightful wife, who had been dear to him, and all the ladies of Israel, in comparison of them. Solomon was master of a great deal of knowledge, but to what purpose, when he had no better a government of his appetites?

2. He was drawn by them to the worship of strange gods, as Israel to Baal-peor, by the daughters of Moab. This was the bad consequence of his multiplying wives. We have reason to think it impaired his health, and hastened upon him the decays of age; it exhausted his treasure, which, though vast indeed, would be found little enough to maintain the pride and vanity of all these women; perhaps it occasioned him, in his latter end, to neglect his business, by which he lost his supplies from abroad, and was forced, for the keeping up of his grandeur, to burthen his subjects with those taxes which they complained of, ch. 12. 4. But none of these consequences were so bad as this, His wives turned away his heart after other gods, v. 3, 4.

(1.) He grew cool and indifferent in his own religion, and remiss in the service of the God of Israel. His heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, (v. 4.) nor did he follow him fully, (v. 6.)

like David. We cannot suppose that he quite cast off the worship of God, much less that he restrained or hindered it; (the temple-service went on as usual;) but he grew less frequent and less serious, in his ascent to the house of the Lord, and his attendance on his altar; he left his first love, lost his zeal for God, and did not persevere to the end as he had begun; therefore it is said, he was not perfect, because he was not constant; and he followed not God fully, because he turned from following him, and did not continue to the end. His father David had many faults, but he never neglected the worship of God, nor grew remiss in that, as Solomon did, his wives using all their arts to divert him from it, and there began his apostasy.

(2.) He tolerated and maintained his wives in their idolatry, and made no scruple of joining with them in it. Pharaoh's daughter was proselyted (as is supposed) to the Jews' religion, but when he began to grow careless in the worship of God himself, he used no means to convert his other wives to it; in complaisance to them, he built chapels for their gods, (v. 7, 8.) maintained their priests, and occasionally did himself attend their altars; making a jest of it, as if there were no harm in it, but all religions were alike; which (says Bishop Patrick) has been the disease of some great wits; when he humoured one thus, the rest would take it ill, if he did not, in like manner, gratify them, so that he did it for all his wives, (v. 8.) and, at last, came to that degree of impiety, that he set up a high place for Chemosh in the hill that is before Jerusalem, the mount of Olives, as if to confront the temple which he himself had built; these high places continued here, not utterly demolished, till Josiah did it, 2 Kings 23. 13. This is the account here given of Solomon's apostasy.

II. Let us now pause a while, and lament Solomon's fall; and we may justly stand and wonder at it. How is the gold become dim! How is the most fine gold changed! Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, as the prophet exclaims in a like case, Jer. 2. 12. Strange! 1. That Solomon, in his old age, should be insured with fleshly lusts, youthful lusts; as we must never presume upon the strength of our resolutions, so neither upon the weakness of our corruptions, so as to be secure and off our guard. 2. That so wise a man as Solomon was, so famed for a quick understanding and sound judgment, should suffer himself to be made such a fool of by these foolish women. 3. That one who had so often and so plainly warned others of the danger of the love of women, should himself be so wretchedly bewitched with it; it is easier to see a mischief, and to show it others, than to shun it ourselves. 4. That so good a man, so zealous for the worship of God, who had been conversant with divine things, and who prayed that excellent prayer at the dedication of the temple, should do these sinful things—Is this Solomon? Are all his wisdom and devotion come to this, at last? Never was gallant ship so wrecked; never was crown so profaned.

What shall we say to this? (1.) Why God permitted it, it is not for us to inquire; his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters; he knew how to bring glory to himself out of it. God foresaw it, when he said concerning him that should build the temple, If he commit iniquity, &c. 2. Sam. 7. 14. (2.) But it concerns us to inquire what good use we may make of it. [1.] Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall; we see how weak we are of ourselves, without the grace of God; let us therefore live in a constant dependence on that grace. [2.] See the danger of a prosperous condition, and how hard it is to overcome the temptations of it; Solomon, like Jeshurun, waxed fat, and then kicked; the food convenient, which Agur prayed for, is safer and better than the food abundant, which Solomon was even surfeited with. [3.] See what need those have to stand upon their guard, who have made a great profession of religion, and showed themselves forward and zealous in devotion, because the Devil will set upon them most violently, and if they misbehave, the reproach is the greater: it is the evening that commends the day; let us therefore fear, lest, having run well, we see n to come short.

9. And the LORD was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the LORD God of Israel, which had appeared unto him twice, 10. And had commanded him concerning this thing, that he should not go after other gods: but he kept not that which the LORD commanded. 11. Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant. 12. Notwithstanding, in thy days I will not do it, for David thy father's sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son. 13. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; but will give one tribe to thy son for David my servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake, which I have chosen.

Here is,

I. God's anger against Solomon for his sin; the thing he did, displeased the Lord: time was, when the Lord loved Solomon, (2 Sam. 12. 24.) and delighted in him; (ch. 10. 9.) but now the Lord was angry with Solomon, (v. 9.) for there was in his sin, 1. The most base ingratitude that could be; he turned from the Lord which had appeared unto him twice, once, before he began to build the temple, (ch. 3. 5.) and once, after he had dedicated it, ch. 9. 2. God keeps account of the gracious visits he makes us, whether we do or no; knows how often he has appeared to us, and for us, and will remember it against us, if we turn from him. God's appearing to Solomon, was such a sensible confirmation of his faith, as should have for ever prevented his worshipping of any other God; it was also such a distinguishing favour, and put such an honour upon him, as he ought never to have forgotten, especially considering what God said to him in both these appearances. 2. The most wilful disobedience: this was the very thing concerning which God had commanded him—that he should not go after other gods, yet he was not kept right by such an express admonition, v. 10. Those who have dominion over men, are apt to forget God's dominion over them; and while they demand obedience from their inferiors, to deny it to him who is the Supreme.

II. The message he sent him hereupon; (v. 11.) The Lord said unto Solomon, (it is likely by a prophet,) that he must expect to smart for his apostasy. And here, 1. The sentence is just, that since he had revolted from God, part of his kingdom should revolt from his family; he had given God's glory to the creature, and therefore God would give his crown to his servant, "I will rend the kingdom from thee, in thy posterity, and will give it to thy servant, who shall bear rule over much of that for which thou hast laboured." This was a great mortification to Solomon, who pleased himself, no doubt, with the prospect of the entail of his rich kingdom upon his heirs for ever; sin brings ruin upon families, cuts off entails, alienates estates, and lays men's honour in the dust. 2. Yet the mitigations of it are very kind, for David's sake; (v. 12, 13.) that is, for the sake of the promise made to David; thus, all the favour God shows to man, is for Christ's sake, and for the sake of the covenant made with him; the kingdom shall be rent from Solomon's house, but, (1.) Not immediately; Solomon shall not live to see it done, but it shall be rent out of the hand of his son, a son that was born to him by one of his strange wives, for his mother was an Ammonitess, (ch. 14. 31.) and, probably, had been a promoter of idolatry. What comfort can a man take in leaving children and an estate behind him, if he do not leave a blessing behind him? Yet if judgments be coming, it is a favour to us, if they come not in our days, as 2 Kings 20. 19. (2.) Not wholly; one tribe, that of Judah, the strongest and most numerous, shall remain to the house of David, (v. 13.) for Jerusalem's sake, which David built, and for the sake of the temple there, which Solomon built, these shall not go into other hands; Solomon did not quickly nor wholly turn away from God, therefore God did not quickly nor wholly take the kingdom from him.

Upon this message which God graciously sent to Solomon, to awaken his conscience and bring him to repentance, we have reason to hope that he humbled himself before God, confessed his sin, begged pardon, and returned to his duty; that he then published his repentance in the book of Ecclesiastes, where he bitterly laments his own folly and madness, (ch. 7. 25, 26.) and warns others to take heed of the like evil courses, and to fear God and keep his commandments, in consideration of the judgment to come, which, it is likely, had made him tremble, as it did Felix. That penitential sermon was as true an indication of a heart broken for sin, and turned from it, as David's penitential psalms, though of another nature. God's grace in his people works variously. Thus, though Solomon fell, he was not utterly cast down; what God had said to David concerning him, was fulfilled, I will chasten him with the rod of men, but my mercy shall not depart from him, 2 Sam. 7. 14, 15. Though God may suffer these whom he loves to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. Solomon's defection, though it was much his reproach, and a great blemish to his personal character, yet did not so far break in upon the character of his reign, but that it was afterward made the pattern of a good reign, 2 Chron. 11. 17. where they are said to do well, while they walked in the way of David and Solomon. But though we have all this reason to hope he repented, and found mercy, yet the Holy Ghost did not think fit expressly to record it, but left it doubtful, for warning to others, not to sin upon presumption of repenting, for it is but a peradventure whether God will give them repentance, or if he do, whether he will give the evidence of it to themselves or others; great sinners may recover themselves, and have the benefit of their repentance, and yet be denied both the comfort and credit of it; the guilt may be taken away, and yet not the reproach.

14. And the LORD stirred up an adversary unto Solomon, Hadad the Edomite: he was of the king's seed in Edom. 15. For it came to pass, when David was in Edom and Joab, the captain of the host was gone up to bury the slain, after he had smitten every male in Edom, 16. (For six months did Joab remain there with all Israel, until he had cut off every male in Edom,) 17. That Hadad fled, he, and certain Edomites of his father's servants with him, to go into Egypt; Hadad being yet a little child. 18. And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran: and they took men with them out of Paran, and they came to Egypt, unto Pharaoh king of Egypt; which gave him a house, and appointed him victuals, and gave him land. 19. And Hadad found great favour in the sight of Pharaoh, so that he gave him to wife the sister of his own wife the sister of Taphenes the queen. 20. And the sister of Taphenes bare him Genubath his son, whom Taphenes weaned in Pharaoh's house: and Genubath was in Pharaoh's household, among the sons of Pharaoh. 21. And when Hadad heard in Egypt that David slept with his fathers, and that Joab, the captain of the host, was dead, Hadad said to Pharaoh, Let me depart, that I may go to mine own country. 22. Then Pharaoh said unto him, But what hast thou lacked with me, that, behold, thou seekest to go to thine own country? And he answered, Nothing: howbeit let me go in any wise. 23. And God stirred him up another adversary, Rezon the son of Eliadah, which fled from his lord Hadadezer, king of Zobah. 24. And he gathered men unto him, and became captain over a band, when David slew them of Zobah: and they went to Damascus, and dwelt therein, and reigned in Damascus. 25. And he was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon, besides the mischief that Hadad did: and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria.

While Solomon kept close to God and to his duty, there was no adversary nor evil occurrent, (ch. 5. 4.) nothing to create him any disturbance or uneasiness in the least, but here we have an account of two adversaries that appeared against him, inconsiderable, and that could not have done any thing worth taking notice of, if Solomon had not first made God his Enemy. What hurt could Hadad or Rezon have done to so great and powerful a king as Solomon was, if he had not, by sin, made himself mean and weak? And then, those little people menace and insult him. If God be on our side, we need not fear the greatest adversary; but if he be against us, he can make us fear the least, and the very grasshopper shall be a burthen.

Both these adversaries God stirred up, v. 14, 23. Though they themselves were moved by principles of ambition or revenge, God made use of them to serve his design of correcting Solomon. The principal judgment threatened, was deferred, namely, the rending of the kingdom from him, but he himself was made to feel the smart of the rod, for his greater humiliation. Note, Whoever are, any way, adversaries to us, we must take notice of the hand of God stirring them up to be so, as he bade Shimei curse David; we must look through the instruments of our trouble to the Author of it, and hear the Lord's controversy in it.

Both these adversaries had the original of their enmity to Solomon and Israel laid in David's time, and in his conquests of their respective countries, v. 15, 24. Solomon had the benefit and advantage of his father's successes, both in the enlargement of his dominion, and the increase of his treasure, and would never have known any thing but the benefit of them, if he had kept close to God; but now he finds evils to balance the advantages, and that David had made himself enemies, which were thorns in his sides; they that are too free in giving provocation, ought to consider that perhaps it may be remembered in time to come, and returned with interest to their's after them; having so few friends in this world, it is our wisdom not to make ourselves more enemies than we needs must.

1. Hadad, an Edomite, was an adversary to Solomon; we are not told what he did against him, nor which way he gave him disturbance; only, in general, that he was an adversary to him: but we are told, (1.) What induced him to bear Solomon a grudge. David had conquered Edom; (2 Sam. 8. 14.) Joab put all the males to the sword; (v. 15, 16.) a terrible execution he made, avenging on Edom their old enmity to Israel, yet perhaps with too great a severity. While Joab was burying the slain, (for he left not any alive of their own people to bury them, and buried they must be, or they would be an annoyance to the country, Ezek. 39. 12.) Hadad, a branch of the royal family, then a little child, was taken and preserved by some of the king's servants, and brought to Egypt, v. 17. They halted by the way, in Midian first, and then in Paran, where they furnished themselves with men, not to fight for them, or force their passage, but to attend them, that their young master might come into Egypt with an equipage agreeable to his quality; there he was kindly sheltered and entertained by Pharaoh, as a distressed prince, was well provided for, and so recommended himself, that, in process of time, he married the queen's sister, (v. 19.) and, by her, had a child, which the queen herself conceived such a kindness for, that she brought him up in Pharaoh's house, among the king's children. (2.) What enabled him to do Solomon a mischief. He returned to his own country again, upon the death of David and Joab, in which, it should seem, he settled, and remained quiet, while Solomon continued wise and watchful for the public good, but from which he had opportunity of making inroads upon Israel, when Solomon, having sinned away his wisdom, as Samson did his strength, (and in the same way,) grew careless of public affairs, was off his guard himself, and had forfeited the divine protection. What vexation he gave to Solomon, we are not here told, but only how loath Pharaoh was to part with him, and how earnestly he solicited his stay; (v. 22.) What hast thou lacked with me? "Nothing," says Hadad; "but, however, let me go to my own country, my native air, my native soil." Peter Martyr has a pious reflection upon this; "That heaven is our home, and we ought to keep up a holy affection to that, and desire toward it, even then when the world, the place of our banishment, smiles most upon us." Does it ask, What have you lacked, that you are so willing to be gone? We may answer, "Nothing that the world can do for us; but however, let us go thither, where our hope, and honour, and treasure, are."

2. Rezon, a Syrian, was another adversary to Solomon; when David conquered the Syrians, he headed the remains, lived at large by spoil and rapine, till Solomon grew careless, and then he got possession of Damascus, reigned there, (v. 24.) and over the country about; (v. 25.) and he created troubles to Israel, probably in conjunction with Hadad, all the days of Solomon, namely, after his apostasy; or he was an enemy to Israel, during all Solomon's reign, and upon all occasions vented his then impotent malice against them; but till Solomon's revolt, when his defence was departed from him, he could not do them any mischief; it is said of him, that he abhorred Israel; other princes loved and admired Israel and Solomon, and courted their friendship, but here was one that abhorred them. The greatest and best of princes and people, that are ever so much respected by the most, yet perhaps will be hated and abhorred by some.

26. And Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, Solomon's servant, (whose mother's name was Zeruah, a widow woman,) even he lifted up his hand against the king. 27. And this was the cause that he lifted up his hand against the king: Solomon built Millo, and repaired the breaches of the city of David his father. 28. And the man Jeroboam was a mighty man of valour: and Solomon seeing the young man that he was industrious, he made him ruler over all the charge of the house of Joseph. 29. And it came to pass at that time, when Jeroboam went out of Jerusalem, that the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite found him in the way; and he had clad himself with a new garment: and they two were alone in the field: 30. And Ahijah caught the new garment that was on him, and rent it in twelve pieces. 31. And he said to Jeroboam, Take the ten pieces; for thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee: 32. But he shall have one tribe for my servant David's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake, the city which I have chosen out of all the tribes of Israel: 33. Because that they have forsaken me, and have worshipped Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, Chemosh the god of the Moabites, and Milcom the god of the children of Ammon; and have not walked in my ways, to do that which is right in mine eyes, and to keep my statutes and my judgments, as did David his father. 34. Howbeit I will not take the whole kingdom out of his hand: but I will make him prince all the days of his life, for David my servant's sake, whom I chose, because he kept my commandments and my statutes; 35. But I will take the kingdom out of his son's hand, and will give it unto thee, even ten tribes. 36. And unto his son will I give one tribe, that David my servant may have a light always before me in Jerusalem, the city which I have chosen me to put my name there. 37. And I will take thee, and thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth, and shalt be king over Israel. 38. And it shall be, if thou wilt hearken unto all that I command thee, and wilt walk in my ways, and do that is right in my sight, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as David my servant did; that I will be with thee, and build thee a sure house, as I built for David, and will give Israel unto thee. 39. And I will for this afflict the seed of David, but not for ever. 40. Solomon sought therefore to kill Jeroboam: and Jeroboam arose, and fled into Egypt, unto Shishak king of Egypt, and was in Egypt until the death of Solomon.

We have, here, the first mention made of that infamous name, Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, that made Israel to sin; he is here brought upon the stage as an adversary to Solomon, whom God had expressly told, (v. 11.) that he would give the greatest part of his kingdom to his servant, and Jeroboam was the man. We have here an account,

I. Of his extraction; (v. 26.) he was of the tribe of Ephraim, the next in honour to Judah; his mother was a widow, to whom Providence had made up the loss of a husband in a son that was active and ingenious, and (we may suppose) a great support and comfort to her.

II. Of his elevation. It was Solomon's wisdom, when he had work to do, to employ proper persons in it; he observed Jeroboam to be a very industrious young man, one that minded his business, took a pleasure in it, and did it with all his might, and therefore he gradually advanced him, till, at length, he made him receiver-general for the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, or perhaps put him into an office equivalent to that of lord-lieutenant of those two counties, for he was ruler of the burthen, or tribute, that is, either of the taxes, or of the militia, of the house of Joseph. Note, Industry is the way to preferment; Seest thou a man diligent in his business, that will take care and pains, and go through with it? He shall stand before kings, and not always be on the level with mean men. Observe a difference between David, and both his predecessor, and his successor; when Saul saw a valiant man, he took him to himself; (1 Sam. 14. 52.) when Solomon saw an industrious man, he preferred him; but David's eyes were upon the faithful in the land, that they might dwell with him: if he saw a godly man, he preferred him, for he was a man after God's own heart, whose countenance beholds the upright.

III. Of his designation to the government of the ten tribes, after the death of Solomon. Some think he was himself plotting against Solomon, and contriving to rise to the throne; that he was turbulent and aspiring. The Jews say that when he was employed by Solomon in building Millo, he took opportunities of reflecting upon Solomon as oppressive to his people, and suggesting that which would alienate them from his government; it is not indeed probable that he should say much to that purport, for Solomon would have got notice of it, and it would have hindered his preferment; but it is plainly intimated that he had it in his thoughts, for the prophet tells him, (v. 37.) Thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth: but this was the cause, or, rather, this was the story, of his lifting up his hand against the king; he made him ruler over the tribes of Joseph, and as he was going to take possession of his government, he was told by a prophet, in God's name, that he should be king, which imboldened him to aim high, and, in some instances, to oppose the king, and give him vexation.

1. The prophet, by whom this message was sent, was, Ahijah of Shiloh; we shall read of him again, ch. 14. 2. It seems, Shiloh was not so perfectly forsaken and forgotten of God, but that, in remembrance of the former days, it was blessed with a prophet; he delivered himself to Jeroboam in the way, his servants being, probably, ordered to retire, as in a like case, (1 Sam. 9. 27.) when Samuel delivered his message to Saul; God's word was not the less sacred and sure, for being delivered to him thus obscurely, under a hedge, it may be.

2. The sign by which it was represented to him, was, the rending of a garment into twelve pieces, and giving him ten, v. 30. It is not certain whether the garment was Jeroboam's, as is commonly taken for granted, or Ahijah's, which is more probable; he (that is, the prophet) clad himself with a new garment, on purpose that he might with it give him a sign. The rending of the kingdom from Saul was signified by the rending of Samuel's mantle, not Saul's, 1 Sam. 15. 27, 28. And it was more significant, to give him ten pieces of that which was not his own before, than of that which was; the prophets, both true and false, used such signs, even in the New Testament, as Agabus, Acts 21. 11.

3. The message itself, which is very particular.

(1.) He assures him that he should be king over ten of the twelve tribes of Israel, v. 31. The meanness of his extraction and employment should be no hinderance to his advancement, when the God of Israel says, (by whom kings reign,) I will give ten tribes unto thee.

(2.) He tells them the reason; not for his good character or deserts, but for the chastising of Solomon's apostasy, because he, and his family, and many of his people with him, have forsaken me, and worshipped other gods, v. 33. It was because they had done ill, not because he was likely to do much better; thus Israel must know, that it is not for their righteousness that they are made masters of Canaan, but for the wickedness of the Canaanites, Deut. 9. 4. Jeroboam did not deserve so good a post, but Israel deserved so bad a prince. In telling him that the reason why he rent the kingdom from the house of Solomon, was, because they had forsaken God, he warns him to take heed of sinning away his preferment, in like manner.

(3.) He limits his expectations to the ten tribes only, and to them, in reversion, after the death of Solomon; lest he should aim at the whole, and give immediate disturbance to Solomon's government. He is here told, [1.] That two tribes (called here one tribe, because little Benjamin was, in a manner, lost in the thousands of Judah) should remain sure to the house of David, and he must never make any attempt upon them; He shall have one tribe, (v. 32. and again, v. 36.) that David may have a lamp, that is, a shining name and memory, (Ps. 132. 17.) and his family, as a royal family, may not be extinct. He must not think that David was rejected, as Saul was; no, God would not take his loving-kindness from him, as he did from Saul. The house of David must be supported and kept in reputation for all this, because out of it the Messiah must arise. Destroy it not, for that Blessing is in it. [2.] That Solomon must keep possession during his life, v. 34, 35. Jeroboam therefore must not offer to dethrone him, but wait with patience till his day shall come to fall. Solomon shall be prince, all the days of his life, not for his own sake, (he had forfeited his crown to the justice of God,) but for David my servant's sake, because he kept my commandments. Children that do not tread in their parents' steps, yet often fare the better in this world for their good parents' piety.

(4.) He is given to understand that he will be upon his good behaviour. The grant of the crown must run quam diu se bene gesserit—during good behaviour. If thou wilt do what is right in my sight, I will build thee a sure house, and not otherwise; (v. 38.) intimating, that if he forsook God, even his advancement to the throne would, in time, lay his family in the dust; whereas the seed of David, though afflicted, should not be afflicted for ever, (v. 39.) but should flourish again, as it did in many of the illustrious kings of Judah, who reigned in glory, when Jeroboam's family was extirpated.

IV. Jeroboam's flight into Egypt hereupon, v. 40. Some way or other, Solomon came to know of all this; probably, from Jeroboam's own talk of it; he could not conceal it, as Saul did, nor keep his own counsel; if he had, he might have staid in his own country, and been preparing there for his future advancement; but, letting it be known, 1. Solomon foolishly sought to kill his successor. Had not he taught others, that whatever devices are in men's hearts, the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand? And yet does he himself think to defeat that counsel? 2. Jeroboam prudently withdrew into Egypt; though God's promise would have secured him any where, yet he would use means for his own preservation, and was content to live in exile and obscurity for a while, being sure of a kingdom at last. And shall not we be so, who have a better kingdom in reserve?

41. And the rest of the acts of Solomon, and all that he did, and his wisdom, are they not written in the book of the acts of Solomon? 42. And the time that Solomon reigned in Jerusalem, over all Israel, was forty years. 43. And Solomon slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David his father: and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead.

We have here the conclusion of Solomon's story, and in it, 1. Reference is had to another history then extant, but (not being divinely inspired) since lost. the book of the acts of Solomon, v. 41. Probably, this book was written by a chronologer or historiographer, whom he employed to write his annals, out of which the sacred writer extracted what God saw fit to transmit to the church. 2. A summary of the years of his reign; (v. 42.) He reigned in Jerusalem, (not as his father, part of his time in Hebron, and part in Jerusalem,) over all Israel, (not as his son, and his father in the beginning of his time, over Judah only,) forty years. His reign was as long as his father's, but not his life. Sin shortened his days. 3. His death and burial, and successor, v. 43. (1.) He followed his fathers to the grave; slept with them, and was buried in David's burying-place, with honour, no doubt. (2.) His son followed him in the throne. Thus the graves are filling with the generations that go off, and houses are filling with those that are growing up. As the grave cries, "Give, give," so land is never lost for want of an heir.

CHAP. XII.

The glory of the kingdom of Israel was in its height and perfection, in Solomon; it was long in coming to it, but it soon declined, and began to sink and wither in the very next reign, as we find in this chapter, where we have the kingdom divided, and thereby weakened, and made little, in comparison with what it had been. Here is, I. Rehoboam's accession to the throne, and Jeroboam's return out of Egypt, v. 1, 2. II. The people's petition to Rehoboam for the redress of grievances, and the rough answer he gave, by the advice of his young counsellors, to that petition, v. 3. . 15. III. The revolt of the ten tribes, thereupon, and their setting up of Jeroboam, v. 16. . 20. IV. Rehoboam's attempt to reduce them, and the prohibition God gave to that attempt, v. 21. . 24. V. Jeroboam's establishment of his government upon idolatry, v. 25. . 33. Thus did Judah become weak, being deserted by their brethren; and Israel, by deserting the house of the Lord.

1. AND Rehoboam went to Shechem: for all Israel were come to Shechem to make him king. 2. And it came to pass, when Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who was yet in Egypt, heard of it, (for he was fled from the presence of king Solomon, and Jeroboam dwelt in Egypt,) 3. That they sent and called him. And Jeroboam and all the congregation of Israel came, and spake unto Rehoboam, saying, 4. Thy father made our yoke grievous: now, therefore, make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee. 5. And he said unto them, Depart yet for three days, then come again to me. And the people departed. 6. And king Rehoboam consulted with the old men that stood before Solomon his father while he yet lived, and said, How do you advise, that I may answer this people? 7. And they spake unto him, saying, If thou wilt be a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever. 8. But he forsook the counsel of the old men, which they had given him, and consulted with the young men that were grown up with him, and which stood before him; 9. And he said unto them, What counsel give ye, that we may answer this people, who have spoken to me, saying, Make the yoke which thy father did put upon us lighter? 10. And the young men that were grown up with him spake unto him, saying, Thus shalt thou speak unto this people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it lighter unto us; thus shalt thou say unto them, My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins. 11. And now, whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions. 12. So Jeroboam and all the people came to Rehoboam the third day, as the king had appointed, saying, Come to me again the third day. 13. And the king answered the people roughly, and forsook the old men's counsel that they gave him; 14. And spake to them after the counsel of the young men, saying, My father made your yoke heavy, and I will add to your yoke: my father also chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions. 15. Wherefore the king hearkened not unto the people; for the cause was from the Lord, that he might perform his saying, which the Lord spake by Ahijah the Shilonite unto Jeroboam the son of Nebat.

Solomon had 1000 wives and concubines, yet we read but of one son he had to bear up his name, and he a fool. It is said, (Hos. 4. 10.) They shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase. Sin is a bad way of building up a family. Rehoboam was the son of the wisest of men, yet did not inherit his father's wisdom, and then it stood him in little stead to inherit his father's throne. Neither wisdom nor grace runs in the blood. Solomon came to the crown very young, yet he was then a wise man: Rehoboam at forty years old, when men will be wise, if ever they will, yet he was then foolish. Wisdom does not go by age, nor is it the multitude of years, or the advantage of education, that teaches it. Solomon's court was a mart of wisdom, and the rendezvous of learned men, and Rehoboam the darling of the court; and yet all was not sufficient to make him a wise man: the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. No dispute is made of Rehoboam's succession; upon the death of his father, he was immediately proclaimed. But,

I. The people desire a treaty with him at Shechem, and he condescends to meet them there. 1. Their pretence was, to make him king, but the design was, to unmake him. They would give him a public inauguration, in another place than the city of David, that he might not seem to be king of Judah only. They have ten parts in him, and will have him among themselves, for once, that they might recognize his title. 2. The place was ominous; at Shechem, where Abimelech set up himself, Judg. 9. Yet it had been famous for the convention of the states there, Josh. 24. 1. Rehoboam, we may suppose, knew of the threatening, that the kingdom should be rent from him, and hoped, by going to Shechem, and treating there with the ten tribes, to prevent it: yet it proves the most impolitic thing he could do, and hastens the rupture.

II. The representatives of the tribes address him, praying to be eased of the taxes they were burthened with. The meeting being appointed, they sent for Jeroboam out of Egypt to come and be their speaker: which they needed not to have done, he knew what God had designed him for, and would have come, though he had not been sent for, for now was his time to expect the possession of the promised crown. In their address, 1. They complain of the last reign; Thy father made our yoke grievous, v. 4. They complain not of his father's idolatry, and revolt from God; that which was the greatest grievance of all, was none to them; so careless and indifferent were they in the matters of religion, as if God or Moloch were all one, so they might but live at ease, and pay no taxes. Yet the complaint was groundless and unjust. Never did people live more at ease than they did, or in greater plenty. Did they pay taxes? It was to advance the strength and magnificence of their kingdom. If Solomon's buildings cost them money, they cost them no blood, as war would do. Were many servile hands employed about them? They were not the hands of the Israelites. Were the taxes a burthen? How could that be, when Solomon imported bullion in such plenty, that silver was, in a manner, as common as the stones? So that they did but render to Solomon the things that were Solomon's. Nay, suppose there was some hardship put upon them, were they not told before that this would be the manner of the king, and yet they would have

one. The best government cannot secure itself from reproach and censure, no not Solomon's. Factious spirits will never want something to complain of. I know nothing in Solomon's administration, that could make the people's yoke grievous, unless, perhaps, the women, whom in his latter days he doted on, were connived at in oppressing them. 2. They demand relief from him, and, on that condition, will continue in their allegiance to the house of David. They asked not to be wholly free from paying taxes, but to have the burthen made lighter; that was all their care, to save their money, whether their religion was supported, and the government protected, or no. All seek their own.

III. Rehoboam consulted with those about him, concerning the answer he should give to this address. It was prudent to take advice, especially having so weak a head of his own; yet, upon this occasion, it was impolitic to take time himself to consider, for thereby he gave time to the disaffected people to ripen things for a revolt; and his deliberating in so plain a case would be improved as an indication of the little concern he had for the people's ease. They saw what they must expect, and prepared accordingly. Now,

1. The grave experienced men of his council advised him, by all means, to give the petitioners a kind answer, to promise them fair, and, this day, this critical day, to serve them; that is, to tell them that he was their servant, and that he would redress all their grievances, and make it his business to please them, and make them easy. "Deny thyself" (say they) "so far as to do this, for this once, and they will be thy servants for ever. When the present heat is allayed with a soft answer, and the assembly dismissed, their cooler thoughts will reconcile and fix them to Solomon's family still." Note, The way to rule, is to serve; to do good, and to stoop to do it; to become all things to all men, and so win their hearts. Those in power, really sit highest, and easiest, and safest, that do so.

2. The young men of his council were hot and haughty, and they advised him to return a severe and threatening answer to the people's demands. It was an instance of Rehoboam's weakness, (1.) That he did not prefer aged counsellors, but had a better opinion of the young men that had grown up with him, and with whom he was familiar, v. 8. Days should speak. It was a folly for him to think that because they had been his agreeable companions in the sports and pleasures of his youth, they were therefore fit to have the management of the affairs of his kingdom. Great wits have not always the most wisdom; nor are those to be relied on as our best friends, that know how to make us merry, for that will not make us happy. It is of great consequence to young people that are setting out in the world, to have suitable persons to associate with, accommodate themselves to, and depend upon for advice. If they reckon those that feed their pride, gratify their vanity, and further them in their pleasures, their best friends, they are already marked for ruin. (2.) That he did not affect moderate counsels, but was pleased with those that put him upon harsh and rigorous methods, and advised him to double the taxes, whether there was occasion for it or no, and to tell them, in plain terms, that he would do so, v. 10, 11. They thought the old men expressed themselves but dully, v. 7. They affect to be witty in their advice, and value themselves on that. The old men did not undertake to put words into Rehoboam's mouth, only counselled him to speak good words: but the young men will furnish him with very pointed and pert similitudes; My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins, &c. That is not always the best sense that is best worded.

IV. He answered the people according to the counsel of the young men, v. 14, 15. He affected to be haughty and imperious, and fancied he could carry all before him with a high hand, and therefore would rather run the risk of losing them, than deny himself so far as to give them good words. Note, Many ruin themselves by consulting their humour more than their interest.

See, 1. How Rehoboam was infatuated in his counsels. He could not have acted more foolishly and impolitically. (1.) He owned their reflections upon his father's government to be true, My father made your yoke heavy; and therein was unjust to his father's memory which he might easily have vindicated from the imputation. (2.) He fancied himself better able to manage them, and impose upon them, than his father was; not considering that he was vastly inferior to him in capacity. Could he think to support the blemishes of his father's reign, who could never pretend to come near the glories of it? (3.) He threatened not only to squeeze them by taxes, but to chastise them by cruel laws, and severe executions of them; which should not be as whips only, but as scorpions, whips with rowels in them, that will fetch blood at every lash. In short, he would use them as brute-beasts, load them, and beat them, at his pleasure; not caring whether they loved him or no, he would make them fear him. (4.) He gave this provocation to a people that by long ease and prosperity were made wealthy, and strong, and proud, and would not be trampled upon, as a poor cowed dispirited people may; that were now disposed to revolt, and had one ready to head them. Never, surely, was man so blinded by pride, and affectation of arbitrary power, than which nothing is more fatal.

2. How God's counsels were hereby fulfilled. It was from the Lord, v. 15. He left Rehoboam to his own folly, and hid from his eyes the things which belonged to his peace, that the kingdom might be rent from him. Note, God serves his own wise and righteous purposes by the imprudences and iniquities of men, and snares sinners in the work of their own hands. They that lose the kingdom of heaven, throw it away, as Rehoboam did his, by their own wilfulness and folly.

16. So when all Israel saw that the king hearkened not unto them, the people answered the king, saying, What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel: Now see to thine own house, David. So Israel departed unto their tents. 17. But as for the children of Israel which dwelt in the cities of Judah, Rehoboam reigned over them. 18. Then king Rehoboam sent Adoram, who was over the tribute; and all Israel stoned him with stones, that he died: therefore king Rehoboam made speed to get him up to his chariot, to flee to Jerusalem. 19. So Israel rebelled against the house of David unto this day. 20. And it came to pass, when all Israel heard that Jeroboam was come again, that they sent and called him unto the congregation, and made him king over all Israel: there was none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only. 21. And when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he assembled all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benja min, a hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam the son of Solomon. 22. But the word of God came unto Shemaiah the man of God, saying, 23. Speak unto Rehoboam the son of Solomon, king of Judah, and unto all the house of Judah and Benjamin, and unto the remnant of the people, saying, 24. Thus saith the LORD, Ye shall not go up nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel: return every man to his house; for this thing is from me. They hearkened therefore to the word of the LORD, and returned to depart, according to the word of the LORD.

We have here the rending of the kingdom of the ten tribes from the house of David; to effect which,

I. The people were bold and resolute in their revolt. They highly resented the provocation that Rehoboam had given them, were incensed at his menaces, concluded that that government would, in the progress of it, be intolerably grievous, which, in the beginning of it, was so very haughty; and therefore immediately came to this resolve, one and all, What portion have we in David? v. 16. They speak here very unbecomingly of David, that great benefactor of their nation, calling him the son of Jesse, no greater a man than his neighbours. How soon are good men, and their good services to the public, forgotten! The rashness of their resolution was also much to be blamed; in time, and with prudent management, they might have settled the original contract with Rehoboam, to mutual satisfaction. Had they inquired who gave Rehoboam this advice, and taken a course to remove those evil counsellors, from about him, the rupture might have been prevented: otherwise, their jealousy for their liberty and property well became that free people. Israel is not a servant, is not a home-born slave; why should he be spoiled? Jer. 2. 14. They are willing to be ruled, but not to be ridden; protection draws allegiance, but destruction cannot. No marvel that Israel falls away from the house of David, (v. 19.) if the house of David fall away from the great ends of their advancement, which was to be ministers of God to them for good. But thus to rebel against the seed of David, whom God had advanced to the kingdom, (entailing it on his seed,) and to set up another king in opposition to that family, was a great sin; see 2 Chron. 13. 5-8. To this God refers, Hos. 8. 4, They have set up kings, but not by me. And it is here mentioned, to the praise of the tribe of Judah, that they followed the house of David, (v. 17, 20.) and, for aught that appears, they found Rehoboam better than his word, nor did he rule with the rigour which, at first, he threatened.

II. Rehoboam was imprudent in the further management of this affair, and more and more infatuated. Having foolishly thrown himself into a quicksand, he sunk the further in, with plunging to get out. 1. He was very unadvised, in sending Adoram, who was over the tribute, to treat with them, v. 18. The tribute was the thing, and, for the sake of that, Adoram was the person, they most complained of; the very sight of him, whose name was odious among them, exasperated them, and made them outrageous. He was one whom they could not so much as give a patient hearing to, but stoned him to death in a popular tumult. Rehoboam was now as unhappy in the choice of his ambassador, as before of his counsellors. 2. Some think he was also unad-vised, in quitting his ground, and making so much haste to Jerusalem, for thereby he deserted his friends, and gave advantage to his enemies, who had gone to their tents indeed, (v. 16.) in disgust, but did not offer to make Jeroboam king, till Rehoboam was gone, v. 20. See how soon this foolish prince went from one extreme to the other. He hectorred and talked big, when he thought all was his own, but sunk, and looked very mean, when he saw himself in danger. It is common for those that are most haughty in their prosperity, to be most abject in adversity.

III. God forbade his attempt to recover what he had lost by the sword. What was done, was of God, who would not suffer, 1. That it should be undone again, as it would be, if Rehoboam got the better, and reduced the ten tribes. Nor, 2. That more should be done to the prejudice of the house of David, as would be, if Jeroboam should get the better, and conquer the two tribes. The thing must rest as it is, and therefore God forbids the battle.

(1.) It was brave in Rehoboam, to design the reducing of the revoltors by force. His courage came to him, when he was come to Jerusalem, v. 21. There he thought himself among his fast friends, who generously adhered to him, and appeared for him. Judah and Benjamin (who feared the Lord and the king, and meddled not with them that were given to change) presently raised an army of 180,000 men, for the recovery of their king's right to the ten tribes, and were resolved to stand by him (as we say) with their lives and fortunes; having either not such cause, or rather not such a disposition, to complain as the rest had.

(2.) It was more brave in Rehoboam, to desist, when God, by a prophet, ordered him to lay down his arms. He would not lose a kingdom tamely, for then he had been unworthy the title of a prince; and yet he would not contend for it, in opposition to God, for then he had been unworthy the title of an Israelite. To proceed in this war, would be not only to fight against their brethren, (v. 24.) whom they ought to love, but to fight against their God, whom they ought to submit to; This thing is from me. These two considerations should reconcile us to our losses and troubles, that God is the Author of them, and our brethren are the instruments of them, let us not therefore meditate revenge. Rehoboam, and his people, hearken to the word of the Lord, disbanded the army, and acquiesced. Though, in human probability, they had a fair prospect of success; for their army was numerous and resolute, Jeroboam's party weak and unsettled: though it would turn to their reproach among their neighbours, to lose so much of their strength, and never have one push for it, to make a flourish, and do nothing; yet, [1.] They regarded the command of God, though sent by a poor prophet. When we know God's mind, we must submit to it, how much soever it crosses our own mind. [2.] They consulted their own interest; concluding that though they had all the advantages, even that of right, on their side, yet they could not prosper, if they fought in disobedience to God: it was better to sit still, than to rise up and fall. In the next reign, God allowed them to fight, and gave them victory, (2 Chron. 13.) but not now.

25. Then Jeroboam built Shechem in mount Ephraim, and dwelt therein; and went out from thence, and built Penuel. 26. And Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David: 27. If this people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the LORD at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people turn again unto their lord, even unto Rehoboam king of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again to Rehoboam king of Judah. 28. Whereupon the king took counsel, and made two calves of gold, and said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. 29. And he set the one in Beth-el, and the other put he in Dan. 30. And this thing became a sin: for the people went to worship, before the one, even unto Dan. 31. And he made a house of high places, and made priests of the lowest of the people, which were not of the sons of Levi. 32. And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month, on the fifteenth day of the month, like unto the feast that is in Judah, and he offered upon the altar, (so did he in Beth-el,) sacrificing unto the calves that he had made: and he placed in Beth-el the priests of the high places which he had made. 33. So he offered upon the altar which he had made in Beth-el, the fifteenth day of the eighth month, even in the month which he had devised of his own heart; and ordained a feast unto the children of Israel: and he offered upon the altar, and burnt incense.

We have here the beginning of the reign of Jeroboam. He built Shechem first, and then Peniel—beautified and fortified them, and probably, had a palace in each of them for himself; (v. 25.) the former in Ephraim, the latter in Gad, on the other side Jordan. This might be proper; but he formed another project for the establishing of his kingdom, which was fatal to the interests of religion in it.

I. That which he designed, was, by some effectual means to secure those to himself, who had now chosen him their king, and to prevent their return to the house of David, v. 26, 27. It seems, 1. He was jealous of the people, afraid that, some time or other, they would kill him, and go again to Rehoboam. Many that have been advanced in one tumult, have been hurled down in another. Jeroboam could not put any confidence in the affections of his people, though now they seemed extremely fond of him: for what is got by wrong and usurpation, cannot be enjoyed or kept with any security or satisfaction. 2. He was distrustful of the promise of God; could not take his word, that if he would keep close to his duty, God would build him a sure house, (ch. 11. 38.) but he would contrive ways and means, and sinful ones too, for his own safety. A practical disbelief of God's all-sufficiency, is at the bottom of all our treacherous departures from him.

II. The way he took to do this, was, by keeping the people from going up to Jerusalem to worship. That was the place God had chosen to put his name there; Solomon's temple was there, which God had, in the sight of all Israel, and in the memory of many now living, taken solemn possession of, in a cloud of glory. At the altar there, the priests of the Lord attended, there all Israel were to keep the feasts, and thither they were to bring their sacrifices.

Now, 1. Jeroboam apprehended that if the people continued to do this, they would, in time, return to the house of David, allured by the magnificence both of the court and of the temple. If they cleave to their old religion, they will go back to their old king. We may suppose, if he had treated with Rehoboam for the safe conduct of himself and his people to and from Jerusalem, at the times appointed for their solemn feasts, it would not have been denied him; therefore he fears not their being driven back by force, but their going back to Rehoboam.

2. He therefore dissuaded them from going up to Jerusalem, pretending to consult their ease; "It is too much for you to go so far to worship God, (v. 28.) it is a heavy yoke, and it is time to shake it off; you have gone long enough to Jerusalem." So some read it; "The temple, now that you are used to it, does not appear so glorious and sacred as it did at first:" (sensible glories wither, by degrees, in men's estimation:) "you have freed yourselves from other burthens, free yourselves from this; why should we now be tied to one place any more than in Samuel's time?"

3. He provided for the assistance of their devotion at home. Upon consultation had with some of his politicians, he came to this resolve, To set up two golden calves, as tokens or signs of the divine presence; and persuaded the people they might as well stay at home, and offer sacrifice to those, as go to Jerusalem to worship before the ark; and some are so charitable as to think they were made to represent the mercy-seat, and the cherubims over the ark. But, more probably, he learnt it of the Egyptians, in whose land he had sojourned for some time, and who worshipped their god Apis, under the similitude of a bull or calf. (1.) He would not be at the charge of building a golden temple, as Solomon had done; two golden calves are the most that he can afford. (2.) He intended, no doubt, by these to represent, or rather make present, not any false god, as Moloch or Chemosh, but the true God only, the God of Israel, the God that brought them up out of the land of Egypt, as he declares, v. 28. So that it was no violation of the first commandment, but the second. And he chose thus to engage the people's devotion, because he knew there were many among them, so in love with images, that, for the sake of the calves, they would willingly quit God's temple, where all images were forbidden. (3.) He set up two, by degrees to break people off from the belief of the unity of the god-head, which would pave the way to the polytheism of the Pagans. He set up these two at Dan, and Beth-el, one the utmost border of his country northward, the other southward, as if they were the guardians and protectors of the kingdom. Beth-el lay close to Judah: he set up one there, to tempt those of Rehoboam's subjects over to him, who were inclined to image-worship, in lieu of those of his subjects, that would continue to go to Jerusalem. He set up the other at Dan, for the convenience of those that lay most remote, and because Micah's images had been set up there, and great veneration paid to them for many ages, Judg. 18. 30. Beth-el signifies the house of God, which gave some colour to the superstition; but the prophet called it Beth-aven, the house of vanity, or iniquity.

4. The people complied with him herein, and were fond enough of the novelty; they went to worship before the one, even unto Dan, (v. 30.) to that of Dan first, because it was first set up; or even to that at Dan, though it lay such a great way off. They that thought it much to go to Jerusalem, to worship God according to his institution, made no difficulty of going twice as far, to Dan, to worship him according to their own inventions. Or, they are said to go to one of the calves at Dan, because Abijah, king of Judah, within twenty years, recovered Beth-el, (2 Chron. 13. 19.) and, it is likely, removed the golden calf, or forbade the use of it, and then they had only that at Dan to go to. This became a sin; and a great sin it was, against the express letter of the second commandment. God had sometimes dispensed with the law concerning worshipping in one place, but never allowed the worship of him by images. Hereby they justified their fathers in making the calf at Horeb, though God had so fully shown his displeasure against them for it, and threatened to visit for it in the day of visitation, Exod. 32. 34. So that it was as great a contempt of God's wrath as it was of his law; and thus they added sin to sin. Bishop Patrick quotes a saying of the Jews, That till Jeroboam's time the Israelites sucked but one calf, but from that time they sucked two.

5. Having set up the gods, he fitted up accommodations for them: wherein he varied from the divine appointment, we are here told; which intimates that, in other things, he imitated what was done in Judah, (v. 32.) as well as he could. See how one error multiplied into many.

(1.) He made a house of high places, or of altars; one temple at Dan, we may suppose, and another at Beth-el, (v. 31.) and in each many altars, probably, complaining of it as an inconvenience, that in the temple of Jerusalem there was but one. The multiplying of altars passed with some for a piece of devotion, but God, by the prophet, puts another construction upon it; (Hos. 8. 11.) Ephraim has made many altars to sin.

(2.) He made priests of the lowest of the people; and the lowest of the people were good enough to be priests to his calves, and too good. He made priests from the extremest parts of the people, that is, some out of every corner of the country, whom he ordered to reside among their neighbours, to instruct them in his appointments, and reconcile them to them. Thus were they dispersed as the Levites, but were not of the sons of Levi. But the priests of the high places, or altars, he ordered to reside in Beth-el, as the priests at Jerusalem, (v. 32.) to attend the public service.

(3.) The feast of tabernacles, which God had appointed on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, he adjourned to the fifteenth of the eighth month, (v. 32.) the month which he devised of his own heart, to show his power in ecclesiastical matters, v. 33. The passover and pentecost he observed in their proper season, or did not observe them at all, or with little solemnity in comparison with this.

(4.) He himself assuming a power to make priests, no marvel if he undertook to do the priests' work with his own hands: He offered upon the altar twice; it is mentioned, v. 32, 33, as also that he burnt incense. This was connived at in him, because it was of a piece with the rest of his irregularities; but in king Uzziah it was immediately punished with the plague of leprosy. He did it himself, to make him look great among the people, and to get the reputation of a devout man; also to grace the solemnity of his new festival, with which it is likely, at this time, he joined the feast of the dedication of his altar.

And thus, [1.] Jeroboam sinned himself; yet perhaps excused himself to the world and his own conscience, with this, that he did not do so ill as Solomon did, who worshipped other gods. [2.] He made Israel to sin, drew them off from the worship of God, and entailed idolatry upon their seed. And hereby they were punished for deserting the thrones of the house of David.

The learned Mr. Whiston, in his chronology for the adjusting of the annals of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, supposes that Jeroboam changed the calculation of the year, and made it to contain but eleven months, and that by those years the reigns of the kings of Israel are measured, till Jehu's revolution, and no longer; in which interval, eleven years of the annals of Judah answer to twelve in those of Israel.

CHAP. XIII.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, we left Jeroboam attending his altar at Beth-el, and there we find him the beginning of this, when he received a testimony from God against his idolatry and apostasy. This was sent him by a prophet, a man of God that lived in Judah, who is the principal subject of the story of this chapter, where we are told, I. What passed between him and the new king. 1. The prophet threatened Jeroboam's altar, (v. 1, 2.) and gave him a sign, (v. 3.) which immediately came to pass, v. 5. 2. The king threatened the prophet, and was himself made another sign, by the withering of his hand, (v. 4.) and the restoring of it, upon his submission, and the prophet's intercession, v. 6. 3. The prophet refused the kindness offered him thereupon, v. 7. 10. II. What passed between him and the old prophet. 1. The old prophet fetched him back by a lie, and gave him entertainment, v. 11. 19. 2. He, for accepting it, in disobedience to the divine command, is threatened with death, v. 20. 22. And 3. The threatening is executed, for he is slain by a lion, (v. 23, 24.) and buried at Beth-el, v. 25. 32. 4. Jeroboam is hardened in his idolatry, v. 33, 34. Thy judgments, Lord, are a great deep.

1. AND, behold, there came a man of God out of Judah by the word of the LORD unto Beth-el: and Jeroboam stood by the altar to burn incense. 2. And he cried against the altar in the word of the LORD, and said, O altar, altar! thus saith the LORD, Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name; and upon thee shall he offer the priests of the high places that burn incense upon thee, and men's bones shall be burnt upon thee. 3. And he gave a sign the same day, saying, This is the sign which the LORD hath spoken; Behold, the altar shall be rent, and the ashes that are upon it shall be poured out. 4. And it came to pass, when king Jeroboam heard the saying of the man of God, which had cried against the altar in Beth-el, that he put forth his hand from the altar, saying, Lay hold on him. And his hand, which he put forth against him, dried up, so that he could not pull it in again to him. 5. The altar also was rent, and the ashes poured out from the altar, according to the sign which the man of God had given by the word of the LORD. 6. And the king answered and said unto the man of God, Entreat now the face of the LORD thy God, and pray for me, that my hand may be restored me again. And the man of God besought the LORD, and the king's hand was restored again, and became as it was before. 7. And the king said unto the man of God, Come home with me, and refresh thyself, and I will give thee a reward. 8. And the man of God said unto the king, If thou wilt give me half thine house I will not go in with thee, neither will I eat bread nor drink water in this place: 9. For so was it charged me by the word of the LORD, saying, Eat no bread, nor drink water, nor turn again by the same way that thou camest. 10. So he went another way, and returned not by the way that he came to Beth-el.

Here is,

I. A messenger sent to Jeroboam, to signify to him God's displeasure against his idolatry, v. 1. The army of Judah that aimed to ruin him, was countermanded, and might not draw a sword against him; (ch. 12. 24.) but a prophet of Judah is, instead thereof, sent to reclaim him from his evil way, and is sent in time, while he is but dedicating his altar, before his heart is hardened by the deceitfulness of his sin, for God delights not in the death of sinners, but would rather they would turn, and live. How bold was the messenger, that durst attack the king in his pride, and interrupt the solemnity he was proud of! They that go on God's errand, must not fear the face of man; they know who will bear them out. How kind was He that sent him to warn Jeroboam of the wrath of God revealed from heaven against his ungodliness and unrighteousness!

II. The message delivered in God's name, not whispered, but cried with a loud voice, denoting both the prophet's courage, that he was neither afraid nor ashamed to own it, and his earnestness, that he desired to be heard and heeded by all that were present, who were not a few, on this great occasion. It is directed, not to Jeroboam, or to the people, but to the altar, the stones of which will sooner hear and yield, than they who were mad upon their idols, and deaf to divine calls. Yet, in threatening the altar, he threatens the founder and worshippers, to whom it is as dear as their own souls, and who might conclude, "If God's wrath fasten upon the lifeless guiltless altar, how shall we escape?" That which is foretold concerning the altar, (v. 2.) is, that, in process of time, a prince of the house of David, Josiah by name, should pollute this altar by sacrificing the idolatrous priests themselves upon it, and burning the bones of dead men. Let Jeroboam know, and be sure, 1. That the altar he now consecrated, should be desecrated. Idolatrous worship will not continue, but the word of the Lord will endure for ever. 2. That the priests of the high places he now made, should themselves be made sacrifices to the justice of God, and the first and only sacrifices upon this altar that would be pleasing to him. If the offering be such as is an abomination to God, it would follow, of course, that the offerers must themselves fall under his wrath, which will abide upon them, since it is not otherwise remitted. 3. That this should be done by a branch of the house of David. That family which he and his kingdom had despised, and treacherously deserted, should recover so much power as to demolish that altar which he thought to establish; so that right and truth should, at length, prevail both in civil and sacred matters, notwithstanding the present triumphs of those that were given to change the fear both of God and the king. It was about 356 years, ere this prediction was fulfilled, yet it was spoken of as sure and nigh at hand, for a thousand years with God are but as one day. Nothing more contingent and arbitrary than the giving of names to persons, yet Josiah is here named above 300 years before he was born. Nothing future is hidden from God. There are names in the book of the divine prescience, (Phil. 4. 3.) names written in heaven.

III. A sign is given for the confirming of the truth of this prediction, that the altar should be shaken to pieces by an invisible power, and the ashes of the sacrifice scattered, (v. 3.) which came to pass immediately, v. 5. This was, 1. A proof that the prophet was sent of God, who confirmed the word with this sign following, Mark 16. 20. 2. A present indication of God's displeasure against these idolatrous sacrifices. How could the gift be acceptable, when the altar that should sanctify it, was an abomination? 3. It was a reproach to the people, whose hearts were harder than these stones, and rent not under the word of the Lord. 4. It was a specimen of what should be done to it in the accomplishment of this prophecy by Joshua; it was now rent, in token of its being then ruined.

IV. Jeroboam's hand withered, which he stretched out to seize or smite the man of God, v. 4. Instead of trembling at the message, as he might well have done, he assaulted him that brought it, in defiance of the wrath of which he was warned, and contempt of that grace which sent him the warning. Rebuke a sinner, and he will hate thee, and do thee a mischief if he can; yet God's prophets must rather expose themselves than betray their trust: he that employs them, will protect them, and restrain the wrath of man, as he did Jeroboam's here, by withering his hand, so that he could neither hurt the prophet, nor draw it in to help himself. When his hand was stretched out to burn incense to his calves, it was not withered; but when it was stretched out against a prophet, he shall have no use of it, till he humble himself. Of all the wickedness of the wicked, there is none more provoking to God than their malicious attempts against his prophets, of whom he has said, Touch them not, do them no harm. As this was a punishment of Jeroboam, and answering to the sin, so it was the deliverance of the prophet. God has many ways of disabling the enemies of his church to execute their mischievous purposes. Jeroboam's inability to pull in his hand, made him a spectacle to all about him, that they might see and fear. If God, in justice, harden the hearts of sinners, so that the hand they have stretched out in sin, they cannot pull in again by repentance, that is a spiritual judgment, represented by this, and much more dreadful.

V. The sudden healing of the hand that was suddenly dried up, upon his submission, v. 6. That word of God which should have touched his conscience, humbled him not, but this which touched his bone and his flesh, brings down his proud spirit. He looks for help now, 1. Not from his calves, but from God only, from his power and his favour. He wounded, and no hand but his can make whole. 2. Not by his own sacrifice or incense, but by the prayer and intercession of the prophet, whom he had just now threatened, and aimed to destroy. The time may come, when those that hate the preaching, would be glad of the prayers, of faithful ministers. "Pray to the Lord thy God," says Jeroboam; "thou hast an interest in him, improve it for me." But observe, He does not desire him to pray that his sin might be pardoned, and his heart changed, only that his hand might be restored; thus Pharaoh would have Moses to pray that God would take away this death only, (Exod. 10. 17.) not this sin. The prophet, as became a man of God, renders good for evil, upbraids not Jeroboam with his impotent malice, nor triumphs in his submission, but immediately addresses himself to God for him. Those only are entitled to the blessing Christ pronounced on the persecuted, that learn of him to pray for their persecutors, Matth. 5. 10, 44. When the prophet thus honoured God, by showing himself of a forgiving spirit, God put this further honour upon him, that, at his word, he recalled the judgment, and by another miracle healed the withered hand; that by the goodness of God Jeroboam might be led to repentance, and if he were not broken by the judgment; yet might be melted by the mercy. With both he seemed affected for the present, but the impressions wore off.

VI. The prophet's refusal of Jeroboam's kind invitation: in which observe, 1. That God forbade his messenger to eat or drink in Beth-el, (v. 9.) to show his detestation of their execrable idolatry, and apostasy from God, and to teach us not to have fellowship with the works of darkness, lest we have infection from them, or give encouragement to them. He must not turn back the same way, but deliver his message, as it were, in transitu—as he passes along. He shall not seem to be sent on purpose, (they were unworthy such a favour,) but as if he only called by the way, his spirit being stirred, like Paul's at Athens, as he passed, and saw their devotions. God would, by this command, try his prophet, as he did Ezekiel, whether he would not be rebellious, like that rebellious house, Ezek. 2. 8. 2. That Jeroboam was so affected with the cure of his hand, that though we read not of his thanksgivings to God for the mercy, or of his sending an offering to the altar at Jerusalem, in acknowledgment of it, yet he was willing to express his gratitude to the prophet, and pay him for his prayers, v. 7. Favours to the body will make even graceless men seem grateful to good ministers. 3. That the prophet, though hungry and weary, and, perhaps, poor, in obedience to the divine command, refused both the entertainment, and the reward, proffered him. He might have supposed his acceptance of it would give him an opportunity of discoursing further with the king, in order to his effectual reformation, now that he was convinced; yet he will not think himself wiser than God, but, like a faithful careful messenger, hastens home when he has done his errand. They have little learned the lesson of self-denial, that cannot forbear one forbidden meal.

11. Now there dwelt an old prophet in Beth-el; and his sons came and told him all the works that the man of God had done that day in Beth-el: the words which he had spoken unto the king, them they told also to their father. 12. And their father said unto them, What way went he? For his sons had seen what way the man of God went which came from Judah. 13. And he said unto his sons, Saddle me the ass. So they saddled him the ass, and he rode thereon, 14. And went after the man of God, and found him sitting under an oak: and he said unto him, Art thou the man of God that camest from Judah? And he said, I am. 15. Then he said unto him, Come home with me, and eat bread. 16. And he said, I may not return with thee, nor go in with thee; neither will I eat bread nor drink water with thee in this place: 17. For it was said to me by the word of the LORD, Thou shalt eat no bread nor drink water there, nor turn again to go by the way that thou camest. 18. He said unto him, I am a prophet also as thou art; and an angel spake unto me by the word of the LORD, saying, Bring him back with thee into thine house, that he may eat bread and drink water. But he lied unto him. 19. So he went back with him, and did eat bread in his house, and drank water. 20. And it came to pass, as they sat at the table, that the word of the LORD came unto the prophet that brought him back: 21. And he cried unto the man of God that came from Judah, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the LORD, and hast not kept the commandment which the LORD thy God commanded thee, 22. But camest back, and hast eaten bread and drunk water in the place, of which the LORD did say to thee, Eat no bread, and drink no water; thy carcase shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers.

The man of God had honestly and bravely refused the king's invitation, though he promised him a reward; yet was over-persuaded by an old prophet, to come back with him, and dine in Beth-el, contrary to the command given him. Here we find how dear his dinner cost him. Observe with wonder,

I. The old prophet's wickedness. I cannot but call him a false prophet, and a bad man; it being much easier to believe that from one of such a bad character, should be extorted a confirmation of what the man of God said, (as we find, v. 32.) than that a true prophet, and a good man, should tell such a deliberate lie as he did, and father it upon God. A good tree could never bring forth such corrupt fruit. Perhaps, he was trained up, among the sons of the prophets, in one of Samuel's colleges not far off, whence he retained the name of a prophet, but, growing worldly and profane, the spirit of prophecy was departed from him. If he had been a good prophet, he would have reproved Jeroboam's idolatry, and not have suffered his sons to attend his altars, as, it should seem, they did.

Now, 1. Whether he had any good design in fetching back the man of God, is not certain. One may hope that he did it, in compassion to him, concluding he wanted refreshment, and out of a desire to be better acquainted with him, and more fully to understand his errand than he could from the report of his sons; yet, his sons having told him all that passed, and particularly that the prophet was forbidden to eat or drink there, which he had openly told Jeroboam, it is supposed to have been done with a bad design, to draw him into a snare, and so to expose him; for false prophets have ever been the worst enemies to the true prophets, usually aiming to destroy them, but sometimes, as here, to debauch them, and draw them from their duty. Thus they gave the Nazarites wine to drink, (Amos 2. 12.) that they might glory in their fall.

But, 2. It is certain that he took a very bad method to bring him back. When the man of God had told him, "I may not, and therefore I will not, return to eat bread with thee;" (his resolutions concurring with the divine command, v. 16, 17.) he wickedly pretended that he had an order from heaven to fetch him back; he imposed upon him his former character as a prophet, I am a prophet also as thou art; he pretended he had a vision of an angel that sent him on this errand; but it was all a lie, it was a banter upon prophecy, and profane in the highest degree. When this old prophet is spoken of, (2 Kings 23. 18.) he is called the prophet that came out of Samaria, whereas there was no such place as Samaria, till long after; (ch. 16. 24.)

therefore I take it he is so called there, though he was at Beth-el, because he was like those who were afterward the prophets of Samaria, who caused God's people Israel to err, Jer. 23. 13.

II. The good prophet's weakness, in suffering himself to be thus imposed upon; He went back with him, v. 19. He that had resolution enough to refuse the invitation of the king, who promised him a reward, could not resist the insinuations of one that pretended to be a prophet; good people are more in danger of being drawn from their duty by the plausible pretences of divinity and sanctity than by external inducements; we have therefore need to beware of false prophets, and not believe every spirit.

III. The proceedings of divine justice, hereupon; and here we may well wonder that the wicked prophet, who told the lie, and did the mischief, went unpunished, while the holy man of God, that was drawn by him into sin, was suddenly and severely punished for it. What shall we make of this? The judgments of God are unfathomable; the deceived and the deceiver are his, and he giveth not account of any of his matters: certainly there must be a judgment to come, when these things will be called over again, and when those that sinned most, and suffered least, in this world, will receive according to their works. 1. The message delivered to the man of God was strange; his crime is recited; (v. 21, 22.) it was, in one word, disobedience to an express command; judgment is given upon it, Thy carcass shall not come to the sepulchre of thy fathers; that is, "Thou shalt never reach thy own house, but shalt be a carcass quickly, nor shall thy dead body be brought to the place of thy fathers' sepulchres, to be interred." 2. Yet it was more strange that the old prophet himself should be the messenger: of this we can give no account, but that God would have it so, as he spake to Balaam by his ass, and read Saul his doom by the Devil in Samuel's likeness; we may think God designed hereby, (1.) To startle the lying prophet, and make him sensible of his sin; the message could not but affect him the more, when he himself had the delivering of it, and had so strong an impression made upon his spirit by it, that he cried out, as one in an agony, v. 21. He had reason to think, if he must die for his disobedience in a small matter, who sinned by surprise, of how much sorer punishment he should be thought worthy, who had belied an angel of God, and cheated a man of God, by a deliberate forgery. If this were done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry? Perhaps, it had a good effect upon him; those who preach God's wrath to others, have hard hearts indeed, if they fear it not themselves. (2.) To put the greater mortification upon the prophet that was deceived, and to show what they must expect, who hearken to the great deceiver, they that yield to him as a tempter, will be terrified by him as a tormentor; whom he now fawns upon, he will afterward fly upon, and whom he draws into sin, he will do what he can to drive to despair.

23. And it came to pass, after he had eaten bread, and after he had drunk, that he saddled for him the ass, to wit, for the prophet whom he had brought back. 24. And when he was gone, a lion met him by the way, and slew him; and his carcass was cast in the way, and the ass stood by it, the lion also stood by the carcass. 25. And, behold, men passed by, and saw the carcass cast in the way, and the lion standing by the carcass: and they came and told it in the city where the old prophet dwelt. 26. And when the prophet that brought him back from the way heard thereof, he said, It is the man of God, who was disobedient unto the word of the LORD; therefore the LORD hath delivered him unto the lion, which hath torn him, and slain him, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake unto him. 27. And he spake to his sons, saying, Saddle me the ass. And they saddled him. 28. And he went, and found his carcass cast in the way, and the ass and the lion standing by the carcass: the lion had not eaten the carcass, nor torn the ass. 29. And the prophet took up the carcass of the man of God, and laid it upon the ass, and brought it back: and the old prophet came to the city, to mourn and to bury him. 30. And he laid his carcass in his own grave; and they mourned over him, saying, Alas, my brother! 31. And it came to pass, after he had buried him, that he spake to his sons, saying, When I am dead, then bury me in the sepulchre wherein the man of God is buried; lay my bones beside his bones: 32. For the saying which he cried by the word of the LORD against the altar in Beth-el, and against all the houses of the high places which are in the cities of Samaria, shall surely come to pass. 33. After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places: whosoever would, he consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places. 34. And this thing became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off, and to destroy it from off the face of the earth

Here is,

I. The death of the deceived disobedient prophet. The old prophet that had deluded him, as if he would make him some amends for the wrong he had done him, or help to prevent the mischief threatened him, furnished him with an ass to ride home on; but, by the way, a lion set upon him, and killed him, v. 23, 24. He did but turn back to refresh himself when he was hungry, and behold, he must die for it; see 1 Sam. 14. 43. But we must consider, 1. That his offence was great, and it would, by no means, justify him, that he was drawn into it by a lie; he could not be so certain of the countermand sent by another, as he was of the command given to himself; nor had he any ground to think that the command would be recalled, when the reason of it remained in force, which was, that he might testify his detestation of the wickedness of that place. He had great reason to suspect the honesty of this old prophet, who did not himself bear his testimony, nor did God think fit to make use of him, as a witness against the idolatry of the city he lived in: however, he should have taken time to beg direction from God, and not have complied so soon. Did he think this old prophet's house safer to eat in than other houses at Beth-el, when God had forbidden him to eat in any? That was to refine upon the command, and make himself wiser than God. Did he think to excuse himself, that he was hungry? Had he never read, that man lives not by bread alone? 2. That his death was for the glory of God; for by this it appeared, (1.) That nothing is more provoking to him than disobedience to an express command, though in a small matter, which makes his proceedings against our first parents, for eating forbidden fruit, the easier to be accounted for. (2.) That God is displeased at the sins of his own people, and no man shall be protected in disobedience by the sanctity of his profession, the dignity of his office, his nearness to God, or any good services he has done for him. Perhaps, God, by this, intended, in a way of righteous judgment, to harden Jeroboam's heart, since he was not reformed by the withering of his hand: for he would be apt to make a bad use of it, and to say that the prophet was well enough served for meddling with his altar, he had better have staid at home; nay, he would say that Providence had punished him for his insolence, and the lion had done that which his withered hand might not do; however, by this he intended to warn all those whom he employs, strictly to observe their orders, at their peril.

II. The wonderful preservation of his dead body, which was a token of God's mercy remembered in the midst of wrath; the lion that gently strangled him, or tore him, did not devour his dead body, nor so much as tear the ass, v. 24, 25, 28. Nay, what was more, he did not set upon the travellers that passed by, and saw it, nor upon the old prophet, (who had reason enough to fear it,) when he came to take up the corpse; his commission was, to kill the prophet, hitherto he should go, but no further: thus God showed that though he was angry with him, his anger was turned away, and the punishment went no further than death.

III. The care which the old prophet took of his burial; when he heard of the unusual accident, he concluded it was the man of God, who was disobedient to his Master, (and whose fault was that?) therefore the Lord has delivered him to the lion, v. 26. It had well become him to have asked why the lion was not sent against him and his house, rather than against the good man whom he had cheated. He took up the carcase, v. 29. If there were any truth in the vulgar opinion, surely the corpse bled afresh, when he touched it, for he was, in effect, the murderer, and it was but a poor reparation for the injury, to inter the dead body: perhaps, when he cheated him into his ruin, he intended to laugh at him; yet now his conscience so far relents, that he weeps over him, and, like Joab at Abner's funeral, is compelled to be a mourner for him whom he had been the death of; they said, Alas, my brother! v. 30. The case was indeed very lamentable, that so good a man, a prophet so faithful, and so bold in God's cause, should, for one offence, die as a criminal, while an old lying prophet lives at ease, and an idolatrous prince in pomp and power. Thy way, O God, is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters. We cannot judge of men by their sufferings, nor of sins by their present punishments; with some, the flesh is destroyed, that the spirit may be saved, while with others, the flesh is pampered, that the soul may ripen for hell.

IV. The charge which the old prophet gave his sons concerning his own burial, that they should be sure to bury him in the same grave where the man of God was buried; (v. 31.) "Lay my bones beside his bones, close by them as near as may be, so that my dust may mingle with his;" though he was a lying prophet, yet he desired to die the death of a true prophet; "Gather not my soul with the sinners of Beth-el, but with this man of God." The reason he gives, is, because what he cried against the altar of Beth-el, that men's bones should be burnt upon it, shall surely come to pass, v. 32. Thus, 1. He ratifies the prediction, that out of the mouth of two witnesses, (and one of them such a one as St. Paul quotes, Titus 1. 12, one of themselves, even a prophet of their own,) the word might be established, if possible, to convince and reclaim Jeroboam. 2. He does honour to the deceased prophet, as one whose word would not fall to the ground, though he did; ministers die, die prematurely it may be; but the word of the Lord endures for ever, and does not die with them. 3. He consults his own interest; it was foretold that men's bones should be burnt upon Jeroboam's altar; "Lay mine" (says he) "close to his, and then they will not be disturbed;" and it was, accordingly, their security, as we find, 2 Kings 23. 18. Sleeping and waking, living and dying, it is safe being in good company. No mention is made here of the inscription on the prophet's tomb; but it is spoken of 2 Kings 23. 17. where Josiah asks, What title is that? And is told, It is the sepulchre of the man of God, that came from Judah, who proclaimed these things which thou hast done: so that the epitaph upon the prophet's grave preserved the remembrance of his prophecy, and was a standing testimony against the idolatries of Beth-el, which it would not have been, so remarkably, if he had died, and been buried elsewhere. The cities of Israel are here called cities of Samaria, though that name was not yet known; for, however the old prophet spake, the inspired historian wrote in the language of his own time.

V. The obstinacy of Jeroboam in his idolatry; (v. 33.) He returned not from his evil way; some hand was found, that durst repair the altar God had rent, and then Jeroboam offered sacrifice on it again, and the more boldly, because the prophet who disturbed him before, was in his grave, (Rev. 11. 10.) and because the prophecy was for a great while to come. Various methods had been used to reclaim him, but neither threats nor signs, neither judgments nor mercies, wrought upon him, so strangely was he wedded to his calves; he did not reform, no not his priesthood, but whoever would, he filled his hand, and made him priest, though ever so illiterate or immoral, and of what tribe soever; and this became sin, that is, a snare first, and then a ruin, to Jeroboam's house, to cut it off, v. 34. Note, The diminution, disquiet, and desolation, of families, are the fruit of sin; he promised himself that the calves would secure the crown to his family, but it proved they lost it, and sunk his family. Those betray themselves, that think by any sin to support themselves.

CHAP. XIV.

The kingdom being divided into that of Judah and that of Israel, we must, henceforward, in these books of Kings, expect and attend their separate history, the succession of their kings, and the affairs of their kingdoms, accounted for distinctly. In this chapter, we have, I. The prophecy of the destruction of Jeroboam's house, v. 7. . 16. The sickness of his child was the occasion of it, (v. 1. . 6.) and the death of his child the earnest of it; (v. 17, 18.) together with the conclusion of his reign, v. 19, 20. 11. The history of the declension and diminution of Jeroboam's house and his kingdom, (v. 21. . 23.) and the conclusion of his reign, v. 29. . 31.) In both which, we may read the mischievous consequences of sin, and the calamities it brings on kingdoms and families.

1. AT that time Abijah the son of Jeroboam fell sick. 2. And Jeroboam said to his wife, Arise, I pray thee, and disguise thyself, that thou be not known to be the wife of Jeroboam; and get thee to Shiloh: behold, there is Abijah the prophet, which told me that I should be king over this people. 3. And take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruse of honey, and go to him: he shall tell thee what shall become of the child. 4. And Jeroboam's wife did so, and arose, and went to Shiloh; and came to the house of Ahijah. But Ahijah could not see, for his eyes were set by reason of his age. 5. And the LORD said unto Ahijah, Behold, the wife of Jeroboam cometh to ask a thing of thee for her son, for he is sick: thus and thus shalt thou say unto her; for it shall be, when she cometh in, that she shall feign herself to be another woman. 6. And it was so, when Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, as she came in at the door, that he said, Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam; why feignest thou thyself to be another? for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.

How Jeroboam persisted in his contempt of God and religion, we read in the close of the foregoing chapter: here we are told how God proceeded in his controversy with him; for when God judges, he will overcome, and sinners shall either bend, or break, before him.

I. His child fell sick, v. 1. It is probable that he was his eldest son, and heir-apparent to the crown; for, at his death, all the kingdom went into mourning for him, v. 13. Neither his dignity as a prince, nor his age as a young prince, nor his interest in heaven as a pious prince, could exempt him from sickness, dangerous sickness; let none be secure of the continuance of their health, but improve it, while it continues, for the best purposes; Lord, behold he, whom thou lovest, thy favourite, he whom Israel loves, their darling, is sick. At that time, when Jeroboam prostituted and profaned the priesthood, (ch. 13. 33.) his child sickened; when sickness comes into our families, we should inquire whether there be not some particular sin harboured in our houses, which the affliction is sent to convince us of, and reclaim us from.

II. He sent his wife in disguise to inquire of Ahijah the prophet, what should become of the child, v. 2, 3. The sickness of his child touched him in a tender part; the withering of this branch of the family, would, perhaps, be as sore an affliction to him as the withering of that branch of his body, ch. 13. 4. such is the force of natural affection; our children are ourselves but once removed.

Now, 1. Jeroboam's great desire, under this affliction, is, to know what shall become of the child, whether he will live or die. (1.) It had been more prudent, if he had desired to know what means they should use for the recovery of the child, what they should give him, and what they should do to him; but, by this instance, and that of Ahaziah, 2 Kings 1. 2. and Ben-hadad, 2 Kings 8. 8. it should seem, they had then such a foolish notion of fatality, as took them off from all use of means; for if they were sure the patient would live, they thought means needless; if he would die, they thought them useless; not considering that duty is our's, events are God's, and that he that ordained the end, ordained the means. Why should a prophet be desired to show that which a little time will show? (2.) It had been more pious, if he had desired to know wherefore God contended with him, had begged the prophet's prayers, and cast away his idols from him; then the child might have been restored to him, as his hand was; but most people would rather be told their fortune, than their faults or their duty.

2. That he might know the child's doom, he sent to Ahijah the prophet, who lived obscure and neglected in Shiloh, blind through age, yet still blessed with the visions of the Almighty, which need not bodily eyes, but are rather favoured by the want of them, the eyes of the mind being then most intent, and least diverted. Jeroboam sent not to him for advice about the setting up of his calves, or the consecrating of his priests, but has recourse to him in his distress, when the gods he served, could give him no relief; Lord, in trouble have they visited thee, who before slighted thee; some have by sickness been reminded of their forgotten ministers, and praying friends: he sends to Ahijah, because he had told him he should be king, v. 2. He was once the messenger of good tidings, surely he will be so again; those that by sin disqualify themselves for comfort, and yet expect their ministers, because they are good men, should speak peace and comfort to them, greatly wrong both themselves and their ministers.

3. He sent his wife to inquire of the prophet, because she could best put the question without naming names, or making any other description than this, "Sir, I have a son ill; will he recover, or not?" The heart of her husband safely trusted in her, that she would be faithful both in delivering the message, and bringing him the answer; and it seems there were none of all his counsellors, in whom he could repose such a confidence; otherwise, the sick child could very ill have spared her, for mothers are the best nurses, and it had been much fitter for her to have staid at home to tend him, than to go to Shiloh to inquire what would become of him. If she go, she must go incognito—must disguise herself, change her dress, cover her face, and go by another name; not only to conceal herself from her own court, and the country through which she past, (as if it were below her quality to go upon such an errand, and what she had reason to be ashamed of, as Nicodemus that came to Jesus by night, whereas it is no disparagement to the greatest to attend God's prophets,) but also to conceal herself from the prophet himself, that he might only answer her question concerning her son, and not enter upon the unpleasant subject of her husband's defection; thus some people love to prescribe to their ministers, limit them to smooth things, and care not for having the whole counsel of God declared to them, lest it prove to prophesy no good concerning them, but evil. But what a strange notion had Jeroboam of God's prophet, that he believed he could and would certainly tell what would become of the child, and yet either could not, or would not, discover who was the mother; could he see into the thick darkness of futurity, and yet not see through the thin veil of this disguise? Did he think the God of Israel like his calves, just what he pleased? Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

III. God gave Ahijah notice of the approach of Jeroboam's wife, and that she came in disguise, and full instructions what to say to her, (v. 5.) which enabled him, as she came in at the door, to call her by her name, to her great surprise, and so to discover to all about him who she was; (v. 6.) Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam; why feignest thou thyself to be another? He had no regard either, 1. To her rank; she was a queen, but what was that to him, who had a message to deliver her immediately from God, before whom all the children of men stand upon the same level? Nor, 2. To her present; it was usual for those who consulted prophets, to bring them tokens of respect, which they accepted, and yet were no hirelings; she brought him a handsome country present, (v. 3.) but he did not think himself obliged by that to give her any finer language than the nature of her message required. Nor, 3. To her industrious concealment of herself; it is a piece of civility not to take notice of those who desire not to be taken notice of; but the prophet was no courtier nor gave flattering titles; plain dealing is best, and she shall know at the first word, what she has to trust to; I am sent to thee with heavy tidings. Note, Those who think by their disguises to hide themselves from God, will be wretchedly confounded, when they find themselves disappointed in the day of discovery: sinners now appear in the garb of saints, and are taken to be such; but how will they blush and tremble, when they find themselves stripped of their false colours, and are called by their own name; "Go out, thou treacherous false-hearted hypocrite, I never knew thee, why feignest thou thyself to be another?" Tidings of a portion with hypocrites will be heavy tidings; God will judge men according to what they are, not according to what they seem.

7. Go, tell Jeroboam, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Forasmuch as I exalted thee from among the people, and made thee prince over my people Israel, 8. And rent the kingdom away from the house of David, and gave it thee; and yet thou hast not been as my servant David, who kept my commandments, and who followed me with all his heart, to do that only which was right in mine eyes; 9. But hast done evil above all that were before thee: for thou hast gone and made thee other gods, and molten images, to provoke me to anger, and hast cast me behind thy back; 10. Therefore, behold, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam, and will cut off from Jeroboam him that pisseth against the wall, and him that is shut up, and left in Israel, and will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, as a man that taketh away dung, till it be all gone. 11. Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat: for the LORD hath spoken it. 12. Arise thou, therefore, get thee to thine own house; and when thy feet enter into the city, the child shall die. 13. And all Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him: for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward the LORD God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam. 14. Moreover, the LORD shall raise him up a king over Israel, who shall cut off the house of Jeroboam that day: but what? even now. 15. For the LORD shall smite Israel as a reed is shaken in the water, and he shall root up Israel out of this good land which he gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river, because they have made their groves, provoking the LORD to anger. 16. And he shall give Israel up, because of the sins of Jeroboam who did sin, and who made Israel to sin. 17. And Jeroboam's wife arose, and departed, and came to Tirzah: ana when she came to the threshold of the door, the child died. 18. And they buried him; and all Israel mourned for him, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by the hand of his servant Ahijah the prophet. 19. And the rest of the acts of Jeroboam, how he warred, and how he reigned, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel. 20. And the days which Jeroboam reigned were two and twenty years: and he slept with his fathers, and Nadab his son reigned in his stead.

When those that set up idols, and keep them up, go to inquire of the Lord, he determines to answer them, not according to the pretensions of their inquiry, but according to the multitude of their idols; (Ezek. 14. 4) so Jeroboam is answered here. He prevented her inquiry concerning the child, and foretells the ruin of Jeroboam's house for the wickedness of it; no one else durst have carried such a message, a servant would have smothered it, but his own wife cannot be suspected of ill-will to him.

I. God calls himself the Lord God of Israel; though Israel had forsaken God, God had not cast them off, nor given them a bill of divorce for their whoredoms; he is Israel's God, and therefore will take vengeance on him who did them the greatest mischief he could do them, and drew them away from him.

II. He upbraids Jeroboam with the great favour he had bestowed upon him, in making him king, exalting him from among the people, the common people, to be prince over God's chosen Israel, and taking the kingdom from the house of David, to bestow it upon him. Whether we keep an account of God's mercies to us or no, he does, and will set even them in order before us, if we be ungrateful, to our greater confusion; otherwise, he gives, and upbraids not.

III. He charges him with his impiety and apostasy, and his idolatry particularly; Thou hast done evil above all that were before thee, v. 9. Saul, that was rejected, never worshipped idols; Solomon did it but occasionally, in his dotage, and never made Israel to sin; Jeroboam's calves, though pretended to be set up in honour of the God of Israel, that brought them up out of Egypt, yet are here called other gods, or strange gods, because in them he worshipped God, as the heathen worshipped their strange gods; because by them he changed the truth of God into a lie, and represented him as altogether different from what he is; and because many of the ignorant worshippers terminated their devotion in the image, and did not at all regard the God of Israel. Though they were calves of gold, the richness of the metal was so far from making them acceptable to God, that they provoked him to anger; designedly affronted him, under colour of pleasing him. In doing this, 1. He had not set David before him; (v. 8.) Thou hast not been as my servant David; who, though he had his faults, and some bad ones, yet he never forsook the worship of God, nor grew loose or cold to that; his faithful adherence to that gained him this honourable character, that he followed God with all his heart, and herein he was proposed for an example to all his successors; those did not do well, that did not do like David. 2. He had not set God before him; but, (v. 9.) "Thou hast cast me behind thy back, my law, my fear; neglected me, forgotten me, and preferred thy policies before my precepts."

IV. He foretells the utter ruin of Jeroboam's house, v. 10, 11. He thought, by his idolatry, to establish his government, and by that, he not only lost it, but brought destruction upon his family; the universal destruction of all the males, whether shut up or left, married or unmarried. 1. Shameful destruction; they shall be taken away as dung, which is loathsome, and which men are glad to be rid of. He worshipped dunghill-deities, and God removed his family as a great dunghill; noble royal families, if wicked, are no better, in God's account. 2. Unusual destruction; their very dead bodies should be meat for the dogs in the street, or the birds of prey in the field, v. 11. Thus evil pursues sinners. See this fulfilled, ch. 15. 29.

V. He foretells the immediate death of the child that was now sick, v. 12, 13. 1. In mercy to him; lest, if he live, he be infected with the sin, and so involved in the ruin, of his father's house. Observe the character given of him, In him was found some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel, in the house of Jeroboam. He only had an affection for the true worship of God, and disliked the worship of the calves. Note, (1.) Those are good, in whom are good things toward the Lord God of Israel; good inclinations, good intentions, good desires, toward him. (2.) Where there is but some good thing of that kind, it will be found: God that seeks it, sees it, be it ever so little, and is pleased with it. (3.) A little grace goes a great way with great people. It is so rare to find princes well affected to religion, that, when they are so, they are worthy of double honour. (4.) Pious dispositions are, in a peculiar manner, amiable and acceptable, when they are found in those that are young. The divine image, in miniature, has a peculiar beauty and lustre in it. (5.) Those that are good in bad times and places, shine very bright in the eyes of God. A good child in the house of Jeroboam, is a miracle of divine grace: to be there untainted, is like being in the fiery furnace unhurt, unsinged. Observe the care taken of him: he only, of all Jeroboam's family, shall die in honour; shall be buried, and shall be lamented, as one that lived desired. Note, Those that are distinguished by divine grace, shall be distinguished by divine providence. This hopeful child dies first of all the family, for God often takes them soonest, whom he loves best; heaven is the fittest place for them, this earth is not worthy of them. 2. In wrath to the family; it was a sign the family would be ruined, when he was taken, by whom it might have been reformed. The righteous are removed from the evil to come in this world, to the good to come in a better world. It is a bad omen to a family, when the best in it are buried out of it; when what was valuable, is picked out, the rest is for the fire. It is likewise a present affliction to the family and kingdom, by which both ought to have been bettered. It aggravated it to the poor mother, that she should not reach home time enough to see her son alive. When thy feet enter into the city, just then the child shall die. This was to be a sign to her of the accomplishment of the rest of the threatenings, as 1 Sam. 2. 34.

VI. He foretells the setting up of another family to rule over Israel, v. 14. This was fulfilled in Baasha of Issachar, who conspired against Nadab the son of Jeroboam, in the second year of his reign, murdered him, and all his family. "But what? Even now. Why do I speak of it as a thing at a distance? It is at the door; it shall be done, even now." Sometimes God makes quick work with sinners, he did so with the house of Jeroboam. It was not twenty-four years from his first elevation to the final extirpation of his family.

VII. He foretells the judgments which should come upon the people of Israel, for conforming to the worship which Jeroboam had established. If the blind lead the blind, both the blind leaders and the blind followers shall fall into the ditch. It is here foretold, (v. 15.) 1. That they should never be easy, nor rightly settled in their land, but continually shaken like a reed in the water. After they left the house of David, the government never continued long in one family, but one undermined and destroyed another, which must needs occasion great disorders and disturbances among the people. 2. That they should, ere long, be totally expelled out of their land, that good land, and given up to ruin, v. 16. This was fulfilled in the captivity of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria. Families and kingdoms are ruined by sin, ruined by the wickedness of the heads of them. Jeroboam did sin, and made Israel to sin. If great men do wickedly, they involve many others both in the guilt and in the snare; multitudes follow their pernicious ways. They go to hell with a long train, and their condemnation will be more intolerable, who must answer not only for their own sins, but for the sins which others have been drawn into, and kept in, by their influence.

Jeroboam's wife has nothing to say against the word of the Lord, but she goes home with a heavy heart to their house in Tirzah, a sweet delightful place, so the name signifies, famed for its beauty, Cant. 6. 4. But death cannot be shut out from it, which will stain its beauty, and imbitter all its delights. Hither she came, and here we leave her attending the funeral of her son, and expecting the fate of her family.

(1.) The child died; (v. 17.) and justly did all Israel mourn, not only for the loss of so hopeful a prince, whom they were not worthy of, but because his death plucked up the flood-gates, and made a breach, at which an inundation of judgments broke in.

(2.) Jeroboam himself died soon after, v. 20. It is said, (2 Chron. 13. 20.) The Lord struck him with some sore disease, so that he died miserably, when he had reigned twenty-two years; and left his crown to a son, who lost it, and his life too, and all the lives of his family, within two years after. For a further account of him, the reader is referred to the annals of his reign; drawn up by his own secretaries, or the public records, like those in the Tower, called here, The book, or register, of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel, to which recourse might be had; but, not being divinely inspired, they are long since lost.

21. And Rehoboam the son of Solomon reigned in Judah. Rehoboam was forty and one years old when he began to reign, and he reigned seventeen years in Jerusalem, the city which the LORD did choose out of all the tribes of Israel, to put his name there. And his mother's name was Naamah, an Ammonitess. 22. And Judah did evil in the sight of the LORD, and they provoked him to jealousy with their sins which they had committed, above all that their fathers had done. 23. For they also built them high places, and images, and groves, on every high hill, and under every green tree. 24. And there were also Sodomites in the land; and they did according to all the abominations of the nations which the LORD cast out before the children of Israel. 25. And it came to pass, in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, that Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem: 26. And he took away the treasures of the house of the LORD, and the treasures of the king's house; he even took away all: and he took away all the shields of gold which Solomon had made. 27. And king Rehoboam made in their stead brazen shields, and committed them unto the hands of the chief of the guard, which kept the door of the king's house. 28. And it was so, when the king went into the house of the LORD, that the guard bare them, and brought them back into the guard-chamber. 29. Now the rest of the acts of Rehoboam, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? 30. And there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all their days. 31. And Rehoboam slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David. And his mother's name was Naamah, an Ammonitess. And Abijam his son reigned in his stead.

Judah's story and Israel's are intermixed in this book. Jeroboam outlived Rehoboam four or five years, yet his history is despatched first, that the account of Rehoboam's reign may be laid together; and a sad account it is.

I. Here is no good said of the king. All the account we have of him here, is, 1. That he was 41 years old, when he began to reign, by which reckoning, he was born in the last year of David, and had his education, and the forming of his mind, in the best days of Solomon; yet he lived not up to it. Solomon's defection, at last, did more to corrupt him, than his wisdom and devotion had done to give him good principles. 2. That he reigned 17 years in Jerusalem, the city where God put his name, where he had opportunity enough to know his duty, if he had had but a heart to do it. 3. That his mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess; this is twice mentioned, v. 21, 31. It was strange that David would marry his son Solomon to an Ammonitess, (for it was done while he lived,) but, it is probable, Solomon was in love with her, because she was Naamah, a beauty, so it signifies, and his father was loath to cross him, but it proved to have a very bad influence upon posterity. Probably, she was daughter to Shobi the Ammonite, who was kind to David, (2 Sam. 17. 27.) and David was too willing to requite him by matching his son into his family. None can imagine how lasting and how fatal the consequences may be, of being unequally yoked with unbelievers. 4. That he had continual war with Jeroboam, (v. 30.) which could not but be a perpetual uneasiness to him. 5. That when he had reigned but 17 years, he died, and left his throne to his son. His father, and grandfather, and grandson, that reigned well, reigned long, 40 years apiece; but sin often shortens men's lives and comforts.

II. Here is much said to the disadvantage of the subjects, both as to their character and their condition.

1. See here how wicked and profane they were. It is a most sad account that is here given of their apostasy from God, v. 22. . 24. Judah, the only professing people God had in the world, did evil in his sight, in contempt and defiance of him, and the tokens of his special presence with them; they provoked him to jealousy, as the adulterous wife provokes her husband, by breaking the marriage-covenant. Their fathers had been bad enough, especially in the times of the judges, but they did abominable things, above all that their fathers had done. The magnificence of their temple, the pomp of their priesthood, and all the secular advantages with which their religion was attended, could not prevail to keep them close to it; nothing less than the pouring out of the Spirit from on high, will keep God's Israel in their allegiance to him. The account here given of the wickedness of the Jews, agrees with that which the apostle gives of the wickedness of the Gentile world; (Rom. 1. 21, 24.) so that both Jew and Gentile are all alike under sin, Rom. 3. 9. (1.) They became vain in their imaginations concerning God, and changed his glory into an image, for they built them high places, images, and groves, (v. 23.) profaning God's name, by affixing it to their images, and God's ordinances, by serving their idols with them. They foolishly fancied that they exalted God, when they worshipped him on high hills, and pleased him, when they worshipped him under the pleasant shadow of green trees. (2.) They were given up to vile affections, (as those idolaters, Rom. 1. 26, 27.) for there were Sodomites in the land; (v. 24.) men with men working that which is unseemly, and not to be thought of, much less mentioned, without abhorrence and indignation. They dishonoured God by one sin, and then God left them to dishonour themselves by another. They profaned the privileges of a holy nation, therefore God gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, to imitate the abominations of the accursed Canaanites; and herein the Lord was righteous. And when they did like them that were cast out, how could they expect any other than to be cast out like them?

2. See here how weak and poor they were; and this was the consequence of the former. Sin exposes, impoverishes, and weakens, any people. Shishak, king of Egypt, came against them, and so far, either by force or surrender, made himself master of Jerusalem itself, that he took away the treasures both of the temple and of the exchequer, of the house of the Lord, and of the king's house, which David and Solomon had amassed, v. 25, 26. These, it is likely, tempted him to make this descent; and, to save the rest, Rehoboam perhaps tamely surrendered them, as Ahab, ch. 20. 4. He also took away the golden shields, that were made but in his father's time; (v. 26.) these the king of Egypt carried off as trophies of his victory; and, instead of them, Rehoboam made brazen shields, which the life-guard carried before him, when he went to church in state, v. 27, 28. This was an emblem of the diminution of his glory. Sin makes the gold become dim, changes the most fine gold, and turns it into brass. We commend Rehoboam for going to the house of the Lord, perhaps the oftener for the rebuke he had been under, and do not condemn him for going in pomp. Great men should honour God with their honour, and then they are themselves most honoured by it.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, we have an abstract of the history, I. Of two of the kings of Judah, Abijam, the days of whose reign were few and evil, (v. 1. . 8.) and Asa, who reigned well and long, v. 9. . 24. II. Of two of the kings of Israel, Nadab the son of Jeroboam, and Baasha the destroyer of Jeroboam's house, v. 25. . 31.

1. NOW, in the eighteenth year of king Jeroboam the son of Nebat, reigned Abijam over Judah. 2. Three years reign ed he in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom. 3. And he walked in all the sins of his father, which he had done before him: and his heart was not perfect with the LORD his God, as the heart of David his father. 4. Nevertheless, for David's sake, did the LORD his God give him a lamp in Jerusalem, to set up his son after him, and to establish Jerusalem: 5. Because David did that which was right in the eyes of the LORD, and turned not aside from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite. 6. And there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all the days of his life. 7. Now the rest of the acts of Abijam, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? And there was war between Abijam and Jeroboam. 8. And Abijam slept with his fathers; and they buried him in the city of David: and Asa his son reigned in his stead.

We have here a short account of the short reign of Abijam the son of Rehoboam king of Judah. He makes a better figure, 2 Chron. 13. where we have an account of his war with Jeroboam, the speech he made before the armies engaged, and the wonderful victory he obtained by the help of God. There he is called Abijah, My father is the Lord, because no wickedness is there laid to his charge. But here, where we are told of his faults, Jah, the name of God, is, in disgrace to him, taken away from his name, and he is called Abijam, Jer. 22. 24. Few particulars are related concerning him. 1. He began his reign in the beginning of Jeroboam's 18th year; for Rehoboam reigned but 17, ch. 14. 21. Jeroboam indeed survived Rehoboam, but Rehoboam's Abijah lived to succeed him, and to be a terror to Jeroboam, while Jeroboam's Abijah (whom we read of ch. 14. 1.) died before him. 2. He reigned scarcely three years, for he died before the end of Jeroboam's 20th year, v. 9. Being made proud and secure by his great victory over Jeroboam, (2 Chron. 13. 21.) God cut him off, to make way for his son Asa, who would be a better man. 3. His mother's name was Maachah the daughter of Abishalom, namely, Absalom, David's son, as I am the rather inclined to think, because two other of Rehoboam's wives were his near relations, (2 Chron. 11. 18.) one the daughter of Jerimoth, David's son; and another the daughter of Eliab, David's brother. He took warning by his father, not to marry strangers; yet thought it below him to marry his subjects, except they were of the royal family. 4. He carried on his father's wars with Jeroboam. As there was continual war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam, not set battles, (they were forbidden, ch. 12. 24.) but frequent encounters, especially upon the borders; one making incursions and reprisals on the other: so there was, between Abijam and Jeroboam, (v. 7.) till Jeroboam, with a great army, invaded him, and then Abijam, not being forbidden to act in his own defence, routed him, and weakened him, that he compelled him to be quiet the rest of his reign, 2 Chron. 13. 20.

But, in general, we are told, (1.) That he was not like David, had no hearty affection for the ordinances of God; though, to serve his purpose against Jeroboam, he pleaded his possession of the temple and priesthood, as that which he valued himself upon, 2 Chron. 13. 10. 12. Many boast of their profession of godliness, who are strangers to the power of it; and plead the truth of their religion, who yet are not true to it. His heart was not perfect with the Lord his God; he seemed to have zeal, but he wanted sincerity; he began well, but he fell off, and walked in all the sins of his father, followed his bad example, though he had seen the bad consequences of it. He that was all his days in war, ought to have been so wise as to make and keep his peace with God, and not to make him his Enemy, especially having found him so good a Friend in his war with Jeroboam, 2 Chron. 13. 18. Let favour be showed the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness, Isa. 26. 10. (2.) That yet it was for David's sake that he was advanced to, and continued upon, the throne; it was for his sake, (v. 4, 5.) that God thus set up his son after him; not for his own sake, or for the sake of his father, whose steps he trod in, but for the sake of David, whose example he would not follow. Note, It aggravates the sin of a degenerate seed, that they fare the better for the piety of their ancestors, and owe their blessings to it, and yet will not imitate it. They stand upon that ground, and yet despise it, and trample upon it, and unreasonably ridicule and oppose that which they enjoy the benefit of. The kingdom of Judah was supported, [1.] That David might have a lamp, pursuant to the divine ordination of a lamp for his anointed, Ps. 132. 17. [2.] That Jerusalem might be established; not only that the honours put upon it, in David's and Solomon's time, might be preserved to it, but that it might be reserved to the honours designed for it in after-times. The character here given of David, is very great, that he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, but the exception very remarkable, save only in the matter of Uriah, including both his murder, and the debauching of his wife. That was a bad matter; it was a remaining blot upon his name, a bar in his escutcheon, and the reproach of it was not wiped away, though the guilt was. David was guilty of other faults, but they were nothing in comparison of that; yet even that, being repented of, though it be mentioned for warning to others, did not prevail to throw him out of the covenant, nor to cut off the entail of the promise upon his seed.

9. And in the twentieth year of Jeroboam king of Israel reigned Asa over Judah. 10. And forty and one years reigned he in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom. 11. And Asa did that which was right in the eyes of the LORD, as did David his father. 12. And he took away the Sodomites out of the land, and removed all the idols that his fathers had made. 13. And also Maachah his mother, even her he removed from being queen, because she had made an idol in a grove: and Asa destroyed her idol, and burnt it by the brook Kidron. 14. But the high places were not removed: nevertheless Asa's heart was perfect with the LORD all his days. 15. And he brought in the things which his father had dedicated, and the things which himself had dedicated, into the house of the LORD, silver, and gold, and vessels. 16. And there was war between Asa and Baasha king of Israel all their days. 17. And Baasha king of Israel went up against Judah, and built Ramah, that he might not suffer any to go out or come in to Asa king of Judah. 18. Then Asa took all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasures of the house of the LORD, and the treasures of the king's house, and delivered them into the hand of his servants: and king Asa sent them to Ben-hadad, the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying, 19. There is a league between me and thee, and between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent unto thee a present of silver and gold; come and break thy league with Baasha king of Israel, that he may depart from me. 20. So Ben-hadad hearkened unto king Asa, and sent the captains of the host which he had against the cities of Israel, and smote Ijon, and Dan, and Abel-beth-maachah, and all Cinneroth, with all the land of Naphtali. 21. And it came to pass, when Baasha heard thereof, that he left off building of Ramah, and dwelt in Tirzah. 22. Then king Asa made a proclamation throughout all Judah; none was exempted; and they took away the stones of Ramah, and the timber thereof, wherewith Baasha had builded: and king Asa built with them Geba of Benjamin, and Mizpah. 23. The rest of all the acts of Asa, and all his might, and all that he did, and the cities which he built, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? Nevertheless, in the time of his old age he was diseased in his feet. 24. And Asa slept with his fathers, and was buried with his father: in the city of David his father: and Jehoshaphat his son reigned in his stead.

We have here a short account of the reign of Asa; we shall find a more copious history of it, 2 Chron. 14, 15, and 16.

Here is,

I. The length of it; He reigned forty-one years in Jerusalem, v. 10. In the account we have of the kings of Judah, we find the number of the good kings and the bad ones, nearly equal; but then we may observe, to our comfort, that the reign of the good kings was generally long, but that of the bad kings short, the consideration of which will make the state of God's church not altogether so bad, within that period, as it appears, at first sight. Length of days is in Wisdom's right hand. Honour thy father, much more thy heavenly Father, that thy days may be long.

II. The general good character of it; (v. 11.) Asa did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord. That is right indeed, which is, so in God's eyes. Those are approved, whom he commends. He did as did David his father, kept close to God, and to his instituted worship, was hearty and zealous for that, which gave him this honourable character, that he was like David, though he was not a prophet, or psalmist, as David was. If we come up to the graces of those that are gone before us, it will be our praise with God, though we come short of their gifts. Asa was like David, though he was neither such a conqueror, nor such an author; for his heart was perfect with the Lord all his days, (v. 14.) that is, he was both cordial and constant in his religion. What he did for God, he was sincere in, steady and uniform, and did it from a good principle, with a single eye to the glory of God.

III. The particular instances of Asa's piety. His times were times of reformation. For, 1. He removed that which was evil. There reformation begins; and a great deal of work of that kind his hand found to do. For though it was but 20 years after the death of Solomon, that he began to reign, yet very gross corruption had spread far, and taken deep root. Immorality he first struck at; he took away the Sodomites out of the land, suppressed the brothels; for how can either prince or people prosper, while those cages of unclean and filthy birds, more dangerous than pest-houses, are suffered to remain? Then he proceeded against idolatry; he removed all the idols, even those that his father had made, v. 12. His father having made them, he was the more concerned to remove them, that he might cut off the entail of the curse, and prevent the visiting of that iniquity upon him and his. Nay, (which redounds much to his honour, and shows his heart was perfect with God,) when he found idolatry in the court, he rooted it out thence, v. 13. When it appeared that Maachah his mother, or rather his grandmother, (but called his mother, because she had the education of him in his childhood,) had an idol in a grove, though she was his mother, his grandmother, though it is likely, she had a particular fondness for it, though, being old, she could not live long to patronise it, though she kept it for her own use only, yet he would by no means connive at it. Reformation must begin at home. Bad practices will never be suppressed in the country, while they are supported in the court. Asa, in every thing else, will honour and respect his mother; he loves her well, but he loves God better, and, like the Levite, (Deut. 33. 9.) bravely forgets the relation, when it comes in competition with his duty. If she be an idolater, (1.) Her idol shall be destroyed, publicly exposed to contempt, defaced, and burnt to ashes, by the brook Kidron, on which, it is probable, he strewed the ashes, in imitation of Moses, (Exod. 32. 20.) and in token of his detestation of idolatry, and his indignation at it, wherever he found it. Let no remains of a court-idol appear. (2.) She shall be deposed: he removed her from being queen, or from the queen; that is, from conversing with his wife; he banished her the court, and confined her to an obscure and private life. They that have power, are happy, when thus they have hearts to use it well. 2. He re-established that which was good, v. 15. He brought into the house of God the dedicated things which he himself had vowed out of the spoils of the Ethiopians he had conquered, and which his father had vowed, but lived not to bring in, pursuant to his vow. We must not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only cast away the idols of our iniquity, but dedicate ourselves and our all to God's honour and glory: When those who, in their infancy, were, by baptism, devoted to God, make it their own act and deed to join themselves to him, and vigorously employ themselves in his service, that is bringing in the dedicated things which they and their fathers have dedicated: it is necessary justice, rendering to God the things that are his.

IV His political conduct. He built cities himself, to encourage the increase of his people, (v. 23.) and to invite others to him by the conveniences of habitation. And he was very zealous to hinder Baasha from building Ramah, because he designed it for the cutting off of communication between his people and Jerusalem, and to hinder those who, in obedience to God, would come to worship there. An enemy must by no means be suffered to fortify a frontier town.

V. The faults of his reign. In both the things for which he was praised, he was found defective; the fairest characters are not without some but or other in them. 1. Did he take away the idols? That was well: but the high places were not removed; (v. 14.) therein his reformation fell short. He removed all images which were rivals with the true God, or false representations of him; but the altars which were set up in high places, and to which those sacrifices were brought, which should have been offered on the altar in the temple, those he suffered to stand, thinking there was no great harm in them, they having been used by good men before the temple was built, and being loath to disoblige the people who had a kindness to them, and were wedded to them both by custom and convenience; whereas in Judah and Benjamin, the only tribes under Asa's government, which lay so near Jerusalem and the altars there, there was less pretence for them than in those tribes which lay more remote. They were against the law, which obliged them to worship at one place, Deut. 12. 11. They lessened men's esteem of the temple and the altars there, and were an open gap for idolatry to enter in at, while the people were so much addicted to it. It was not well that Asa, when his hand was in, did not remove these; nevertheless his heart was perfect with the Lord. This affords us a comfortable note, that those may be found honest and upright with God, and be accepted of him, who yet, in some instances, come short of doing the good they might and should do. The perfection which is made the indispensable condition of the new covenant, is not to be understood of sinlessness, (then we were all undone,) but sincerity. 2. Did he bring in the dedicated things? That was well: but he afterward alienated the dedicated things, when he took the gold and silver out of the house of God, and sent them as a bribe to Ben-hadad, to hire him to break his league with Baasha, and, by making an inroad upon his country, to give him a diversion from the building of Ramah, v. 18, 19. Here he sinned, (1.) In tempting Ben-hadad to break his league, and so to violate the public faith. If he did wrong in doing it, as certainly he did, Asa did wrong in persuading him to do it. (2.) In that he could not trust God, who had done so much for him, to free him out of this strait, without his using such indirect means to help himself. (3.) In taking the gold out of the treasury of the temple, which was not to be made use of, but on extraordinary occasions. The project succeeded; Ben-hadad made a descent upon the land of Israel, which obliged Baasha to retire with his whole force from Ramah, (v. 20, 21.) which gave Asa a fair opportunity to demolish his works there, and the timber and stones served him for the building of some cities of his own, v. 22. But though the design prospered, we find it was displeasing to God; and though Asa valued himself upon the policy of it, and promised himself that it would effectually secure his peace, he is told by a prophet, that he had done foolishly, and that from thenceforth he should have wars; see 2 Chron. 16. 7-9.

VI. The troubles of his reign. For the most part, he prospered: but, 1. Baasha king of Israel was a very troublesome neighbour to him. He reigned

24 years, and, all his days, had war, more or less, with Asa, v. 16. This was the effect of the division of the kingdoms, that they were continually vexing one another, which made them both an easier prey to the common enemy. 2. In his old age, he was himself afflicted with the gout; he was diseased in his feet, which made him less fit for business, and peevish toward those about him.

VII. The conclusion of his reign. The acts of it were more largely recorded in the common history (to which reference is here had, v. 23.) than in this sacred one. He reigned long, but finished, at last, with honour, and left his throne to a successor no way inferior to himself.

25. And Nadab the son of Jeroboam began to reign over Israel in the second year of Asa king of Judah, and reigned over Israel two years. 26. And he did evil in the sight of the LORD, and walked in the way of his father, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin. 27. And Baasha the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar, conspired against him: and Baasha smote him at Gibbethon, which belongeth to the Philistines; (for Nadab and all Israel laid siege to Gibbethon;) 28. Even in the third year of Asa king of Judah did Baasha slay him, and reigned in his stead. 29. And it came to pass, when he reigned, that he smote all the house of Jeroboam; he left not to Jeroboam any that breathed, until he had destroyed him, according unto the saying of the LORD, which he spake by his servant Ahijah the Shilonite: 30. Because of the sins of Jeroboam which he sinned, and which he made Israel sin, by his provocation wherewith he provoked the LORD God of Israel to anger. 31. Now the rest of the acts of Nadab, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? 32. And there was war between Asa and Baasha king of Israel all their days. 33. In the third year of Asa king of Judah began Baasha the son of Ahijah to reign over all Israel in Tirzah, twenty and four years. 34. And he did evil in the sight of the LORD, and walked in the way of Jeroboam, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin.

We are now to take a view of the miserable state of Israel, while the kingdom of Judah was happy under Asa's good government. It was threatened that they should be as a reed shaken in the water, (ch. 14. 15.) and so they were, when, during the single reign of Asa, the government of the kingdom was in six or seven different hands, as we find in this and the following chapter. Jeroboam was upon the throne, in the beginning of his reign, and Ahab at the end of it; between whom were Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, undermining and destroying one another. This they got by deserting the house both of God and of David.

Here is, 1. The ruin and extirpation of the family of Jeroboam, according to the word of the Lord by Ahijah. His son Nadab succeeded him. If the death of his brother Ahijah had had a due influence upon him, to make him religious, and the honour done him at his death, had engaged him to follow his good example, his reign might have been long and glorious; but he walked in the way of his father, (v. 26.) kept up the worship of his calves, and forbade his subjects to go up to Jerusalem to worship; sinned, and made Israel to sin; and therefore God brought ruin upon him quickly, in the second year of his reign. He was besieging Gibbethon, a city which the Philistines had taken from the Danites, and was endeavouring to retake it; and there, in the midst of his army, did Baasha, with others, conspire against him, and kill him; (v. 27.) and so little interest had he in the affections of his people, that his army did not only avenge his death, but chose his murderer for his successor. Whether Baasha did it upon a personal pique against Nadab, or to be avenged on the house of Jeroboam, for some affront received from them; or whether, under pretence of freeing his country from the tyranny of a bad prince; or whether, merely from a principle of ambition, or to make way for himself to the throne, does not appear; but he slew him, and reigned in his stead v. 28. And the first thing he did, when he came to the crown, was, to cut off all the house of Jeroboam, that he might the better secure himself, and his own usurped government. He thought it not enough to imprison or banish them, but he destroyed them; left not only no males, (as was foretold, ch. 14. 10.) but none that breathed. Herein, he was barbarous, but God was righteous. Jeroboam's sin was punished, (v. 30.) for they that provoke God, do it to their own confusion; see Jer. 7. 19. Ahijah's prophecy was accomplished, (v. 29.) for no word of God shall fall to the ground. Divine threatenings are not designed merely to terrify.

2. The elevation of Baasha. He shall be tried a while, as Jeroboam was; 24 years he reigned, (v. 33.) but showed that it was not from any dislike to Jeroboam's sins, that he destroyed his family, but from malice and ambition; for when he had rooted out the sinner, he himself clave to the sin, and walked in the way of Jeroboam, (v. 34.) though he had seen the end of that way; so strangely was his heart hardened with the deceitfulness of sin.

CHAP. XVI.

This chapter relates wholly to the kingdom of Israel, and the revolutions of that kingdom—many in a little time.

The utter ruin of Jeroboam's family, after it had been 24 years a royal family, we read of in the chapter before. In this chapter, we have, I. The ruin of Baasha's family, after it had been but 26 years a royal family, foretold by a prophet, (v. 1. 7.) and executed by Zimri, one of his captains, v. 8. 14. II. The seven days' reign of Zimri, and his sudden fall, v. 15. 20. The struggle between Omri and Tibni, and Omri's prevalency, and his reign, v. 21. 28. IV. The beginning of the reign of Ahab, whom we shall afterward read much of, v. 29. 33. V. The rebuilding of Jericho, v. 34. All this while, in Judah things went well.

1. THEN the word of the LORD came to Jehu the son of Hanani, against Baasha, saying, 2. Forasmuch as I exalted thee out of the dust, and made thee prince over my people Israel, and thou hast walked in the way of Jeroboam, and hast made my people Israel to sin, to provoke me to anger with their sins; 3. Behold, I will take away the posterity of Baasha, and the posterity of his house; and will make thy house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. 4. Him that dieth of Baasha in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth of his in the fields shall the fowls of the air eat. 5. Now the rest of the acts of Baasha, and what he did, and his might, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? 6. So Baasha slept with his fathers, and was buried in Tirzah: and Elah his son reigned in his stead. 7. And also by the hand of the prophet Jehu, the son of Hanani, came the word of the LORD against Baasha, and against his house, even for all the evil that he did in the sight of the LORD, in provoking him to anger with the work of his hands, in being like the house of Jeroboam; and because he killed him. 8. In the twenty and sixth year of Asa king of Judah began Elah the son of Baasha to reign over Israel in Tirzah, two years. 9. And his servant Zimri, captain of half his chariots, conspired against him as he was in Tirzah, drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza, steward of his house in Tirzah. 10. And Zimri went in and smote him, and killed him, in the twenty and seventh year of Asa king of Judah, and reigned in his stead. 11. And it came to pass, when he began to reign, as soon as he sat on his throne, that he slew all the house of Baasha: he left him not one that pisseth against a wall, neither of his kinsfolks, nor of his friends. 12. Thus did Zimri destroy all the house of Baasha, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake against Baasha by Jehu the prophet; 13. For all the sins of Baasha, and the sins of Elah his son, by which they sinned, and by which they made Israel to sin, in provoking the LORD God of Israel to anger with their vanities. 14. Now the rest of the acts of Elah, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?

Here is,

I. The ruin of the family of Baasha foretold: he was a man likely enough to have raised and established his family, active, politic, and daring; but he was an idolater, and that brought destruction upon his family. God sent him warning of it before, 1. That if he were thereby wrought upon to repent and reform, the ruin might be prevented; for God threatens, that he may not strike, as one that desires not the death of sinners. 2. That, if not, it might appear that the destruction, when it did come, whoever might be instruments of it, was the act of God's justice, and the punishment of sin. The warning was sent by Jehu, the son of Hanani. The father was a seer, or prophet, at the same time, 2 Chron. 16. 7. He was sent to Asa king of Judah; but the son, who was young, and more active, was sent on this longer and more dangerous expedition to Baasha king of Israel. Juniores ad labores—Toil and adventure are for the young. This Jehu was a prophet, and worthy of a prophet. Prophecy, thus happily entailed, was worthy of so much the more honour. This Jehu continued long in his usefulness, for we find him reproving Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19. 2.) above 40 years after, and writing the annals of that prince, 2 Chron. 20. 34. The message which this prophet brought to Baasha, is much the same with that which Ahijah sent to Jeroboam by his wife. (1.) He reminds him of the great things God had done for him; (v. 2.) I exalted thee out of the dust, to the throne of glory; a great instance of the divine sovereignty and power, 1 Sam. 2. 8. Baasha seemed to have raised himself by his own treachery and cruelty; yet there was the hand of Providence in it, to bring about God's counsel, concerning Jeroboam's house; and God's owning his advancement as his act and deed, does by no means amount to the patronising of his ambition and treachery. It is God that puts power into bad men's hands, which he makes to serve his good purposes, notwithstanding the bad use they make of it. I made thee prince over my people. God calls Israel his people still, though wretchedly corrupted, because they retained the covenant of circumcision, and there were many good people among them; it was not till long after, that they were called Loammi, not a people, Hos. 1. 9. (2.) He charges him with high crimes and misdemeanors. [1.] That he had made Israel to sin, had seduced God's subjects from their allegiance, and had brought them to pay the homage due to him only, to dunghill-deities, and herein, he had walked in the way of Jeroboam, (v. 2.) and been like his house, v. 7. [2.] That he had himself provoked God to anger with the work of his hands, that is, by worshipping images, the work of men's hands; though others made them, perhaps he served them, and thereby avowed the making of them, and they are therefore called the work of his hands. [3.] That he had destroyed the house of Jeroboam, (v. 7.) because he killed him, namely, Jeroboam's son, and all his; if he had done that, with an eye to God, and to his will and glory, and from a holy indignation against the sins of Jeroboam and his house, he had been accepted and applauded as a minister of God's justice; but as he did it, he was not only the tool of God's justice, but a servant to his own lusts, and is justly punished for the malice and ambition which governed him in all he did. They who are, any way, employed in denouncing or executing the justice of God, (magistrates or ministers,) are concerned to do it from a good principle, and in a holy manner, lest it turn into sin to them, and they make themselves obnoxious by it. (3.) He foretells the same destruction to come upon his family, which he himself had been employed to bring upon the family of Jeroboam, v. 3, 4. They who resemble others in their sins, may expect to resemble them in their plagues, especially those who seem zealous against such sins in others, as they allow themselves in; the house of Jehu was reckoned with for the blood of the house of Ahab, Hos. 1. 4.

II. A reprieve granted for some time, so long, that Baasha himself dies in peace, and is buried with honour in his own royal city; (v. 6.) so far is he from being a prey either to the dogs or to the fowls, which yet was threatened to his house, v. 4. He lives not either to see or feel the punishment threatened, yet he was himself the greatest delinquent; certainly, there must be a future state, in which impenitent sinners will suffer in their own persons, and not escape, as often as they do in this world. Baasha died under no visible stroke of divine vengeance, for aught that appears, but God laid up his iniquity for his children; (as Job speaks, ch. 21. 19.) thus he often visits sins. Observe, Baasha is punished by the destruction of his children after his death, and his children are punished by the abuse of their bodies after their death; that is the only thing which the threatening specifies, (v. 4.) that the dogs and the fowls of the air should eat them, as if herein were designed a tacit intimation, That there are punishments after death, when death has done its worst, which will be the sorest punishments, and are most to be dreaded; these judgments on the body and posterity, signified judgments on the soul when separated from the body, by Him who, after he has killed, has power to cast into hell.

III. Execution done at last. Baasha's son Elah, like Jeroboam's son Nadab, reigned two years, and then was slain by Zimri, one of his own soldiers, as he was by Baasha: so like was his house made to that of Jeroboam, as was threatened, v. 3. Because his idolatry was like his, and one of the sins for which God contended with him, being the destruction of Jeroboam's family, the more like the destruction of his own was to that, the nearer did the punishment resemble the sin, as face answers to face in the glass.

1. As then, so now, the king himself was first slain, but Elah fell more ingloriously than Nadab; Nadab was slain in the field of action and honour, he and his army then besieging Gibbethon; (ch. 15. 27.) but the siege being then raised, upon that disaster, and the city still remaining in the Philistines' hands, the army of Israel was now renewing the attempt, (v. 15.) and Elah should have been with them to command in chief, but he loved his own ease and safety better than his honour or duty, or the public good, and therefore staid behind to take his pleasure; and when he was drinking himself drunk in his servant's house, Zimri killed him, v. 9, 10. Let it be a warning to drunkards, especially to those who designedly drink themselves drunk, that they know not but death may surprise them in that condition. (1.) Death comes easily upon men, when they are drunk; beside the chronic diseases which men frequently bring themselves into by hard drinking, and which cut them off in the midst of their days, men, in that condition, are more easily overcome by an enemy, as Amnon by Absalom, and are liable to more bad accidents, being unable to help themselves. (2.) Death comes terribly upon men in that condition, finding them in the act of sin, and incapacitated for any act of devotion; that day comes upon them at unawares, (Luke 21. 34.) like a thief.

2. As then, so now, the whole family was cut off, and rooted out; the traitor was the successor, to whom the unthinking people tamely submitted, as if it were all one to them what king they had, so that they had one; the first thing Zimri did, was, to slay all the house of Baasha; thus he held by cruelty what he got by treason; his cruelty seems to have extended further than Baasha's did against the house of Jeroboam, for he left to Elah none of his kinsfolk or friends; (v. 11.) none of his avengers, so the word is, none that were likely to avenge his death; yet divine justice soon avenged it so remarkably, that it was used as a proverb long after, Had Zimri peace, that slew his master? 2 Kings 9. 31. In this, (1.) The word of God was fulfilled, v. 12. (2.) The sins of Baasha and Elah were reckoned for, with which they provoked God with their vanities, v. 13. Their idols are called their vanities, for they cannot profit nor help; miserable are those whose deities are vanities.

15. In the twenty and seventh year of Asa king of Judah did Zimri reign seven days in Tirzah. And the people were encamped against Gibbethon, which belonged to the Philistines. 16. And the people that were encamped heard say, Zimri hath conspired, and hath also slain the king: wherefore all Israel made Omri, the captain of the host king over Israel that day in the camp. 17. And Omri went up from Gibbethon, and all Israel with him, and they besieged Tirzah. 18. And it came to pass, when Zimri saw that the city was taken, that he went into the palace of the king's house, and burnt the king's house over him with fire, and died, 19. For his sins which he sinned in doing evil in the sight of the LORD, in walking in the way of Jeroboam, and in his sin which he did, to make Israel to sin. 20. Now the rest of the acts of Zimri, and his treason that he wrought, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? 21. Then were the people of Israel divided into two parts: half of the people followed Tibni the son of Ginath, to make him king; and half followed Omri. 22. But the people that followed Omri prevailed against the people that followed Tibni the son of Ginath: so Tibni died, and Omri reigned. 23. In the thirty and first year of Asa king of Judah began Omri to reign over Israel, twelve years: six years reigned he in Tirzah. 24. And he bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of the city which he built, after the name of Shemer, owner of the hill, Samaria. 25. But Omri wrought evil in the eyes of the LORD, and did worse than all that were before him. 26. For he walked in all the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin, to provoke the LORD God of Israel to anger with their vanities. 27. Now the rest of the acts of Omri which he did, and his might that he showed, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? 28. So Omri slept with his fathers, and was buried in Samaria: and Ahab his son reigned in his stead.

Solomon observes, (Prov. 28. 2.) that for the transgression of a land, many were the princes thereof, (so it was here in Israel,) but by a man of understanding the state thereof shall be prolonged. So it was with Judah at the same time, under Asa; when men forsake God, they are out of the way of rest and establishment; Zimri, and Tibni, and Omri, are here striving for the crown. Proud aspiring men ruin one another, and involve others in the ruin; these confusions end in the settlement of Omri; we must therefore take him along with us, through this part of the story.

I. How he was chosen; as the Roman emperors often were, by the army in the field, now encamped before Gibbethon: notice was soon brought thither, that Zimri had slain their king, (v. 16.) and set up himself in Tirzah, the royal city, whereupon they chose Omri king in the camp, that they might, without delay, avenge the death of Elah upon Zimri; though he was idle and intemperate, yet he was their king, and they would not tamely submit to his murderer, nor let the treason go unpunished; they did not attempt to avenge the death of Nadab upon Baasha, perhaps, because the house of Baasha had ruled with more gentleness than the house of Jeroboam; but Zimri shall feel the resentments of the provoked army; the siege of Gibbethon is quitted, (Philistines are sure to gain when Israelites quarrel,) and Zimri is prosecuted.

II. How he conquered Zimri: he is said to have reigned 7 days, (v. 15.) so long before Omri was proclaimed king, and himself proclaimed traitor; but we may suppose it a longer time before he died, for he continued long enough to show his inclination to the way of Jeroboam, and to make himself obnoxious to the justice of God, by supporting his idolatry, v. 19. Tirzah was a beautiful city, but not fortified, so that Omri soon made himself master of it; (v. 17.) forced Zimri into the palace, which, being unable to defend, and yet unwilling to surrender, he burnt, and himself in it, v. 18. Unwilling that his rival should ever enjoy that sumptuous palace, he burnt it; and fearing that if he fell into the hands of the army, either alive or dead, he should be ignominiously treated, he burnt himself in it. See what desperate practices men's wickedness sometimes brings them to, and how it hurries them into their own ruin; see the disposition of incendiaries, who set palaces and kingdoms on fire, though they are themselves in danger of perishing in the flame.

III. How he struggled with Tibni, and, at length, got clear of him; half of the people followed this Tibni, (v. 21.) probably, those who were in Zimri's interest, with whom others joined, who would not have a king chosen in the camp, (lest he should rule by the sword, and a standing army,) but in a convention of the states; the contest between these two, lasted some years, and, it is likely, cost a great deal of blood on both sides, for it was in the 27th year of Asa, that Omri was first elected, (v. 15.) and thence the 12 years of his reign are to be dated; but it was not till the 31st year of Asa, that he began to reign without a rival; then Tibni died, it is likely, in battle, and Omri reigned, v. 22. Sir Walter Raleigh, in his History of the World, (l. 2. c. 19. § 6.) inquires here, why it was, that in all these confusions and revolutions of the kingdom of Israel, they never thought of returning to the house of David, and uniting themselves again to Judah, for then it was better for them than now; and he thinks the reason was, because the kings of Judah assumed a more absolute, arbitrary, and despotic power, than the kings of Israel; it was the heaviness of the yoke that they complained of, when they first revolted from the house of David, and the dread of that made them, ever after, averse to it, and attached to kings of their own, who ruled more by law, and the rules of a limited monarchy.

IV. How he reigned, when he was, at length, settled on the throne. 1. He made himself famous by building Samaria, (which, ever after, was the royal city of the kings of Israel, (the palace at Tirzah being burnt,) and, in process of time, grew so considerable, that it gave name to the middle part of Canaan, which lay between Galilee on the north, and Judea on the south,) and to the inhabitants of that country, who were called Samaritans. He bought the ground for two talents of silver, somewhat more than 700 pounds of our money, for a talent was 353l. 11s. 10 1-2d. Perhaps, Shemer, who sold him the ground, let him have it considerably the cheaper, upon condition that the city should be called after his name, which, otherwise, would have borne the name of the purchaser; it was called Samaria, or Shemeren, as it is in the Hebrew, from Shemer, the former owner, v. 24. The kings of Israel changed their royal seats; Shechem first, then Tirzah, now Samaria; but the kings of Judah were constant to Jerusalem, the city of God: they that cleave to the Lord, fix; they that leave him, ever wander. 2. He made himself infamous by his wickedness, for he did worse than all that were before him, v. 25. Though he was brought to the throne with much difficulty, and Providence had remarkably favoured him in his advancement, yet he was more profane, or more superstitious, and a greater persecutor, than either of the houses of Jeroboam or Baasha; he went further than they had done, in establishing iniquity by a law, and forcing his subjects to comply with him in it; for we read of the statutes of Omri, the keeping of which made Israel a desolation, Mic. 6, 16. Jeroboam made Israel to sin, by temptation, example, and allurements; but Omri did it by compulsion.

V. How he ended his reign, v. 27, 28. He was in some repute for the might which he showed; many a bad man has been a stout man. He died in his bed, as Jeroboam and Baasha did themselves; but, like them, left it to his posterity to fill up the measure, and then pay off the scores, of his iniquity.

29. And in the thirty and eighth year of Asa king of Judah, began Ahab the son of Omri to reign over Israel: and Ahab the son of Omri reigned over Israel, in Samaria, twenty and two years. 30. And Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the LORD above all that were before him. 31. And it came to pass, as if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, that he took to wife Jezebel the daughter of Ethbaal king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshipped him. 32. And he reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria. 33. And Ahab made a grove; and Ahab did more to provoke the LORD God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him. 34. In his days did Hiel the Beth-elite build Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun.

We have the beginning of the reign of Ahab, of whom we have more particulars recorded, than of any of the kings of Israel; we have here only a general idea given us of him, as the worst of all the kings, that we may expect what the particulars will be; he reigned 22 years, long enough to do a deal of mischief.

I. He exceeded all his predecessors in wickedness, did evil above all that were before him; (v. 30.) and, as if it were done with a particular enmity both to God and Israel, to affront him, and ruin them, it is said, He did more, purposely to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger, and, consequently, to send judgments on his land, than all the kings of Israel that went before him, v. 33. It was bad with the people, when their kings were each worse than the other; what would they come to at last? He had seen the ruin of other wicked kings and their families, yet, instead of taking warning, his heart was hardened and enraged against God by it. He thought it a light thing to walk in the sins of Jero- boam, v. 31. It was nothing to break the second commandment by image-worship, he would set aside the first also by introducing other gods; his little finger should fall heavier upon God's ordinances than Jeroboam's loins. Making light of lesser sins makes way for greater; and they that endeavour to extenuate other people's sins will but aggravate their own.

II. He married a wicked woman, who, he knew, would bring in the worship of Baal, and seemed to marry her with that design. As if it had been a light thing to walk in the sins of Jeroboam, he took to wife Jezebel, (v. 31.) a zealous idolater, extremely imperious and malicious in her natural temper, addicted to witchcrafts and whoredoms, (2 Kings 9. 22.) and every way vicious. The false prophetess spoken of, Rev. 2. 20. is there called Jezebel; for a wicked woman could not be called by a worse name than her's: what mischiefs she did, and what mischief, at last, befell her, (2 Kings 9. 33.) we shall find in the following story; this one strange wife debauched Israel more than all Solomon's.

III. He set up the worship of Baal, forsook the God of Israel, and served the god of the Zidonians, Jupiter instead of Jehovah; the sun, so some think; a deified hero of the Phenicians, so others: he was weary of the golden calves, and thought they had worshipped them long enough: such vanities were they, that those who had been fondest of them, at length grew disgusted with them, and, like adulterers, must have variety. In honour of this mock deity, whom they called Baal, lord, and for the convenience of his worship, 1. Ahab built a temple in Samaria, the royal city, because the temple of God was in Jerusalem, the royal city of the other kingdom; he would have Baal's temple near him, that he might the better frequent it, protect it, and put honour upon it. 2. He reared an altar in that temple, on which to offer sacrifice to Baal, by which they acknowledged their dependence upon him, and sought his favour. O the stupidity of idolaters, who are at a great expense to make one their friend, whom they might have chosen whether they would have made a god of or no! 3. He made a grove about his temple; either a natural one, by planting shady trees there, or, if those would be too long in growing, an artificial one in imitation of it; for it is not said, He planted, but, He made a grove, something that answered the intention, which was to conceal, and so, countenance, the abominable impurities that were committed in the filthy worship of Baal. He that doeth evil, hateth the light.

IV. One of his subjects, in imitation of his presumption, ventured to build Jericho, in defiance of the curse Joshua had long since pronounced on him that should attempt it, v. 34. It comes in as an instance of the height of impiety men were then arrived at, especially at Beth-el, where one of the calves was, for of that city this daring sinner was, Observe, 1. How ill he did; like Achan, he meddled with the accursed thing; turned that to his own use, which was devoted to God's honour: he began to build, in defiance of the curse well known in Israel, jesting with it, perhaps, as a bugbear, or fancying it was worn out by length of time; for it was above 500 years since it was pronounced, Josh. 6. 26. He went on to build, in defiance of the execution of the curse in part; for though his eldest son died, when he began, yet he would proceed in contempt of God, and his wrath revealed from heaven against his ungodliness. 2. How ill he sped; he built for his children, but God wrote him childless; his eldest son died, when he began, the youngest, when he finished, and all the rest, (it is supposed,) between. Note, Those whom God curses, are cursed indeed; none ever hardened his heart against

God, and prospered. God keep us back from presumptuous sins, those great transgressions!

CHAP. XVII.

So sad was the character of both the princes and the people of Israel in the foregoing chapter, that one would expect God should cast off a people that had so cast him off; but as an evidence to the contrary, never was Israel so blessed with a good prophet, as when it was so plagued with a bad king; never was king so bold to sin as Ahab, never was prophet so bold to reprove and threaten as Elijah, whose story begins in this chapter, and is full of wonders. Scarcely any part of the Old Testament history shines brighter than the history of the spirit and power of Elias; he only, of all the prophets, had the honour of Enoch, the first prophet, to be translated, that he should not see death, and the honour of Moses, the great prophet, to attend our Saviour in his transfiguration: other prophets prophesied and wrote, he prophesied and acted, but wrote nothing; but his actings cast more lustre on his name than their writings on their's. In this chapter, we have, 1. His prediction of a famine in Israel, through the want of rain, v. 1. II. The provision made for him in that famine, 1. By the ravens at the brook Cherith, v. 2. . 7. 2. When that failed, by a widow at Zarephath, who received him in the name of a prophet, and had a prophet's reward; for, (1.) He multiplied her meal and her oil, v. 8. . 16. (2.) He raised her dead son to life, v. 17. . 24. Thus his story begins with judgments and miracles, designed to awaken that stupid generation that had so deeply corrupted themselves.

1. AND Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead, said unto Ahab, As the LORD God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word. 2. And the word of the LORD came unto him, saying, 3. Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan. 4. And it shall be, that thou shalt drink of the brook; and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there. 5. So he went and did according unto the word of the LORD: for he went and dwelt by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan. 6. And the ravens brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening: and he drank of the brook. 7. And it came to pass, after a while, that the brook dried up, because there had been no rain in the land.

The history of Elijah begins somewhat abruptly: usually, when a prophet enters, we have some account of his parentage, are told whose son he was, and of what tribe; but Elijah drops (so to speak) out of the clouds, as if, like Melchisedek, he were without father, without mother, and without descent, which made some of the Jews fancy that he was an angel sent from heaven; but the apostle has assured us that he was a man subject to like passions as we are, (James 5. 17.) which perhaps intimates, not only that he was liable to the common infirmities of the human nature, but that, by his natural temper, he was a man of strong passions, more hot and eager than most other men, and therefore the more fit to deal with the daring sinners of the age he lived in. So wonderfully does God suit men to the work he designs them for; rough spirits are called to rough services; the reformation needed such a man as Luther, to break the ice.

Observe, 1. His name; Elijah, "My God Jehovah is he," (so it signifies,) "as he who sends me, and will own me, and bear me out, is he to whom I would bring Israel back, and who alone can effect that great work." 2. His country; he was of the inhabitants of Gilead, on the other side Jordan; either of the tribe of Gad, or that half of Manasseh, for Gilead was divided between them: but whether a native of either of those tribes, is uncertain; the obscurity of his parentage was no prejudice to his eminency afterward; we need not inquire whence men are, but what they are; if it be a good thing, no matter though it come out of Nazareth. Israel was sore wounded, when God sent them this balm from Gilead, and this physician thence. He is called a Tishbite, from Tishbe, a town in that country.

Two things we have an account of here in the beginning of his story.

I. How he foretold a famine, a long and grievous famine, with which Israel should be punished for their sins; that fruitful land, for want of rain, should be turned into barrenness, for the iniquity of them that dwelt therein; he went, and told Ahab this; did not whisper it to the people, to make them disaffected to the government, but proclaimed it to the king, in whose power it was to reform the land, and so, to prevent the judgment. It is probable that he reprov'd Ahab for his idolatry and other wickedness, and told him that unless he repented and reformed, this judgment would be brought upon his land. There should be neither dew nor rain for some years, none but according to my word; that is, "Expect none, till you hear from me again." The apostle teaches us to understand this, not only of the word of prophecy, but the word of prayer, which turned the key of the clouds, James 5. 17, 18. He prayed earnestly, (in a holy indignation at Israel's apostasy, and a holy zeal for the glory of God, whose judgments were defied,) that it might not rain; and, according to his prayers, the heavens became brass, till he prayed again that it might rain. In allusion to this story, it is said of God's witnesses, (Rev. 11. 6.) These have power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophesy.

Elijah lets Ahab know, 1. That the Lord Jehovah is the God of Israel, whom he had forsaken. 2. That he is a living God, and not like the gods he worshipped, which were dead dumb idols. 3. That he was his servant in office, and a messenger from him; "It is he before whom I stand, to minister to him," or "whom I now represent, in whose stead I stand, and in whose name I speak, in defiance of the prophets of Baal and the groves." 4. That notwithstanding the present peace and prosperity of their kingdom, God was displeased with them for their idolatry, and would chastise them for it by the want of rain, which, when he withheld it, it was not in the power of the gods they served, to bestow; for are there any of the vanities of the heathen, that can give rain? (Jer. 14. 22.) which would effectually prove their impotency, and the folly of those who left the living God, to make their court to such as could do neither good nor evil; and this he confirms with a solemn oath, As the Lord God of Israel liveth; that Ahab might stand the more in awe of the threatening, the divine life being engaged for the accomplishment of it. 5. He lets him know what interest he had in heaven; It shall be according to my word. With what dignity does he speak, when he speaks in God's name, as one who well understood that commission of a prophet, (Jer. 1. 10.) I have set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms. See the power of prayer, and the truth of God's word; for he performeth the counsel of his messengers.

II. How he was himself taken care of in that famine.

1. How he was hidden; God bade him go an- hide himself by the brook Cherith, v. 3. This was intended, not so much for his preservation, for it does not appear that Ahab immediately sought his life, but as a judgment to the people, to whom, if he had publicly appeared, he might have been a blessing, both by his instructions and his intercession, and so have shortened the days of their calamity; but God had determined it should last three years and a half, and therefore, so long, appointed Elijah to abscond, that he might not be solicited to revoke the sentence, the execution whereof he had said should be according to his word. When God speaks concerning a nation to pluck up and destroy, he finds some way or other to remove those that would stand in the gap, to turn away his wrath; it bodes ill to a people, when good men and good ministers are ordered to hide themselves; when God intended to send rain upon the earth, then he bade Elijah go show himself to Ahab, ch. 18. 1. For the present, in obedience to the divine command, he went, and dwelt all alone in some obscure unfrequented place, where he was not discovered; probably, among the reeds of the brook. If Providence calls us to solitude and retirement, it becomes us to acquiesce; when we cannot be useful, we must be patient, and when we cannot work for God, we must sit still quietly for him.

2. How he was fed; though he could not work there, having nothing to do but to meditate and pray, (which would help to prepare him for his usefulness afterward,) yet he shall eat, for he is in the way of his duty, and verily he shall be fed, in the day of famine he shall be satisfied. When the woman, the church, is driven into the wilderness, care is taken that she be fed and nourished there, time, times, and half a time, that is, three years and a half, which was just the time of Elijah's concealment. See Rev. 12. 6, 14. Elijah must drink of the brook, and the ravens were appointed to bring him meat, (v. 4.) and did so, v. 6. Here,

(1.) The provision was plentiful, and good, and constant; bread and flesh twice a day, daily bread, and food convenient. We may suppose that he fared not so sumptuously as the prophets of the groves, who did eat at Jezebel's table, (ch. 18. 19.) and yet better than the rest of the Lord's prophets, whom Obadiah fed with bread and water, ch. 18. 4. It ill becomes God's servants, especially his servants the prophets, to be nice and curious about their food, and to affect dainties and varieties; if nature be sustained, no matter though the palate be not pleased; instead of envying those who have daintier fare, we should think how many there are, better than we, who live comfortably upon coarser fare, and would be glad of our leavings. Elijah had but one meal brought him at a time, every morning and every evening, to teach him not to take thought for the morrow; let those who have but from hand to mouth, learn to live upon Providence, and trust it for the bread of the day in the day; thank God for bread this day, and let to-morrow bring bread with it.

(2.) The caterers were very unlikely; the ravens brought it him. Obadiah and others in Israel, that had not bowed the knee to Baal, would gladly have entertained Elijah; but he was a man by himself, and shall be fed in an extraordinary way, he was a figure of John the Baptist, whose meat was locusts and wild honey. God could have sent angels to minister to him, as he did afterward, (ch. 19. 5.) and as he did to our Saviour; (Matth. 4. 11.) but he chose to send by winged messengers of another nature, to show that when he pleases, he can serve his own purposes by the meanest creatures as effectually as by the mightiest. If it be asked, whence the ravens had this provision, how and where it was cooked, and whether they came honestly by it, we must answer as Jacob did, (Gen. 27. 20.) The Lord our God brought it to them, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof, the world, and they that dwell therein. But why ravens? [1.] They are birds of prey, greedy devouring creatures, more likely to have taken his meat from him, or to have picked out his eyes, (Prov. 30. 17.) but thus Samson's riddle is again unriddled, Out of the eater comes forth meat. [2.] They are unclean creatures; every raven after his kind was, by the law, forbidden to be eaten; (Lev. 11. 15.) yet Elijah did not think the meat they brought ever the worse for that, but ate and gave thanks, asking no question for conscience-sake. Noah's dove was to him a more faithful messenger than his raven; yet here the ravens are faithful and constant to Elijah. [3.] Ravens feed on insects and carrion themselves, yet they brought the prophet man's meat, and wholesome food; it is a pity that those who bring the bread of life to others, should themselves take up with that which is not bread. [4.] Ravens could bring but a little, and broken meat, yet Elijah was content with such things as he had, and thankful that he was fed, though not feasted. [5.] Ravens neglect their own young ones, and do not feed them; yet, when God pleases, they shall feed his prophet; young lions and young ravens may lack, and suffer hunger, but not they that fear the Lord, Ps. 34. 10. [6.] Ravens are themselves fed by special providence, (Job. 38. 41. Ps. 147. 9.) and now they feed the prophet. Have we experienced God's special goodness to us and our's? Let us reckon ourselves obliged, thereby, to be kind to those that are his, for his sake. Let us learn from hence, First, To acknowledge the sovereignty and power of God over all the creatures; he can make what use he pleases of them, either for judgment or mercy. Secondly, To encourage ourselves in God in the greatest straits, and never to distrust him; he that could furnish a table in the wilderness, and make ravens purveyors, cooks, and servitors, to his prophet, is able to supply all our needs according to his riches in glory.

Thus does Elijah, for a great while, eat his morsels alone, and his provision of water which he has, in an ordinary way, from the brook, fails him before that which he had by miracle. The powers of nature are limited, but not the powers of the God of nature. Elijah's brook dried up, (v. 7.) because there was no rain; if the heavens fail, earth fails of course; such are all our creature-comforts; we lose them, when we most need them, like the brooks in summer, Job 6. 15. But there is a river which makes glad the city of God; that never runs dry; (Ps. 46. 4.) a well of water that springs up to eternal life; Lord, give us that living water!

8. And the word of the LORD came unto him, saying, 9. Arise, get thee to Zarephath, which belongeth to Zidon, and dwell there: behold, I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee. 10. So he arose, and went to Zarephath. And when he came to the gate of the city, behold, the widow woman was there gathering of sticks: and he called to her, and said, Fetch me, I pray thee, a little water in a vessel, that I may drink. 11. And as she was going to fetch it, he called to her, and said, Bring me, I pray thee, a morsel of bread in thine hand. 12. And she said, As the LORD thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruse: and, behold, I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die. 13. And Elijah said unto her, Fear not; go, and do as thou hast said: but make me a little cake first thereof, and bring it unto me, and after make for thee and for thy son: 14. For thus saith the LORD God of Israel, The barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the LORD sendeth rain upon the earth. 15. And she went, and did according to the saying of Elijah: and she, and he, and her house, did eat many days. 16. And the barrel of meal wasted not, neither did the cruse of oil fail, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Elijah.

We have here an account of the further protection Elijah was taken under, and the further provision made for him, in his retirement; at destruction and famine he shall laugh, that has God for his Friend, to guard and maintain him; the brook Cherith is dried up, but God's care of his people, and kindness to them, never slacken, never fail, but are still the same, are still continued and drawn out to them that know him, Ps. 36. 10. When the brook was dried up, Jordan was not; why did not God send him thither? Surely, because he would show that he has a variety of ways to provide for his people, and is not tied to any one. God will now provide for him there where he shall have some company and opportunity of usefulness, and not be, as he had been, buried alive. Observe,

I. The place he is sent to; to Zarephath, or Sarepta, a city of Sidon, out of the borders of the land of Israel, v. 9. Our Saviour takes notice of this as an early and ancient indication of the favour of God designed for the poor Gentiles, in the fulness of time, Luke 4. 25, 26. Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, and some, it is likely, that would have bidden him welcome to their houses; yet he is sent to honour and bless with his presence a city of Sidon, a Gentile city, and so becomes (says Dr. Lightfoot) the first prophet of the Gentiles. Israel had corrupted themselves with the idolatries of the nations, and were become worse than they; justly therefore is the casting off of them the riches of the world. Elijah was hated and driven out by his countrymen, therefore, Lo, he turns to the Gentiles, as the apostles were afterward ordered to do, Acts 18. 6. But why to a city of Sidon? Perhaps, because the worship of Baal, which was now the crying sin of Israel, came lately from thence with Jezebel, who was a Sidonian; (ch. 16. 31.) therefore thither he shall go, that thence may be fetched the destroyer of that idolatry; "Even out of Sidon have I called my prophet, my reformer." Jezebel was Elijah's greatest enemy; yet to show her the impotency of her malice, God will find a hiding-place for him even in her country; Christ never went among the Gentiles, except once into the coast of Sidon, Matth. 15. 21.

II. The person that is appointed to entertain him; not one of the rich merchants, or great men, of Sidon, not such a one as Obadiah, that was governor of Ahab's house, and fed the prophets, but a poor widow woman, destitute and desolate, is commanded (that is, made both able and willing) to sustain him. It is God's way, and it is his glory, to make use of, and put honour upon, the weak and foolish things of the world. He is, in a special manner, the widow's God, and feeds them, and therefore they must study what they shall render to him.

III. The provision made for him there; Providence brought the widow woman to meet him very opportunely at the gate of the city, (v. 10.) and by what is here related of what passed between Elijah and her, we find,

1. Her case and character; and it appears,

(1.) That she was very poor and necessitous; she had nothing to live upon, but a handful of meal, and a little oil, needy at the best, and now, by the general scarcity, reduced to the last extremity; when she has eaten the little she has, for aught she yet sees, she must die for want, she and her son, v. 12. She had no fuel but the sticks she gathered in the streets, and, having no servant, she must gather them herself; (v. 10.) more likely to receive alms than give entertainment; to her Elijah is sent, that he might still live upon Providence, as much as he did when the ravens fed him; and it was in compassion to the low estate of his handmaiden, that God sent the prophet to her, not to beg of her, but to board with her, and he would pay well for his table.

(2.) That she was very humble and industrious; he found her gathering sticks, and preparing to bake her own bread, v. 10, 12. Her mind was brought to her condition, and she complains not of the hardship she was brought to, nor quarrels with the Divine Providence for withholding rain, but accommodates herself to it as well as she can; such as are of this temper, in a day of trouble, are best prepared for honour and relief from God.

(3.) That she was very charitable and generous; when this stranger desired her to go fetch him some water to drink, she readily went, at the first word, v. 10, 11. She objected not the present scarcity of it, nor asked him what he would give her for a draught of water, for now it was worth money, nor hinted that he was a stranger, an Israelite, with whom, perhaps, the Sidonians cared not for having any dealings, any more than the Samaritans, John 4. 9. She did not excuse herself on account of her weakness through famine, or the urgency of her own affairs; did not tell him she had something else to do than to go on his errands, but left her gathering of the sticks for herself, to fetch water for him, which perhaps she did the more willingly, being moved with the gravity of his aspect. We should be ready to do any office of kindness, even to strangers; if we have not wherewith to give to the distressed, we must be the more ready to work for them; a cup of cold water, though it cost us no more than the labour of fetching, shall, in no wise, lose its reward.

(4.) That she had a great confidence in the word of God; it was a great trial of her faith and obedience, when, having told the prophet how low her stock of meal and oil was, and that she had but just enough for herself and her son, he bade her make a cake for him, and make his first, and after, prepare for herself and her son; if we consider, it will appear as great a trial as could be, in so small a matter; "Let the children first be served;" (might she have said:) "charity begins at home; I cannot be expected to give, having but little, and not knowing, when that is gone, where to obtain more." She had much more reason than Nabal to ask, "Shall I take my meal and my oil, and give it to one that I know not whence he is?" Elijah, it is true, made mention of the God of Israel, (v. 14.) but what was that to a Sidonian? Or, if she had a veneration for the name Jehovah, and valued the God of Israel as the true God, yet "hat assuance had she that this stranger was his prophet, or had any warrant to speak in his name? It was easy for a hungry vagrant to impose upon her; but she gets over all these objections, and obeys the precept, in dependence upon the promise; she went and did according to the saying of Elijah, v. 15. O woman, great was thy faith; one has not found the like, no not in Israel: all things considered, it exceeded that of the widow, who, when she had but two mites, cast them into the treasury; she took the prophet's word, that she should not lose by it, but it should be repaid with interest. Those that can venture upon the promise of God, will make no difficulty of exposing and emptying themselves in his service, by giving him his dues out of a little, and giving him his part first. They that deal with God, must deal upon trust; seek first his kingdom, and then other things shall be added: by the law, the first-fruits were God's, the tithe was taken out first, and the heave-offering of their dough was first offered, Numb. 15. 20, 21. But surely the increase of this widow's faith, to such a degree as to enable her thus to deny herself, and to depend upon the divine promise, was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace, as the increase of her oil was, in the kingdom of providence. Happy are they, who can thus, against hope, believe, and obey in hope.

2. The care God took of her and her guest; the barrel of meal wasted not, nor did the cruse of oil fail, but still as they took from them, more was added to them by the divine power, v. 16. Never did corn or olive so increase in the growing (says Bishop Hall) as these did in the using; but the multiplying of the seed sown, (2 Cor. 9. 10.) in the common course of Providence, is an instance of the power and goodness of God, not to be overlooked because common. The meal and the oil multiplied, not in the hoarding but in the spending; for there is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; when God blesses a little, it will go a great way, even beyond expectation; as, on the contrary, though there be abundance, if he blow upon it, it comes to little, Hag. 1. 9.—2. 16.

(1.) This was a maintenance for the prophet: still miracles shall be his daily bread; hitherto, he was fed with bread and flesh, now, with bread and oil, which they used as we do butter; manna was both, for the taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil, Numb. 11. 8. This Elijah was thankful for, though he had been used to flesh twice a day, and now had none at all: those that cannot live without flesh, once a day, at least, because they have been used to it, could not have boarded contentedly with Elijah, no not to live upon a miracle.

(2.) It was a maintenance for the poor widow and her son, and a recompense to her for entertaining the prophet: there is nothing lost by being kind to God's people and ministers; she that received a prophet, had a prophet's reward; she gave him house-room, and he repaid her with food for the household. Christ has promised to those who open their doors to him, that he will come into them, and sup with them, and they with him, Rev. 3. 20. Like Elijah here, he brings to those who bid him welcome, not only his own entertainment, but their's too. See how the reward answered the service; she generously made one cake for the prophet, and was repaid with many for herself and her son. When Abraham offers his only son to God, he is told he shall be the father of multitudes; what is laid out in piety, or charity, is let out to the best interest, upon the best securities. One poor meal's meat this poor widow gave the prophet, and in recompense of it, she and her son did eat many days, (v. 15.) above two years, in a time of general scarcity; and to have their food from God's special favour, and to eat it in such good company as Elijah's, made it more than doubly sweet. It is promised to them that trust in God, that they shall not be ashamed in the evil time, but in the days of famine they shall be satisfied, Ps. 37. 19.

17. And it came to pass, after these things, that the son of the woman, the mistress of the house, fell sick; and his sickness was so sore, that there was no breath left in him. 18. And she said unto Elijah, What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son? 19. And he said unto her, Give me thy son. And he took him out of her bosom, and carried him up into a loft where he abode, and laid him upon his own bed. 20. And he cried unto the LORD, and said, O LORD my God, hast thou also brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son? 21. And he stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the LORD, and said, O LORD my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again. 22. And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah, and the soul of the child came into him again, and he revived. 23. And Elijah took the child, and brought him down out of the chamber into the house, and delivered him unto his mother: and Elijah said, See, thy son liveth! 24. And the woman said to Elijah, Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the LORD in thy mouth is truth.

We have here a further recompense made to the widow for her kindness to the prophet: as if it were a small thing to be kept alive, her son, when dead, is restored to life, and so restored to her. Observe,

I. The sickness and death of the child; for aught that appears, he was her only son, the comfort of her widowed estate. He was fed miraculously, and yet that did not secure him from sickness and death; Your fathers did eat manna, and are dead, but there is bread, of which a man may eat, and not die, which was given for the life of the world, John 6. 49, 50. This affliction was to this widow as a thorn in the flesh, lest she should be lifted up above measure with the favours that were done her, and the honours that were put upon her. 1. She was nurse to a great prophet, was employed to sustain him, and had strong reason to think the Lord would do her good; yet now, she loses her child. Note, We must not think it strange, if we meet with very sharp afflictions, even then when we are in the way of duty, and of eminent service to God. 2. She was herself nursed by miracle, and kept a good house without charge or care, by a distinguishing blessing from heaven; and in the midst of all this satisfaction she is thus afflicted. Note, When we have the clearest manifestations of God's favour and good will toward us, even then we must prepare for the rebukes of Providence; our mountain never stands so strong, but it may be moved, and therefore, in this world, we must rejoice with trembling.

II. Her pathetic complaint to the prophet, of this affliction; it should seem the child died suddenly, else she would have applied to Elijah, while he was sick, for the cure of him; but being dead, dead in her bosom, she expostulates with the prophet upon it, rather to give vent to her sorrow, than in any hope of relief, v. 18.

1. She expresses herself passionately; What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? How calmly had she spoken of her own, and her child's death, when she expected to die for want; (v. 12.) That we may eat, and die! Yet now that her child dies, and not so miserably as by famine, she is extremely disturbed at it: we may speak lightly of an affliction at a distance, but when it toucheth us, we are troubled, Job 4. 5. Then she spake deliberately, now in haste; the death of the child was now a surprise to her, and it is hard to keep our spirits composed, when troubles come upon us suddenly and unexpectedly, and in the midst of our peace and prosperity. She calls him a man of God, and yet quarrels with him, as if he had occasioned the death of her child, and is ready to wish she had never seen him, forgetting past mercies and miracles; "What have I done against thee?" So some understand it; "Wherein have I offended thee, or been wanting in my duty? Show me wherefore thou contendest with me."

2. Yet she expresses herself penitently; "Art thou come to call my sin to thy remembrance, as the cause of the affliction, and so to call it to my remembrance, as the effect of the affliction?" Perhaps she knew of Elijah's intercession against Israel, and, being conscious to herself of sin, perhaps her former worshipping of Baal, the god of the Sidonians, she apprehends he had made intercession against her. Note, (1.) When God removes our comforts from us, he remembers our sins against us, perhaps the iniquities of our youth, though long since past, Job 13. 26. Our sins are the death of our children. (2.) When God thus remembers our sins against us, he designs, thereby, to make us remember them against ourselves, and repent of them.

III. The prophet's address to God, upon this occasion; he gave no answer to her expostulation, but brought it to God, and laid the case before him, not knowing what to say to it himself: he took the dead child from his mother's bosom to his own bed, v. 19. Probably, he had taken a particular kindness to the child, and found the affliction his own, more than by sympathy; he retired to his chamber, and, 1. He humbly reasons with God concerning the death of the child, v. 20. He sees death striking by commission from God; Thou hast brought this evil; for is there any evil of this kind in the city, in the family, and the Lord has not done it? He pleads the greatness of the affliction to the poor mother; "It is evil upon the widow; thou art the widows' God, and dost not usually bring evil upon widows; it is affliction added to the afflicted." He pleads his own concern; "It is the widow with whom I sojourn; wilt thou, that art my God, bring evil upon one of the best of my benefactors? I shall be reflected upon, and others will be afraid of entertaining me, if I bring death into the house where I come." 2. He earnestly begs of God to restore the child to life again, v. 21. We do not read, before this, of any that were raised to life; yet Elijah, by a divine impulse, prays for the resurrection of this child, which yet will not warrant us to do the like: David expected not, by fasting and prayer, to bring his child back to life, (2 Sam. 12. 23.) but Elijah had a power to work miracles, which David had not; he stretched himself upon the child, to affect himself with the case; and to show how much he was affected with it, and how desirous he was of the restoration of the child, he would, if he could, put life into him by his own breath and warmth; also to give a sign of what God would do by his power, and what he does by his grace, in raising of dead souls to a spiritual life; the Holy Ghost comes upon them, overshadows them, and puts life into them; he is very particular in his prayer, I pray thee let this child's soul come into him again; which plainly supposes the existence of the soul in a state of separation from the body, and, consequently, its immortality; which, Grotius thinks, God designed by this miracle to give intimation and evidence of, for the encouragement of his suffering people.

IV. The resurrection of the child, and the great satisfaction it gave to the mother; the child revived, v. 22. See the power of prayer, and the power of Him who hears prayer, who kills and makes alive. Elijah brought him to his mother, who, we may suppose, could scarcely believe her own eyes, and therefore Elijah assures her it is her own; "It is thy son that liveth, see it is thy own, and not another," v. 23. The good woman hereupon cries out, Now I know that thou art a man of God; though she knew it before, by the increase of her meal, yet the death of her child she took so unkindly, that she began to question it; (a good man surely would not serve her so;) but now she was abundantly satisfied that he had both the power and goodness of a man of God, and will never doubt of it again, but give up herself to the direction of his word, and the worshipping of the God of Israel. Thus the death of the child, like that of Lazarus, (John 11. 4.) was for the glory of God, and the honour of his prophet.

CHAP. XVIII.

We left the prophet Elijah wrapt up in obscurity; it does not appear that either the increase of the provision, or the raising of the child, had made him taken notice of at Zarephath, for then Ahab would have discovered him; he would rather do good than be known to do it: but in this chapter his appearance was as public, as, before, his retirement was close; the days appointed for his concealment, (which was part of the judgment upon Israel,) being finished, he is now commanded to show himself to Ahab, and expect rain upon the earth, v. 1. Pursuant to this order, we have here, I. His interview with Obadiah, one of Ahab's servants, by whom he sends notice to Ahab of his coming, v. 2. 16. II. His interview with Ahab himself, v. 17. 19. III. His interview with all Israel upon mount Carmel, in order to a public trial of titles, between the Lord and Baal; a most distinguished solemnity it was, in which, 1. Baal and his prophets were confounded. 2. God and Elijah were honoured, v. 21. 39. IV. The execution he did upon the prophets of Baal, v. 40. V. The return of the mercy of rain, at the word of Elijah, v. 41. 46. It is a chapter in which are many things very observable.

1. AND it came to pass, after many days, that the word of the LORD came to Elijah in the third year, saying, Go show thyself unto Ahab; and I will send rain upon the earth. 2. And Elijah went to show himself unto Ahab. And there was a sore famine in Samaria. 3. And Ahab called Obadiah, which was the governor of his house. (Now Obadiah feared the LORD greatly: 4. For it was so, when Jezebel cut off the prophets of the LORD, that Obadiah took a hundred prophets, and hid them by fifty in a cave, and fed them with bread and water.) 5. And Ahab said unto Obadiah, Go into the land, unto all fountains of water, and unto all brooks: peradventure we may find grass to save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts. 6. So they divided the land between them, to pass thorough it: Ahab went one way by himself, and Obadiah went another way by himself. 7. And as Obadiah was in the way, behold, Elijah met him: and he knew him, and fell on his face, and said, Art thou that my lord Elijah? 8. And he answered him, I am: go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here. 9. And he said, What have I sinned, that thou wouldest deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab, to slay me? 10. As the LORD thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee: and when they said, He is not there, he took an oath of the kingdom and nation, that they found thee not. 11. And now thou sayest, Go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here. 12. And it shall come to pass, as soon as I am gone from thee, that the Spirit of the LORD shall carry thee whither I know not; and so when I come and tell Ahab, and he cannot find thee, he shall slay me: but I thy servant fear the LORD from my youth. 13. Was it not told my lord what I did when Jezebel slew the prophets of the LORD, how I hid a hundred men of the LORD's prophets by fifty in a cave, and fed them with bread and water? 14. And now thou sayest, Go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here: and he shall slay me. 15. And Elijah said, As the LORD of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, I will surely show myself unto him to-day. 16. So Obadiah went to meet Ahab, and told him: and Ahab went to meet Elijah.

In these verses we find,

I. The sad state of Israel at this time, upon two accounts:

1. Jezebel cut off the prophets of the Lord, (v. 4.) slew them, v. 13. Being an idolater, she was a persecutor, and made Ahab one. Even in those bad times, when the calves were worshipped, and the temple at Jerusalem deserted, yet there were some good people that feared God and served him, and some good prophets that instructed them in the knowledge of him, and assisted them in their devotions. The priests and the Levites were all gone to Judah and Jerusalem; (2 Chron. 11. 13, 14.) but instead of them, God raised up these prophets, who read and expounded the law in private meetings, or in the families that retained their integrity, for we read not of any synagogues at this time; they had not the spirit of prophecy as Elijah, nor did they offer sacrifice, or burn incense, but taught people to live well, and keep close to the God of Israel. These Jezebel aimed to extirpate, and put many of them to death; which was as much a public calamity as a public iniquity, and threatened the utter ruin of religion's poor remains in Israel. Those few that escaped the sword, were forced to abscond, and hide themselves in caves, where they were buried alive, and cut off, though not from life, yet from usefulness, which is the end and comfort of life; and when the prophets were persecuted and driven into corners, no doubt, their friends, those few good people that were in the land, were treated in like manner.

Yet, bad as things were, (1.) There was one very good man, who was a great man at court, Obadiah, who answers his name, a servant of the Lord, one who feared God, and was faithful to him, and yet was a steward of the household to Ahab. Observe his character; he feared the Lord greatly; (v. 3.) was not only a good man, but zealously and eminently good; his great place put a lustre upon his goodness, and gave him great opportunities of doing good; and he feared the Lord from his youth; (v. 12.) he began betimes to be religious, and had continued long. Note, Early piety, it is to be hoped, will be eminent piety; those that are good betimes, are likely to be very good; he that feared God from his youth, came to fear him greatly. He that will thrive, must rise betimes. But it is strange to find such an eminent good man, governor of Ahab's house, an office of great honour, power, and trust. [1.] It was strange that so wicked a man as Ahab, would prefer him to it, and continue him in it; certainly it was because he was a man of celebrated honesty, industry, and ingenuity, and one whom he could repose a confidence in, whose eyes he could trust as much as his own, as appears here, v. 5. Joseph and Daniel were preferred, because there were none so fit as they, for the places they were preferred to. Note, Those who profess religion, should study to recommend themselves to the esteem even of those that are without, by their integrity, fidelity, and application to business. [2.] It was strange that so good a man as Obadiah, would accept of preferment in a court so addicted to idolatry, and all manner of wickedness. We may be sure, it was not made necessary to qualify him for preferment, that he should be of the king's religion, that he should conform to the statutes of Omri, or the law of the house of Ahab. Obadiah would not have accepted the place, if he could not have had it without bowing the knee to Baal, nor was Ahab so impolitic as to exclude those from offices, that were fit to serve him, merely because they would not join with him in his devotions; that man that is true to God, will be faithful to his prince. Obadiah therefore could, with a good conscience, enjoy the place, and therefore would not decline it, or give it up, though he foresaw he could not do the good he desired to do in it; they that fear God, need not go out of the world, bad as it is. [3.] It was strange that either he did not reform Ahab, or Ahab corrupt him; but, it seems, they were both fixed; he that was filthy, would be filthy still, and he that was holy, would be holy still. Those that fear God greatly, will keep up the fear of him in bad times and places; thus Obadiah did. God has his remnant among all sorts, high and low; there were saints in Nero's household, and in Ahab's. (2.) This great good man used his power for the protection of God's prophets; he hid 100 of them in two caves, when the persecution was hot, and fed them with bread and water, v. 4. He did not think it enough to fear God himself, but, having wealth and power wherewithal to do it, he thought himself obliged to assist and countenance others that feared God; nor did he think his being kind to them would excuse him from being good himself, but he did both, he both feared God greatly himself, and patronised those that feared him likewise. See how wonderfully God raises up friends for his ministers and people, for their shelter in difficult times, there where one should least expect them; bread and water were now scarce commodities, yet Obadiah will find a competency of both for God's prophets, to keep them alive for service hereafter, though now they were laid aside.

2. When Jezebel cut off God's prophets, God cut off their necessary provisions by the extremity of the drought. Perhaps Jezebel persecuted God's prophets, under pretence that they were the cause of the judgment, because Elijah had foretold it; Christianos ad leones—Away with christians to the lions. But God made them know the contrary, for the famine continued till Baal's prophets were sacrificed, and so great a scarcity of water there was, that the king himself and Obadiah went in person throughout the land, to seek for grass for the cattle, v. 5, 6. Providence ordered it so, that Ahab might, with his own eyes, see how bad the consequences of this judgment were, that he might be the better inclined to hearken to Elijah, who would direct him into the only way to put an end to it. Ahab's care was not to lose all the beasts, many being already lost; but he took no care about his soul, not to lose that; took a deal of pains to seek grass, but none to seek the favour of God; fencing against the effect, but not inquiring how to remove the cause. The land of Judah lay close to the land of Israel, yet we find no complaint there of the want of rain; for Judah yet ruled with God, and was faithful with the saints and prophets; (Hos. 11. 12.) by which distinction Israel might plainly have seen the ground of God's controversy, when God caused it to rain upon one city, and not upon another; (Amos 4. 7, 8.) but they blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts, and would not see.

II. The steps taken toward redressing the grievance, by Elijah's appearing again upon the stage, to act as a Tishbite, a converter or reformer of Israel, for so (some think) that title of his signifies. Turn them again to the Lord God of hosts, from whom they have revolted, and all will be well quickly; this must be Elijah's doings. See Luke 1. 16, 17.

1. Ahab had made diligent search for him; (v. 10.) had offered rewards to any one that would discover him; sent spies into every tribe and lordship of his own dominions, as some understand it, or, as others, into all the neighbouring nations and kingdoms that were in alliance with him; and when they denied that they knew any thing of him, he would not believe them, unless they swore it, and, as should seem, promise likewise, upon oath, that if ever they found him among them, they would discover him, and deliver him up. It should seem, he made this diligent search for him, not so much that he might punish him for what he had done in denouncing the judgment, as that he might oblige him to undo it again by recalling the sentence, because he had said it should be according to his word; having such an opinion of him as men foolishly conceive of witches, that if they can but compel them to bless that which they have bewitched, it will be well again, or such as the king of Moab had of Balaam: I incline to this, because we find, when they came together, Elijah, knowing what Ahab wanted him for, appointed him to meet him on mount Carmel, and Ahab complied with the appointment, though Elijah took such a way to revoke the sentence, and bless the land, as perhaps he little thought of.

2. God, at length, ordered Elijah to present himself to Ahab, because the time was now come, when he would send rain upon the earth, (v. 1.) or, rather, upon the land: above two years, he had lain hid with the widow at Zarephath, after he had been concealed one year by the brook Cherith; so that the third year of his sojourning there, here spoken of, (v. 1.) was the fourth of the famine, which lasted, in all, three years and six months, as we find, Luke 4. 25. James 5. 17. Such was Elijah's zeal, no doubt, against the idolatry of Baal, and such his compassion to his people, that he thought it long to be thus confined to a corner; yet he appeared not, till God bade him, "Go show thyself to Ahab, for now thine hour is come, even the time to favour Israel." Note, It bodes well to any people, when God calls his ministers out of their corners, and bids them show themselves; a sign that he will give rain on the earth; however, we may the better dispense with the bread of affliction, while our eyes see our teachers, Isa. 30. 20, 21.

3. Elijah first surrendered, or, rather, discovered, himself to Obadiah. He knew, by the Spirit, where to meet him, and we are here told what passed between them.

(1.) Obadiah saluted him with great respect, fell on his face, and humbly asked, Art thou that my lord Elijah? v. 7. As he had showed the tenderness of a father to the sons of the prophets, so he showed the reverence of a son to this father of the prophets; and by this made it appear that he did indeed fear God greatly, that he did honour to one that was his extraordinary ambassador, and had a great interest in heaven.

(2.) Elijah, in answer to him, [1.] Transfers the title of honour he gave him, to Ahab; "Call him thy lord, not me;" that is a fitter title for a prince than for a prophet, who seeks not honour from men. Prophets should be called seers, and shepherds, and watchmen, and ministers, rather than lords; as those that mind duty more than dominion. [2.] He bids Obadiah go tell the king that he was there to speak with him. Tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is forth-coming, v. 8. He would have the king know before, that it might not be a surprise to him, and that he might be sure it was the prophet's own act, to present himself to him.

(3.) Obadiah begs to be excused from carrying this message to Ahab, for it might prove as much as his life was worth. [1.] He tells Elijah what great search Ahab had made for him, and how much his heart was upon it to find him out, v. 10. [2.] He takes it for granted, that Elijah would again withdraw, v. 12. The Spirit of the Lord shall carry thee (as it is likely he had done sometimes, when Ahab thought he had been sure of him,) whither I know not. See 2 Kings 2. 16. He thought Elijah was not in good earnest, when he bade him tell Ahab where he was, but intended only to expose the impotency of his malice; for he knew Ahab was not worthy to receive any kindness from the prophet, and it was not fit that the prophet should receive any mischief from him. [3.] He is sure Ahab would be so enraged at the disappointment, that he would put him to death for making a fool of him, or for not laying hands on Elijah himself, when he had him in his reach, v. 12. Tyrants and persecutors, in their passion, are often unreasonably outrageous, even toward their friends and confidants. [4.] He pleads that he did not deserve to be thus exposed, and put in peril of his life; What have I sinned? v. 9. Nay, (v. 13.) Was it not told my lord, how I hid the prophets? He mentions this, not in pride or ostentation, but to convince Elijah that though he was Ahab's servant, he was not in his interest, and therefore deserved not to be bantered as one of the tools of his persecution. He that had protected so many prophets, he hoped, should not have his own life hazarded by so great a prophet.

(4.) Elijah satisfies him that he might, with safety, deliver this message to Ahab, by assuring him, with an oath, that he would, this very day, present himself to Ahab, v. 15. Let but Obadiah know that he spake seriously, and really intended it, and he will make no scruple to carry the message to Ahab. Elijah swears by the Lord of hosts, who has all power in his hands, and was therefore able to protect his servant against all the powers of hell and earth.

(5.) Notice is hereby soon brought to Ahab, that Elijah had sent him a challenge to meet him immediately at such a place, and Ahab accepts the challenge, he went to meet Elijah, v. 16. We may suppose it a great surprise to Ahab, to hear that

Elijah, whom he had so long sought, and not found, was now found without seeking. He went in quest of grass, and finds him, from whose word, at God's mouth, he must expect rain. Yet his guilty conscience gives him little reason to hope for it, but rather, to fear some other more dreadful judgment. Had he, by his spies, surprised Elijah, he would have triumphed over him, but now that he was thus surprised by him, we may suppose he even trembled to look him in the face; hated him, and yet feared him, as Herod did John.

17. And it came to pass, when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? 18. And he answered, I have not troubled Israel; but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the LORD, and thou hast followed Baalim. 19. Now therefore send, and gather to me all Israel unto mount Carmel, and the prophets of Baal four hundred and fifty, and the prophets of the groves four hundred, which eat at Jezebel's table. 20. So Ahab sent unto all the children of Israel, and gathered the prophets together unto mount Carmel.

We have here the meeting between Ahab and Elijah; as bad a king as ever the world was plagued with, and as good a prophet as ever the church was blessed with.

1. Ahab, like himself, basely accuses Elijah; he dares not strike him, remembering that Jeroboam's hand was withered when it was stretched out against a prophet, but gives him bad language, which was no less an affront to him that sent him. It is a very coarse compliment with which he accosts him, at the first word, Art thou he that troubleth Israel, v. 17. How unlike was this to that with which his servant Obadiah saluted him; (v. 7.) Art thou that my lord Elijah? Obadiah feared God greatly, Ahab had sold himself to work wickedness; and both discovered their character by the manner of their address to the prophet. One may guess how people stand affected to God, by observing how they stand affected to his people and ministers. Elijah now came to bring blessings to Israel, tidings of the return of the rain; yet he is thus affronted. Had it been true that he was the troubler of Israel, Ahab, as king, had been obliged to animadvert upon him. There are those who trouble Israel by their wickedness, whom the conservators of the public peace are concerned to inquire after. But it was utterly false concerning Elijah; so far was he from being an enemy to Israel's welfare, that he was the stay of it, the chariots and horsemen of Israel. Note, It has been the lot of the best and most useful men, to be called and counted the troublers of the land, and to be run down as public grievances. Even Christ and his apostles were thus misrepresented, Acts 17. 6.

2. Elijah, like himself, boldly returned the charge upon the king, and proved it upon him, that he was the troubler of Israel, v. 18. 'Elijah is not the Achan; "I have not troubled Israel, have neither done them any wrong, nor designed them any hurt." They that procure God's judgments, do the mischief, not he that foretells them only, and gives warning of them, that the nation may repent, and prevent them. I would have healed Israel, but they would not be healed. Ahab is the Achan, the troubler, who follows Baalim, those accursed things. Nothing creates more trouble to a land than the impiety and profaneness of princes and their families.

3. As one having authority immediately from the King of kings, he orders a convention of the states to be forthwith summoned to meet at mount Carmel, where there had been an altar built to God, v. 30. Probably, on that mountain they had had an eminent high place, where, formerly, the pure worship of God had been kept up as well as it could be any where but at Jerusalem. Thither all Israel must come, to give Elijah the meeting, and the prophets of Baal who were dispersed all the country over, with those of the groves who were Jezebel's domestic chaplains, must there make their personal appearance.

4. Ahab issues out writs accordingly, for the convening of this great assembly, (v. 20.) either because he feared Elijah, and durst not oppose him; (Saul stood in awe of Samuel more than of God;) or because he hoped Elijah would bless the land, and speak the word that they might have rain, and, upon those terms, they would be all at his beck. Those that slighted and hated his counsels, would gladly be beholden to him for his prayers. Now God made those who said they were Jews and were not, but were of the synagogue of Satan, to come, and, in effect, to worship at his feet, and to know that God had loved him, Rev. 3. 9.

21. And Elijah came unto all the people and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word. 22. Then said Elijah unto the people, I, even I only, remain a prophet of the LORD; but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men. 23. Let them therefore give us two bullocks; and let them choose one bullock for themselves, and cut it in pieces, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under: and I will dress the other bullock, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under: 24. And call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the LORD: and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God. And all the people answered and said, It is well spoken. 25. And Elijah said unto the prophets of Baal, Choose you one bullock for yourselves, and dress it first; for ye are many: and call on the name of your gods, but put no fire under: 26. And they took the bullock which was given them, and they dressed it, and called on the name of Baal, from morning even until noon, saying, O Baal, hear us! But there was no voice, nor any that answered. And they leaped upon the altar which was made. 27. And it came to pass, at noon, that Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud; for he is a god either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked. 28. And they cried aloud, and cut themselves, after their manner, with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them. 29. And it came to pass, when mid-day was past, and they prophesied until the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, that there was neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded. 30. And Elijah said unto all the people, Come near unto me. And all the people came near unto him. And he repaired the altar of the LORD that was broken down. 31. And Elijah took twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of the sons of Jacob, unto whom the word of the LORD came, saying, Israel shall be thy name: 32. And with the stones he built an altar in the name of the LORD: and he made a trench about the altar, as great as would contain two measures of seed. 33. And he put the wood in order, and cut the bullock in pieces, and laid him on the wood, and said, Fill four barrels with water, and pour it on the burnt-sacrifice, and on the wood. 34. And he said, Do it the second time: and they did it the second time. And he said, Do it the third time: and they did it the third time. 35. And the water ran round about the altar; and he filled the trench also with water. 36. And it came to pass, at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, that Elijah the prophet came near, and said, LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word. 37. Hear me, O LORD, hear me; that this people may know that thou art the LORD God, and that thou hast turned their heart back again. 38. Then the fire of the LORD fell, and consumed the burnt-sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench. 39. And when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces: and they said, The LORD, he is the God; the LORD, he is the God. 40. And Elijah said unto them, Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape. And they took them: and Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there.

Ahab and the people expected that Elijah should, in this solemn assembly, bless the land, and pray for rain; but he has other work to do first. The people must be brought to repent and reform, and then they may look for the removal of the judgment, but not till then. This is the right method; God will first prepare our heart, and then cause his ear to hear; will first turn us to him, and then turn to us, Ps. 10. 17.—70. 3. Deserters must not look for God's favour, till they return to their allegiance. Elijah might have looked for rain seventy times seven times, and not have seen it, if he had not thus begun his work at the right end.

Three years and a half's famine would not bring them back to God; Elijah will endeavour to convince their judgments, and, no doubt, by special warrant and direction from heaven, he put the controversy between God and Baal upon a public trial. It was great condescension in God, that he would suffer so plain a case to be disputed, and would permit Baal to be a competitor with him; but thus God would have every mouth to be stepped, and all flesh to become silent before him. God's cause is so incontestably just, that it needs not fear to have the evidences of its equity searched into, and weighed.

I. Elijah reproves the people for mixing the worship of God, and the worship of Baal, together. Not only some Israelites worshipped God, and others Baal, but the same Israelites sometimes worshipped one, and sometimes the other. This he calls, (v. 21.) Halting between two opinions or thoughts. They worshipped God, to please the prophets, but worshipped Baal, to please Jezebel, and curry favour at court. They thought to trim the matter, and play on both sides, as the Samaritans, 2 Kings 17. 33. Now Elijah shows them the absurdity of this; he does not insist upon their relation to Jehovah. "Is he not your's, and the God of your fathers, while Baal is the God of the Sidonians? And will a nation change their God?" Jer. 2. 11. No, he waves the prescription, and enters upon the merits of the cause." There can be but one God, but one infinite and but one supreme; there needs but one God, one omnipotent, one all-sufficient: what occasion for addition to that which is perfect? Now, if, upon trial, it appears that Baal is that one infinite omnipotent Being, that one supreme Lord and all-sufficient Benefactor, you ought to renounce Jehovah, and cleave to Baal only: but if Jehovah be that one God, Baal is a cheat, and you must have no more to do with him. Note, 1. It is very wrong to halt between God and Baal. "In reconcilable differences (says Bishop Hall) nothing more safe than indifferency both of practice and opinion; but in cases of so necessary hostility, as betwixt God and Baal, he that is not with God, is against him." Compare Mark 9. 38, 39. with Matth. 12. 30. The service of God, and the service of sin, the dominion of Christ, and the dominion of our lusts, these are the two thoughts which it is dangerous halting between. These do so, that are unresolved under their convictions; unstable and unsteady in their purposes; promise fair, but do not perform; begin well, but do not hold on; that are inconsistent with themselves, indifferent and lukewarm in that which is good. Their heart is divided, (Hos. 10. 2.) whereas God will have all or none. 2. We are fairly put to our choice, whom we will serve, Josh. 24. 15. If we can find one that has more right to us, or will be a better master to us, than God, we may take him at our peril. God demands no more from us than he can make out a title to.

This fair proposal of the case which Elijah here makes, the people knew not what to say to, they answered him not a word. They could say nothing to justify themselves, and they would say nothing to condemn themselves, but, as people confounded, let him say what he would.

II. He proposes to bring the matter to a fair trial; and it was so much the fairer, because Baal had all the external advantages on his side. The king and court were all for Baal: so was the body of the people. The managers of Baal's cause were 450 men, fat, and well-fed, (v. 22.) beside 400 more, their supporters or seconds, v. 19. The manager of God's cause was but one man, lately a poor exile, hardly kept from starving; so that God's cause has nothing to support it but its own right. However, it is put to this experiment: "Let each side prepare a sacrifice, and pray to it's God, and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God; if neither do, let them turn Atheists; if both, let them continue to halt between two." Elijah, doubtless, had a special commission from God to put it to this test, else he had tempted God and affronted religion; but the case was extraordinary, and the judgment upon it would be of use, not only then, but in all ages. It is an instance of the courage of Elijah, that he durst stand alone in the cause of God against such powers and numbers; and the issue encourages all God's witnesses and advocates never to fear the face of man. Elijah does not say, "The God that answers by water," (though that was the thing the country needed,) but "that answers by fire, let him be God;" because the atonement was to be made by sacrifice, before the judgment could be removed in mercy. The God therefore that has power to pardon sin, and to signify it by consuming the sin-offering, must needs be the God that can relieve us against the calamity. He that can give fire, can give rain; see Matth. 9. 2, 6.

III. The people join issue with him: It is well spoken, v. 24. They allow the proposal to be fair and unexceptionable. "God had often answered by fire; if Baal cannot do so, let him be cast off for a usurper." They were very desirous to see the experiment tried, and seemed resolved to abide by the issue, whatever it should be. They that were firm for God, doubted not but it would end to his honour: they that were indifferent, were willing to be determined. Ahab and the prophets of Baal durst not oppose, for fear of the people, and hoped that either they could obtain fire from heaven, (though they never had yet,) and the rather, because, as some think, they worshipped the sun in Baal; or, that Elijah could not, because not at the temple, where God was wont thus to manifest his glory. If, in this trial, they could but bring it to a drawn battle, their other advantages would give them the victory. Let it go on therefore to a trial.

IV. The prophets of Baal try first, but in vain, with their God. They covet the precedence, not only for the honour of it, but that if they could but in the least seem to gain their point, Elijah might not be admitted to make the trial. Elijah allows it them; (v. 25.) gives them the leading for their greater confusion; only, knowing that the working of Satan is with lying wonders, he takes care to prevent a fraud, Be sure to put no fire under. Now in their experiment observe,

1. How importunate and noisy the prophets of Baal were, in their applications to him. They got their sacrifices ready; and we may well imagine what a noise 450 men made, when they cried as one man, and with all their might, O Baal, hear us; O Baal, answer us; as it is in the margin: and this, for some hours together, longer than Diana's worshippers made their cry, Great is Diana of the Ephesians, Acts 19. 34. How senseless, how brutish, were they in their addresses to Baal! (1.) Like fools, they leaped upon the altar, as if they would themselves become sacrifices with their bullock: or, thus they expressed their great earnestness of mind. They leaped up and down, or danced about the altar: they hoped, by their dancing, to please their deity, as Herodias did Herod, and so obtain their request. (2.) Like madmen, they cut themselves in pieces with knives and lancets, (v. 28.) for vexation that they were not answered, or in a sort of prophetic fury, hoping to obtain the favour of their god, by offering to him their own blood, when they could not do it with the blood of their bullock. God never required his worshippers thus to honour him; but the service of the Devil, though, in some instances, it pleases and pampers the body, yet, in other things, it is really cruel to it, as in envy and drunkenness. It seems, this was the manner of the worshippers of Baal: God expressly forbade his worshippers to cut themselves, Deut. 14. 1. He insists upon it, that we mortify our lusts and corrup-

tions; but corporeal penances and severities, such as the Papists use, which have no tendency to that, are no pleasure to him: Who has required these things at your hands?

2. How sharp Elijah was upon them, v. 27. He stood by them, and patiently heard them for many hours, praying to an idol, yet with secret indignation and disdain; and, at noon, when the sun was at the hottest, and they too expecting fire, then, if ever, he upbraided them with their folly; and notwithstanding the gravity of his office, and the seriousness of the work he had before him, banters them, "Cry aloud, for he is a god; a goodly god that cannot be made to hear without all this clamour. Surely you think he is talking, or meditating," as the word is, "or he is pursuing some deep thoughts, thinking of somewhat else, and not minding his own matter, when not your credit only, but all his honour, lies at stake, and his interest in Israel. His new conquest will be lost, if he do not look about him quickly." Note, The worship of idols is a most ridiculous thing, and it is but justice to represent it so, and expose it to scorn. This will, by no means, justify those who ridicule the worshippers of God in Christ, because the worship is not performed just in their way. Baal's prophets were so far from being convinced and put to shame by the just reproach Elijah cast upon them, that it made them the more violent, and act more ridiculously. A deceived heart having turned them aside, they could not deliver their souls by saying, Is there not a lie in our right hand?

3. How deaf Baal was to them. Elijah did not interrupt them, but let them go on, till they were tired, and quite despaired of success, which was not till the time of the evening sacrifice, v. 29. During all that time, some of them prayed, while others of them prophesied, sang hymns, perhaps, to the praise of Baal, or, rather, encouraged those that were praying to proceed, telling them, Baal would answer them at last; but there was no answer, nor any that regarded. Idols could do neither good nor evil. The prince of the power of the air, if God had permitted him, could have caused fire to come down from heaven on this occasion, and gladly would have done it for the support of his Baal. We find that the beast which deceives the world, does it, Rev. 13. 13. He maketh fire come down from heaven in the sight of men, and so deceiveth them, v. 14. But God would not suffer the Devil to do it now, because the trial of his title was put on that issue by consent of parties.

V. Elijah soon obtains from his God an answer by fire. The Baalites are forced to give up their cause, and now it is Elijah's turn to produce his. Let us see if he speed better.

1. He fitted up an altar. He would not make use of their's, which had been polluted with their prayers to Baal, but, finding the ruins of an altar there, which had formerly been used in the service of the Lord, he chose to repair that, (v. 30.) to intimate to them that he was not about to introduce any new religion, but to revive the faith and worship of their fathers' God, and reduce them to their first love, their first works. He could not bring them to the altar at Jerusalem, unless he could have united the two kingdoms again, (which, for correction to both, God designed should not now be done,) therefore by his prophetic authority, he builds an altar on mount Carmel, and so owns that which had formerly been built there. When we cannot carry a reformation so far as we would, we must do what we can, and rather comply with some corruptions than not do our utmost toward the extirpation of Baal. He repaired this altar with twelve stones, according to the number of the twelve tribes, v. 31. Though ten of the tribes were revolted to Baal, he will look upon them as belonging to God still, by virtue of the ancient covenant with their fathers; and though those ten were unhappily divided from the other two in civil interest, yet in the worship of the God of Israel they had communion with each other, and they twelve were one. Mention is made of God's calling their father Jacob by the name of Israel, a prince with God, (v. 31.) to shame his degenerate seed, who worshipped a god, which, they saw, could not hear or answer them, and to encourage the prophet, who was now to wrestle with God as Jacob did; he also shall be a prince with God, Ps. 24. 6, Thy face, O Jacob. Hos. 12. 4, There he spake with us.

2. Having built his altar in the name of the Lord, (v. 32.) by direction from him, and with an eye to him, and not for his own honour, he prepared his sacrifice, v. 33. Behold the bullock and the wood: but where is the fire? (Gen. 22. 7, 8.) God will provide himself fire. If we, in sincerity, offer our hearts to God, he will, by his grace, kindle a holy fire in them. Elijah was no priest, nor his attendants Levites; Carmel had neither tabernacle nor temple, it was a great way distant from the ark of the testimony, and the place God had chosen; this was not the altar that sanctified the gift; yet never was any sacrifice more acceptable to God than this. The particular Levitical institutions were so often dispensed with, (as in the time of the Judges, Samuel's time, and now,) that one would be tempted to think they were more designed for types to be fulfilled in the evangelical anti-types, than for laws to be fulfilled in the strict observance of them. Their perishing thus in the using, as the apostle speaks of them, (Col. 2. 22.) was to intimate the utter abolishing of them, after a while, Heb. 8. 13.

3. He ordered abundance of water to be poured upon his altar, which he had prepared a trench for the reception of, (v. 32.) and, some think, made the altar hollow. Twelve barrels of water, (probably sea-water, for the sea was near, and so much fresh water, in the time of drought, was too precious for him to be so prodigal of it,) thrice four, he poured upon his sacrifice, to prevent the suspicion of any fire under; for if there had been any, this would have put it out; and to make the expected miracle the more illustrious.

4. He then solemnly addressed himself to God by prayer, before his altar, humbly beseeching him to turn to ashes his burnt-offering, (as the phrase is, Ps. 20. 3.) and to testify his acceptance of it. His prayer is not long, for he used no vain repetitions, nor thought he should be heard for his much speaking: but it is very grave and composed, and shows his mind to be calm and sedate, and far from the heats and disorders that Baal's prophets were in, v. 36, 37. Though he was not at the place appointed, he chose the appointed time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, thereby to testify his communion with the altar at Jerusalem. Though he expected an answer by fire, yet he came near to the altar with boldness, and feared not that fire. He addressed himself to God, as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, acting faith on God's ancient covenant, and reminding the people too (for prayer may prevail) of their relation both to God and to the patriarchs. Two things he pleads here; (1.) The glory of God; "Lord, hear me, and answer me, that it may be known (for it is now by the most denied or forgotten) that thou art God in Israel, to whom alone the homage and devotion of Israel are due, and that I am thy servant, and do all I have done, am doing, and shall do, as thine agent, at thy word, and not to gratify any humour or passion of my own. Thou employest me; Lord, make it appear that thou dost so," see Numb. 16. 28, 29. Elijah sought not his own glory, but in subserviency to God's, and for his own necessary vindication. (2.) The edification of the people: "That they may know that thou art the Lord, and may experience thy grace, turning their heart, by this miracle, as a means, back again to thee, in order to thy return in a way of mercy to them."

5. God immediately answered by fire, v. 38. Elijah's God was neither talking nor pursuing, needed not to be either awakened or quickened; while he was yet speaking, the fire of the Lord fell, and not only, as at other times, (Lev. 9. 24. 1 Chron. 21. 26. 2 Chron. 7. 1.) consumed the sacrifice and the wood, in token of God's acceptance of the offering, but licked up all the water in the trench, exhaling that, and drawing it up as a vapour, in order to the intended rain, which was to be the fruit of this sacrifice and prayer, more than of natural causes. Compare Ps. 135. 7, He causeth vapours to ascend, and maketh lightnings for the rain; for this rain he did both. Those who fall as victims to the fire of God's wrath, no water can shelter from it, any more than briars or thorns, Isa. 27. 4, 5. But this was not all; to complete the miracle, the fire consumed the stones of the altar, and the very dust, to show that it was no ordinary fire, and perhaps to intimate that though God accepted this occasional sacrifice from this altar, yet, for the future, they ought to demolish all the altars on their high places, and, for their constant sacrifices, make use of that at Jerusalem only. Moses's altar and Solomon's were consecrated by the fire from heaven; but this was destroyed, because no more to be used. We may well imagine what a terror the fire struck on guilty Ahab, and all the worshippers of Baal, and how they fled from it as far and as fast as they could, Lest it consume us also, alluding to Numb. 16. 34.

Lastly, What was the result of this fair trial. The prophets of Baal had failed in their proof, and could give no evidence at all, to make out their pretensions on the behalf of their God, but were perfectly unsuited; Elijah had, by the most convincing and undeniable evidence, proved his claims on behalf of the God of Israel.

And now, 1. The people, as the jury, give in their verdict upon the trial, and they are all agreed in it; the case is so plain, they need not go from the bar to consider of their verdict, or consult about it, they fell on their faces, and all, as one man, said, "Jehovah, he is the God, and not Baal; we are convinced and satisfied of it, Jehovah, he is the God," v. 39. Whence, one would think, they should have inferred, "If he be the God, he shall be our God, and we will serve him only," as Josh. 24. 24. Some, we hope, had their hearts thus turned back, but the generality of them were convinced only, not converted; yielded to the truth of God, that he is the God, but consented not to his covenant, that he should be their's. Blessed are they that have not seen what they saw, and yet have believed, and been wrought upon by it, more than they that saw it. Let it for ever be looked upon as a point adjudged against all pretenders, (for it was carried, upon a full hearing, against one of the most daring and threatening competitors that ever the God of Israel was affronted by,) that Jehovah, he is God, God alone.

2. The prophets of Baal, as criminals, are seized, condemned, and executed, according to law, v. 40. If Jehovah be the true God, Baal is a false God, to whom these Israelites had revolted, and seduced others to the worship of him; and therefore, by the express law of God, they were to be put to death, Deut. 13. 1-11. There needed no proof of the fact, all Israel were witnesses of it, and therefore Elijah (acting still by an extraordinary commission, which is not to be drawn into a precedent) orders them all to be slain immediately, as the troublers of the land; and Ahab himself is so terrified, for the present, with the fire from heaven, that he dares not oppose it. These were the 450 prophets of Baal; the 400 prophets of the groves, (who, some think, were Sidonians,) though summoned, (v. 19.) yet, as it should seem, did not attend, and so escaped this execution, which fair escape perhaps Ahab and Jezebel thought themselves happy in; but it proved they were reserved to be the instruments of Ahab's destruction, some time after, by encouraging him to go up to Ramoth-Gilead, ch. 22. 6.

41. And Elijah said unto Ahab, Get thee up, eat and drink; for there is a sound of abundance of rain. 42. So Ahab went up to eat and to drink. And Elijah went up to the top of Carmel; and he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees, 43. And said to his servant, Go up now, look toward the sea. And he went up, and looked, and said, There is nothing. And he said, Go again seven times. 44. And it came to pass at the seventh time, that he said, Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand. And he said, Go up, say unto Ahab, Prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not. 45. And it came to pass in the mean while, that the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain. And Ahab rode, and went to Jezreel. 46. And the hand of the LORD was on Elijah: and he girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel.

Israel being thus far reformed, that they had acknowledged the Lord to be God, and had consented to the execution of Baal's prophets, that they might not seduce them any more, though it was far short of a thorough reformation, yet was so far accepted, that God, thereupon, opened the bottles of heaven, and poured out blessings upon his land, that very evening (as it should seem) on which they did this good work, which should have confirmed them in their reformation; see Hag. 2. 18, 19.

1. Elijah sends Ahab to eat and drink, for joy that God had now accepted his works, and that rain was coming; see Eccl. 9. 7. Ahab had continued fasting all day, either religiously, it being a day of prayer, or for want of leisure, it being a day of great expectation; but now let him eat and drink, for though others perceive no sign of it, Elijah, by faith, hears the sound of abundance of rain, v. 41. God reveals his secrets to his servants the prophets; and yet, without a revelation, we may foresee that when man's judgments run down like a river, God's mercy will. Rain is the river of God, Ps. 65. 9.

2. He himself retires to pray, (for though God has promised rain, he must ask it, Zech. 10. 1.) and to give thanks for God's answer by fire, now hoping for an answer by water. What he said, we are not told: but, (1.) He withdrew himself to the top of Carmel, which was very high and very private. Hence we read of those that hide themselves in the top of Carmel, Amos 9. 3. There he would be alone. Those who are called to appear, and act in public, for God, must yet find time to be private with him, and keep up their converse with him in solitude. There he set himself, as it were, upon his watch tower, like the prophet, Hab. 2. 1. (2.) He cast himself down on his knees upon the earth, in token of humility, reverence, and impertunity; and put his face between his knees, that is, bowed his head so low that it touched his knees, thus abasing himself in the sense of his own meanness, now that God had thus honoured him.

3. He orders his servant to bring him notice, as soon as he discerned a cloud arising out of the sea, the Mediterranean sea, which he had a great prospect of from the top of Carmel. The sailors at this day call it Cape Carmel. Six times his servant goes to the point of the hill, and sees nothing, brings no good news to his master; yet Elijah continues praying; will not be diverted so far as to go and see with his own eyes, but still sends his servant to see if he could discover any hopeful cloud, while he keeps his mind close and intent in prayer, and abides by it, as one that had taken up his father Jacob's resolution, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me. Note, Though the answer of our fervent and believing supplications does not come quickly, yet we must continue instant in prayer, and not faint or give over; for, at the end, it shall speak, and not lie.

4. A little cloud, at length, appears, no bigger than a man's hand, which presently overspreads the heavens, and waters the earth, v. 44, 45. Great blessings often arise from small beginnings, and showers of plenty from a cloud a span long. Let us therefore never despise the day of small things, but hope and wait for great things from it. This was not as a morning-cloud, which passes away, (though Israel's goodness was so,) but one that produced a plentiful rain, (Ps. 68. 9.) and an earnest of more.

5. Elijah, hereupon, hastens Ahab home, and attends him himself. Ahab rode in his chariot, at ease and in state, v. 45. Elijah ran on foot before him. If Ahab had paid the respect to Elijah that he deserved, he would have taken him into his chariot, as the eunuch did Philip, that he might honour him before the elders of Israel, and confer with him further about the reformation of the kingdom: but his corruptions got the better of his convictions, and he was glad to get clear of him, as Felix of Paul, when he dismissed him, and adjourned his conference with him to a more convenient season. But since Ahab invites him not to ride with him, he will run before him, (v. 46.) as one of his footmen, that he might not seem to be lifted up with the great honour God had put upon him, or to abate in his civil respect to this prince, though he reproved him faithfully. God's ministers should make it appear that how great soever they look when they deliver God's messages, yet they are far from affecting worldly grandeur: let them leave that to the kings of the earth.

CHAP. XIX.

We left Elijah at the entrance of Jezreel, still appearing publicly, and all the people's eyes upon him. In this chapter, we have him again absconding, and driven into obscurity, at a time when he could ill have been spared, but we are to look upon it as a punishment to Israel for the insincerity and inconstancy of their reformation. When people will not learn, it is just with God to remove their teachers into corners. Now observe, I. How he was driven into banishment by the malice of Jezebel, his sworn enemy, v. 1. 3. II. How he was met, in his banishment, by the favour of God, his covenant Friend. 1. How he fed him, v. 4. 8. 2. How he conversed with him, and manifested himself to him, (v. 9, 11. 13.) heard his complaint, (v. 10, 14.) directed him what to do, (v. 15. 17.) and encouraged him, v. 18. III. How his hands were strengthened, at his return out of banishment, by the joining of Elisha with him, v. 19. 21.

1. AND Ahab told Jezebel all that Elijah had done and withal how he had slain all the prophets with the sword. 2. Then Jezebel sent a messenger unto Elijah, saying, So let the gods do to me, and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow about this time. 3. And when he saw that, he arose, and went for his life, and came to Beer-sheba, which belongeth to Judah, and left his servant there. 4. But he himself went a day's journey into the wilderness, and came and sat down under a juniper-tree: and he requested for himself that he might die; and said, It is enough; now, O LORD, take away my life; for I am not better than my fathers. 5. And as he lay and slept under a juniper-tree, behold, then an angel touched him, and said unto him, Arise, and eat. 6. And he looked, and, behold, there was a cake baken on the coals, and a cruse of water at his head. And he did eat and drink, and laid him down again. 7. And the angel of the LORD came again the second time, and touched him, and said, Arise and eat; because the journey is too great for thee. 8. And he arose, and did eat and drink, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb the mount of God.

One would have expected, after such a public and sensible manifestation of the glory of God, and such a clear decision of the controversy depending between him and Baal, to the honour of Elijah, the confusion of Baal's prophets, and the universal satisfaction of the people; after they had seen both fire and water come from heaven, at the prayer of Elijah, and both, in mercy to them; the one, as it signified the acceptance of their offering, the other, as it refreshed their inheritance, which was weary; that now they should all, as one man, have returned to the worship of the God of Israel, and taken Elijah for their guide and oracle, that he should from henceforward have been prime minister of state, and his directions laws both to king and kingdom. But it is quite otherwise; he is neglected, whom God honoured; no respect is paid him, no care taken of him; nor any use made of him, but, on the contrary, in the land of Israel, to which he had been, and might have been, so great a blessing, he finds it impossible to dwell.

I. Ahab incensed Jezebel against him. That queen-consort, it seems, was, in effect, queen-regent, as she was afterward, when she was queen-dowager; an imperious woman that managed king and kingdom, and did what she would. Ahab's conscience would not let him persecute Elijah, (some remains he had in him of the blood and spirit of an Israelite, which tied his hands,) but he told Jezebel all that Elijah had done, (v. 1.) not to convince, but to exasperate her. It is not said, he told her what God had done, but what Elijah had done; as if he, by some spell or charm, had brought fire from heaven, and the hand of the Lord had not been in it. Especially, he represented to her, as that which would make her outrageous against him, that he had slain the prophets; the prophets of Baal he calls the prophets, as if none but they were worthy of the name. They were the gods his heart was upon, and he aggravates the slaying of them as Elijah's crime, without taking notice that it was a just reprisal upon her for killing God's prophets, ch. 18. 4. Those who, when they cannot, for shame or fear, do mischief themselves, yet stir up others to do it, will have it laid to their charge, as if they had themselves done it.

II. Jezebel sent him a threatening message, (v. 2.) that she had vowed and sworn to be the death of him within 24 hours. Something prevented her from doing it just now, but she resolves it shall not be long undone. Note, Carnal hearts are hardened and enraged against God by that which should convince and conquer them, and bring them into subjection to him. She swears by her gods, and raging, like one distracted, cursed herself if she slay not him, without any proviso of a divine permission. Cruelty and confidence often meet in persecutors: I will pursue, I will overtake, Exod. 15. 9. But how came she to send him word of her design, and so, to give him an opportunity of making his escape? Did she think him so daring, that he would not flee; or did she think herself able to prevent it? Or was there a special providence in it, that she should be thus infuriated by her own fury? I am apt to think that though she desired nothing more than his blood, yet, at this time, she durst not meddle with him, for fear of the people, all counting him a prophet, a great prophet, and therefore sent this message to him, merely to frighten him, and get him out of the way, for the present, that he might not carry on what he had begun. The backing of her threats with an oath and imprecation, does not at all prove that she really intended it, but only intended to make him believe it. The gods she swore by, could do her no harm.

III. Elijah, hereupon, in a great fright, fled for his life, it is likely by night, and came to Beer-sheba, v. 3. Shall we praise him for this? We praise him not. Where was the courage with which he had lately confronted Ahab, and all the prophets of Baal? Nay, which kept him by his sacrifice, when the fire of God fell upon it? He that stood undaunted in the midst of the terrors both of heaven and earth, trembles at the impotent menaces of a proud passionate woman. Lord, what is man! Great faith is not always alike strong. He could not but know that he might be very serviceable to Israel at this juncture, and had all the reason in the world to depend upon God's protection, while he was doing God's work; yet he flies. In his former danger, God had bidden him hide himself, (ch. 17. 3.) therefore he supposed he might do it now.

IV. From Beer-sheba he went forward into the wilderness, that vast howling wilderness in which the Israelites wandered. Beer-sheba was so far distant from Jezreel, and within the dominion of so good a king as Jehoshaphat, that he could not but be safe there; yet, as if his fears haunted him, even then when he was out of the reach of danger, he cannot rest there, but went a day's journey into the desert. Yet perhaps he retired thither, not so much for his safety, as that he might be wholly retired from the world, in order to a more free and intimate communion with God. He left his servant at Beer-sheba, that he might be private in the wilderness, as Abraham left his servants at the bottom of the hill when he went up into the mount to worship God, and as Christ in the garden was withdrawn from his disciples: or perhaps it was because he would not expose his servant, who was young and tender, to the hardships of the wilderness; that would be putting new wine into old bottles. We ought thus to consider the frame of those who are under our charge, for God considers ours.

V. Being wearied with his journey, he grew cross, (like children when they are sleepy,) and wishea he might die, v. 4. He requested for his life, (so it is in the margin,) that he might die; for death is life to a good man; the death of the body is the life of the soul. Yet that was not the reason why he wished to die; it was not the deliberate desire of grace, as Paul's, to depart and be with Christ, but the passionate wish of his corruption, as Job's. Those that are, in this manner, forward to die, are not in the fittest frame for it. Jezebel has sworn his death, and therefore he, in a fret, prays for it, runs from death to death, yet with this difference, he wishes to die by the hand of the Lord, whose tender mercies are great, and not to fall into the hands of man, whose tender mercies are cruel. He would rather die in the wilderness, than as Baal's prophets died, according to Jezebel's threatening, (v. 2.) lest the worshippers of Baal triumph, and blaspheme the God of Israel, whom they will think themselves too hard for, if they can run down his advocate. He pleads, "It is enough; I have done enough, and suffered enough; I am weary of living." Those that have secured such a happiness in the other world, will soon have enough of this world. He pleads, "I am not better than my fathers, nor better able to bear those fatigues; and therefore why should I be longer burthened with them than they were?' But is this that my lord Elijah? Can that great and gallant spirit shrink thus? God thus left him to himself, to show that when he was bold and strong, it was in the Lord, and the power of his might, but of himself he was no better than his fathers, or brethren.

VI. God, by an angel, fed him in that wilderness, into the wants and perils of which he had wilfully thrown himself, and in which, if God had not graciously succoured him, he had perished. How much better does God deal with his froward children than they deserve! Elijah, in a fit of despondency, wished to die; God needed him not, yet designed further to honour him, and therefore sent an angel to keep him alive. Our case would be bad sometimes, if God should take us at our word, and grant us our foolish passionate requests. Having prayed that he might die, he laid down and slept, (v. 5.) wishing it might be to die in his sleep, and not to wake again; but he is awakened out of his sleep, and finds himself not only well provided for with bread and water, (v. 6.) but, which was more, attended by an angel, who guarded him when he slept, and twice called him to his food when it was ready for him, v. 5, 7. He needed not complain of the unkindnesses of men, when it was thus made up by the ministration of angels. Thus provided for, he had reason to think he fared better than the prophets of the groves, that did eat at Jezebel's table. Wherever God's children are, as they are still upon their Father's ground, so they are still under their Father's eye and care. They may lose themselves in a wilderness, but God has not left them; there they may look at him that lives, and sees them, as Hagar, Gen. 16, 13.

Lastly, He is carried, in the strength of this meat, to Horeb, the mount of God, v. 8. Thither the Spirit of the Lord led him, probably, beyond his own intention, that he might have communion with God in the same place where Moses had, the law that was given by Moses, being revived by him. The angel bade him eat the second time, because of the greatness of the journey that was before him, v. 7. Note, God knows what he designs us for, though we do not, what services, what trials, and will take care for us, when we, for want of foresight, cannot for ourselves, that we be furnished for them with grace sufficient. He that appoints what the voyage shall be, will victual the ship accordingly. See how many different ways God took to keep Elijah alive; fed him by ravens, with multiplied meals—then by an angel—and now, to show that man lives not by bread alone, he kept him alive 40 days without meat, not resting and sleeping, which might make him the less to crave sustenance, but continually traversing the mazes of the desert, a day for a year of Israel's wanderings; yet he neither needs food, nor desires it. The place, no doubt, reminds him of the manna, and encourages him to hope that God would sustain him here, and, in due time, bring him hence, as he did Israel, though, like him, fretful and distrustful.

9. And he came thither unto a cave, and lodged there; and, behold, the word of the Lord came to him, and he said unto him, What doest thou here, Elijah? 10. And he said, I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts: for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword: and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away. 11. And he said, Go forth, and stand upon the mount before the Lord. And, behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks, before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind: and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake: 12. And after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire a still small voice. 13. And it was so, when Elijah heard it, that he wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out, and stood in the entering in of the cave. And, behold, there came a voice unto him, and said, What doest thou here, Elijah? 14. And he said, I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts: because the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword: and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away. 15. And the Lord said unto him, Go, return on thy way to the wilderness of Damascus: and when thou comest, anoint Hazael to be king over Syria. 16. And Jehu the son of Niinshi shalt thou anoint to be king over Israel: and Elisha the son of Shaphat, of Abel-meholah, shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room. 17. And it shall come to pass, that him that escapeth the sword of Hazael shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth from the sword of Jehu shall Elisha slay. 18. Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him.

Here is,

I. Elijah housed in a cave at mount Horeb, which is called the mount of God, because on it God had formerly manifested his glory. And, perhaps, this was the same cave, or cleft of a rock, in which Moses was hidden, when the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed his name, Exod. 34, 6. What Elijah proposed to himself, in coming to lodge here, I cannot conceive, unless it were either to indulge his melancholy, or to satisfy his curiosity, and assist his faith and devotion, with the sight of that famous place where the law was given, and so many great things were done, and hoping to meet with God himself, there where Moses met with him; or, in token of his abandoning his people Israel, who hated to be reformed; and so it agrees with Jeremiah's wish, (Jer. 9. 2.) O that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men, that I might leave my people and go from them, for they be all adulterous; and so it was a bad omen of God's forsaking them: or, it was because he thought he could not be safe any where else; and to this instance of the hardships this good man was reduced to, the apostle refers, Heb. 11. 38, They wandered in deserts and in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth.

II. The visit God made him there, and the inquiry he made concerning him: The word of the Lord came to him. We cannot go any whither, to be out of the reach of God's eye, his arm, and his word. Whither can I flee from thy Spirit? Ps. 139. 7, &c. God will take care of his out-casts; and those who, for his sake, are driven out from among men, he will find, and own, and gather with everlasting loving-kindnesses. St. John saw the visions of the Almighty, when he was in banishment in the isle of Patmos, Rev. 1. 9.

The question God puts to him, is, What doest thou here, Elijah? v. 9. and again, v. 13. This is a reproof, 1. For his fleeing thither. "What brings thee so far from home? Dost thou flee from Jezebel? Couldst thou not depend upon almighty power for thy protection?" Lay the emphasis upon [thou]. What thou! So great a man, so great a prophet, so famed for resolution—dost thou run thy country, run thy colours thus?" This cowardice had been more excusable in another, and not so bad an example. Should such a man as I am flee? Neh. 6. 11. Howl, fir-trees, if the cedars be thus shaken. 2. For his fixing here. "What doest thou here in this cave? Is this a place for a prophet of the Lord to lodge in? Is this a time for such men to retreat, when the public has such need of them?" In the retirement to which God sent Elijah, ch. 17. he was a blessing to a poor widow at Sarepta, but here he had no opportunity of doing good. Note, It concerns us often to inquire, whether we be in our place, and in the way of our duty. "Am I where I should be; whither God calls me, where my business lies, and where I may be useful?"

III. The account he gives of himself, in answer to the question put to him, (v. 10.) and repeated, in answer to the same question, v. 14. In which, 1. He excuses his retreat, and desires it may not be imputed to his want of zeal for reformation, but to his despair of success. For God knew, and his own conscience witnessed for him, that as long as there was any hope of doing good, he had been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts; but now that he had laboured in vain, and all his endeavours were to no purpose, he thought it was time to give up the cause, and mourn for what he could not mend. Abi in cellam, et dic, Miserere mei—Away to thy cell, and cry, Have compassion on me. 2. He complains of the people, their obstinacy in sin, and the height of impiety they were got to; The children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, and that is the reason I have forsaken them; who can stay among them, to see every thing that is sacred, ruined, and run down? This the apostle calls his making intercession against Israel, Rom. 11. 2, 3. He had often been, of choice, their advocate, but now is necessitated to be their accuser, before God. Thus, (John 5. 45.) There is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. Those are truly miserable, that have the testimony and prayers of God's prophets against them. 3. He charges them with having forsaken God's covenant; though they retained circumcision, the sign and seal of it, yet they had quitted his worship and service, which was the intention of it. Those who neglect God's ordinances, and let fall their communion with him, do really forsake his covenant, and break their league with him. He charges them with having thrown down his altars; they not only deserted them, and suffered them to go to decay, but, in their zeal for the worship of Baal, had wilfully demolished them. He alludes to private altars which the prophets of the Lord had, and which good people attended, who could not go up to Jerusalem, and would not worship the calves nor Baal; these separate altars, though breaking in upon the unity of the church, yet, being erected and attended by those that sincerely aimed at the glory of God, and served him faithfully, were excused from the charge of schism; God owned them for his altars, as well as that at Jerusalem, and the putting of them down is charged upon Israel as a crying sin. But this was not all; They have slain thy prophets with the sword, who, it is probable, ministered at those altars. Jezebel, a foreigner, did it, (ch. 18. 4.) but it is charged upon the body of the people, because the generality of them were consenting to their death, and pleased with it. 4. He gives the reason why he retired into this desert, and took up his residence in this cave. (1.) It was because he could not appear to any purpose: "I only am left, and have none to second or support me in any good design. They all said, The Lord he is God, but none of them would stand by me, or offer to shelter me. That point then gained, was presently lost again, and Jezebel can do more to debauch them, than I can to reform them. What can one do against thousands?" Despair of success hinders many a good enterprise. None are willing to venture alone; forgetting that those are not alone, who have God with them. (2.) It was because he could not appear with any safety; "They seek my life to take it away; and I had better spend my life in a useless solitude, than lose my life in a fruitless endeavour to reform those that hate to be reformed."

IV. God's manifestation of himself to him. Did he come hither to meet with God? He shall find that God will not fail to give him the meeting. Moses was put into the cave, when God's glory passed before him; but Elijah was called out of it, to stand upon the mount before the Lord, v. 11. He saw no manner of similitude, any more than Israel did, when God talked to them in Horeb: but, 1. He heard a strong wind, and saw the terrible effects of it, for it rent the mountains, and tore the rocks. Thus was the trumpet sounded before the Judge of heaven and earth, by his angels, whom he makes spirits, or winds; (Ps. 104. 4.) sounded so loud, the earth not only rang, but rent again. 2. He felt the shock of an earthquake. 3. He saw an eruption of fire, v. 12. These were to usher in the designed manifestation of the divine glory, angels being employed in them, whom he maketh a flame of fire, and who, as his ministers, march before him, to firefare in this desert a high way for our God. But, 4. At last, he perceived a still small voice, in which the Lord was, that is, by which he spake to him, and not out of the wind, or the earthquake, or the fire. Those struck an awe upon him, awakened his attention, and inspired humility and reverence; but God chose to make known his mind to him in soft whispers, not in those dreadful sounds. Which when he perceived, (1.) He wrapped his face in his mantle, as one afraid to look upon the glory of God, and apprehensive that it would dazzle his eyes, and overcome him. The angels cover their faces before God, in token of reverence, Isa. 6. 2. Elijah hid his face, ashamed that he should have been such a coward as to shrink from his duty, when he had such a God of power to stand by him in it. The wind, and earthquake, and fire, did not make him cover his face, but the still voice did. Gracious souls are more affected by the tender mercies of the Lord, than by his terrors. (2.) He stood at the entrance of the cave, ready to hear what God had to say to him. This method of God's manifesting himself here at mount Horeb, seems to refer to the discoveries God formerly made of himself at this place to Moses. [1.] Then there was a tempest, and earthquake, and fire; (Heb. 12. 18.) but when God would show Moses his glory, he proclaimed his goodness; and so here, He was the word, was in the still small voice. [2.] Then the law was thus given to Israel, with the appearances of terror first, and then with a voice of words; and Elijah, being now called to revive that law, especially the two first commandments of it, is here taught how to manage it; he must not only awaken and terrify the people with amazing signs, like the earthquake and fire, but he must endeavour, with a still small voice, to convince and persuade them, and not forsake them, when he should do that. Faith comes by hearing the word of God: miracles do but make way for it. [3.] Then God spake to his people with terror; but in the gospel of Christ, which was to be introduced by the spirit and power of Elias, he would speak with a still small voice, the dread of which should not make us afraid; see Heb. 12. 18, 8c.

V. The orders God gives him to execute. He repeated the question he had put to him before, "What doest thou here?" This is not a place for thee now." Elijah gives the same answer, (v. 14.) complains of Israel's apostasy from God, and the ruin of religion among them. To this, God gives him a reply. When he wished he might die, (v. 4.) God answered him not according to his folly, but was so far from letting him die, that he not only kept him alive then, but provided that he should never die, but be translated. But when he complained of his discouragement, (and whither should God's prophets go with their complaints of that kind, but to their Master?) God gave him an answer. He sends him back with directions to appoint Hazael king of Syria, (v. 15.) Jehu king of Israel, and Elisha his successor in the eminency of the prophetic office; (v. 16.) which is intended as a prediction, that by these God would chastise the degenerate Israelites, plead his own cause among them, and avenge the quarrel of his covenant, v. 17. Elijah complained that the wickedness of Israel was unpunished; the judgment of famine was too gentle, and had not reclaimed them; it was removed, before they were reformed. "I have been jealous," says he, "for God's name, but he himself has not appeared jealous for it." "Well," says God, "be content, it is all in good time, judgments are prepared for those scorers, though they are not yet inflicted; the persons are pitched upon, and shall now be nominated, for they are now in being, who shall do the business." 1. "When Hazael comes to be king of Syria, he shall make bloody work among the people, (2 Kings 8. 12.) and so correct them for their idolatry." 2. "When Jehu comes to be king of Israel, he shall make bloody work with the royal family, and shall utterly destroy the house of Ahab, that set up and maintained idolatry." 3. "Elisha, while thou art on earth, shall strengthen thy hands; and when thou art gone, shall carry on thy work, and be a remaining witness against the apostasy of Israel, and even he shall slay the children of Beth-el, that idolatrous city." Note, The wicked are reserved to judgment. Evil pursues sinners, and there is no escaping it; to attempt an escape, is but to run from one sword's point upon another. See Jer. 48. 44, He that flees from the fear, shall fall into the pit; and he that gets up out of the pit, shall be taken in the snare. Elisha, with the sword of the Spirit, shall terrify and wound the consciences of those who escape Hazael's sword of war, and Jehu's sword of justice; With the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked, Isa. 11. 4. 2 Thess. 3. 8. Hos. 6. 5. It is a great comfort to good men, and good ministers, to think that God will never want instruments to do his work, in his time, but when they are gone, others shall be raised up to carry it on.

VI. The comfortable information God gives him of the number of Israelites who retained their integrity, though he thought he was left alone; (v. 18.) I have left me seven thousand in Israel, (beside Judah,) which have not bowed the knee to Baal. Note, 1. In times of the greatest degeneracy and apostasy, God has always had, and will have, a remnant faithful to him, some that keep their integrity, and do not go down the stream. The apostle mentions this answer of God to Elijah, (Rom. 11. 4.) and applies it to his own day, when the Jews generally rejected the gospel; Yet, says he, at this time also there is a remnant, v. 5. 2. It is God's work to preserve that remnant, and distinguish them from the rest, for without his grace they could not have distinguished themselves: I have left me; it is therefore said to be a remnant, according to the election of grace. 3. It is but a little remnant, in comparison with the degenerate race; what is 7,000 to the thousands of Israel? Yet when those of every age come together, they will be found many more, 12,000 sealed out of each tribe, Rev. 7. 4. 4. God's faithful ones are often his hidden ones, (Ps. 83. 3.) and the visible church scarcely visible; the wheat lost in the chaff, and the gold in the dross, till the sifting, refining, separating, day comes. 5. The Lord knows them that are his, though we do not; he sees them in secret. 6. There are more good people in the world, than some wise and holy men think there are. Their jealousy of themselves, and for God, makes them think the corruption is universal; but God sees not as they do. When we come to heaven, as we shall miss a great many whom we thought to have met there, so shall we meet a great many whom we little thought to have met there. God's love often proves larger than man's charity, and more extensive.

19. So he departed thence, and found Elisha the son of Shaphat, who was ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth: and Elijah passed by him, and cast his mantle upon him. 20. And he left the oxen, and ran after Elijah, and said, Let me, I pray thee, kiss my father and my mother, and then I will follow thee. And he said unto him, Go back again: for what have I done to thee? 21. And he returned back from him, and took a yoke of oxen, and slew them, and boiled their flesh with the instruments of the oxen, and gave unto the people, and they did eat: then he arose, and went after Elijah, and ministered unto him.

Elisha was named last in the orders God gave to Elijah; but is first called, for by him the other two were to be called. He must come in Elijah's room; yet Elijah is forward to raise him, and is far from being jealous of his successor, but rejoices to think that he shall leave the work of God in such good hands.

Concerning the call of Elisha, observe,

1. That it was a surprising call: Elijah found him by divine direction, or, perhaps, he was before acquainted with him, and knew where to find him. He found him, not in the schools of the prophets, but in the field; not reading, or praying, or sacrificing, but ploughing, v. 19. Though a great man, (as appears by his feast, v. 21.) master of the ground, and oxen, and servants, yet he did not think it any disparagement to him, to follow his business himself, and not only to inspect his servants, but himself to lay his hand to the plough. Idleness is no man's honour, nor is husbandry any man's disgrace. An honest calling in the world, does not at all put us out of the way of our heavenly calling; any more than it did Elisha, who was taken from following the plough, to feed Israel, and to sow the seed of the word; as the apostles from fishing, to catch men. Elisha inquired not after Elijah, but was anticipated with this call. We love God, and choose him, because he chose us, and loved us, first.

2. That it was a powerful call: Elijah did but cast his mantle upon him, (v. 19.) in token of friendship, that he would take him under his care and tuition, as he did under his mantle, and to be one with him in the same clothes, or, in token of his being clothed with the spirit of Elijah; now he put some of his honour upon him, as Moses on Joshua; (Numb. 27. 20.) but when Elijah went to heaven, he had the mantle entire, 2 Kings 2. 13. And immediately he left the oxen to go as they would, and ran after Elijah, and assured him that he would follow him presently, v. 20. An invisible hand touched his heart, and unaccountably inclined him by a secret power, without any external persuasions, to quit his husbandry, and give himself to the ministry. It is in a day of power, that Christ's subjects are made willing, (Ps. 110. 3.) nor would any come to Christ, unless they were thus drawn. Elisha came to a resolution presently, but begged a little time, not to ask leave, but only to take leave, of his parents. This was not an excuse for delay, like his (Luke 9. 61.) that desired he might bid them farewell that were at home; but only a reservation of the respect and duty he owed to his father and mother. Elijah bade him go back, and do it, he would not hinder him: nay, if he would, he might go back, and not return, for any thing he had done to him. He will not force him, nor take him against his will; let him sit down and count the cost, and make it his own act. The efficacy of God's grace preserves the native liberty of man's will, so that they who are good, are good of choice, and not by constraint; not pressed men, but volunteers.

3. That it was a pleasant and acceptable call to him, which appears by the farewell feast he made for his family, v. 21. Yet he not only quitted all the comforts of his father's house, but exposed himself to the malignity of Jezebel, and her party; it was a discouraging time for prophets to set out in. A man that had consulted with flesh and blood, would not be fond of Elijah's mantle, nor willing to wear his coat; yet Elisha, cheerfully, and with a great deal of satisfaction, leaves all, to accompany him. Thus Matthew made a great feast, when he left the receipt of custom to follow Christ.

4. That it was an effectual call: Elijah did not stay for him, lest he should seem to compel him, but left him to his own choice, and he soon arose, went after him, and not only associated with him, but ministered to him, as his servitor, poured water on his hands, 2 Kings 3. 11. It is of great advantage to young ministers, to spend some time under the direction of those that are aged and experienced, whose years teach wisdom; and not to think much, if occasion be, to minister to them. Those that would be fit to teach, must have time to learn: and those that hope, hereafter, to rise and rule, must be willing, at first, to stoop and serve.

This chapter is the history of a war between Ben-hadad king of Syria, and Ahab king of Israel, in which Ahab was once, and again, victorious. We read nothing of Elijah or Elisha in all this story; Jezebel's rage, it is probable, was abated, and the persecution of the prophets began to cool; which gleam of peace Elijah improves; he appears not at court, but, being told how many thousand good people there were in Israel, more than he thought of, employs himself, as we may suppose, in founding religious houses, schools, or colleges, of prophets, in several parts of the country, to be nurseries of religion, that they may help to reform the nation, when the throne and court would not be reformed: while they were thus busied, God favoured the nation with the successes we here read of, which were the more remarkable, because obtained against Ben-hadad king of Syria, whose successor, Hazael, was ordained to be a scourge to Israel; they must shortly suffer by the Syrians, and yet now triumph over them, that, if possible, they might be led to repentance by the goodness of God. Here is, I. Ben-hadad's descent upon Israel, and his insolent demand, v. 1. .12. II. The defeat Ahab gave him, encouraged and directed by a prophet, v. 13. .21. III. The Syrians rallying again, and the second defeat Ahab gave them, v. 22. .30. IV. The covenant of peace Ahab made with Ben-hadad, when he had him at his mercy, (v. 31. .34.) for which he is reproved and threatened by a prophet, v. 35. .43.

1. AND Ben-hadad the king of Syria gathered all his host together: and there were thirty and two kings with him, and horses and chariots: and he went up and besieged Samaria, and warred against it. 2. And he sent messengers to Ahab king of Israel into the city, and said unto him, Thus saith Ben-hadad, 3. Thy silver and thy gold is mine; thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine. 4. And the king of Israel answered and said, My lord, O king, according to thy saying, I am thine, and all that I have. 5. And the messengers came again, and said, Thus speaketh Ben-hadad, saying, Although I have sent unto thee, saying, Thou shalt deliver me thy silver, and thy gold, and thy wives, and thy children; 6. Yet I will send my servants unto thee to-morrow about this time, and they shall search thine house, and the houses of thy servants; and it shall be, that whatsoever is pleasant in thine eyes, they shall put it in their hand, and take it away. 7. Then the king of Israel called all the elders of the land, and said, Mark, I pray you, and see how this man seeketh mischief: for he sent unto me for my wives, and for my children, and for my silver, and for my gold, and I denied him not. 8. And all the elders and all the people said unto him, Harken not unto him, nor consent. 9. Wherefore he said unto the messengers of Ben-hadad, Tell my lord the king, All that thou didst send for to thy servant at the first I will do: but this thing I may not do. And the messengers departed, and brought him word again. 10. And Ben-hadad sent unto him, and said, The gods do so unto me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me. 11. And the king of Israel answered and said, Tell him, Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself, as he that putteth it off.

Here is,

1. Ben-hadad's threat to make a descent upon Ahab's kingdom, and the siege he laid to Samaria, his royal city, v. 1. What the ground of the quarrel was, we are not told; covetousness and ambition were the principle, which would never want some pretence or other. David, in his time, had quite subdued the Syrians, and made them tributaries to Israel, but Israel's apostasy from God makes them formidable again. Asa had tempted the Syrians to invade Israel once, (ch. 15. 18. . 20.) and now they did it of their own accord: it is dangerous bringing in a foreign force into a country, posterity may pay dear for it. Ben-hadad had with him 32 kings, who were either tributaries to him, and bound in duty to attend him, or confederates with him, and bound in interest to assist him; how little did the title of king look, when all these poor petty governors pretended to it!

II. The treaty between these two kings; surely Israel's Defence was departed from them, or else the Syrians could not have marched so readily, and with so little opposition, to Samaria, the head and heart of the country, a city lately built, and therefore, we may suppose, not well fortified, but like to fall quickly into the hands of the invaders; both sides are aware of this, and therefore,

1. Ben-hadad's proud spirit sends Ahab a very insolent demand, v. 2, 3. A parley is sounded, and a trumpeter (we may suppose) is sent into the city, to let Ahab know that upon these terms he will raise the siege—that Ahab become his vassal, nay, his villain,* and not only pay him a tribute out of what he has, but make over his title to Ben-hadad, and hold all at his will, even his wives and children, the goodliest of them: the manner of expression is designed to gall them; "All shall be mine, without exception."

2. Ahab's poor spirit sends Ben-hadad a very disgraceful submission; it is general indeed, he cannot mention particulars in his surrender, with so much pleasure as Ben-hadad did in his demand, but it is effectual, I am thine, and all that I have, v. 4. See the effect of sin: (1.) If he had not, by sin, provoked God to depart from him, Ben-hadad could not have made such a demand; sin brings men into such straits, by putting them out of divine protection; if God do not rule us, our enemies shall; a rebel to God, is a slave to all besides. Ahab had prepared his silver and gold for Baal, (Hos. 2. 8.) justly therefore it is taken from him: such an alienation amounts to a forfeiture. (2.) If he had not, by sin, wronged his own conscience, and set that against him, he could not have made such a mean surrender; guilt dispirits men, and makes them cowards; he knew Baal could not help, and had no reason to think that God would, and therefore is content to buy his life upon any terms; skin for skin, and all that is dear to him, he will give for it; he will rather live a beggar, than not die a prince.

3. Ben-hadad's proud spirit rises, upon his submission, and becomes yet more insolent and imperious, v. 5, 6. Ahab had laid his all at his feet, at his mercy, expecting that one king would use another generously, that this acknowledgment of Ben-hadad's sovereignty would have contented him, the honour was sufficient for the present, and he might, hereafter, make use of it if he saw cause; Satis est prostrasse leoni—it suffices the lion to have laid his antagonist prostrate; but this will not serve: (1.) Ben-hadad is as covetous as he is proud, and cannot go away, unless he have the possession as well as the dominion; he thinks it not enough to call it his, unless he have it in his hands; he will not so much as lend Ahab the use of his own goods above a day longer. (2.) He is as spiteful as he is haughty; had he come himself to select what he had a mind for, it had been some respect to a crowned head, but he will send his servants to insult the prince, and hector over him, to rifle the palace, and strip it of all its ornaments; nay, to give Ahab the more vexation, they shall be ordered, not only to take what they please, but, if they can learn which are the persons or things that Ahab is, in a particular manner, fond of, to take those; Whatever is pleasant in thine eyes, they shall take that away. We are often crossed in that which we most doat upon; and that proves least safe, which is most dear. (3.) He is as unreasonable as he is unjust, and will construe the surrender Ahab made for himself, as made for all his subjects too, and will have them also to lie at his mercy. "They shall search, not only thy house, but the houses of thy servants too, and plunder them at discretion." Blessed be God for peace and prosperity, and that what we have, we can call our own.

4. Ahab's poor spirit begins to rise too, upon his growing insolence; and if it becomes not bold, yet it becomes desperate, and he will rather hazard his life than give up all thus. (1.) Now he takes advice of his privy-council, who encourage him to stand it out. He speaks but poorly, (v. 7.) appeals to them whether Ben-hadad were not an unreasonable enemy, and did not seek mischief. What other could he expect from one who, without any provocation given him, had invaded his country, and besieged his capital city? He owns to them how he had truckled to him before, and would have them advise him what he should do in this strait; they speak bravely, (v. 8.) Hearken not to him, nor consent; promising, no doubt, to stand by him in the refusal. (2.) Yet he expresses himself very modestly in his denial; (v. 9.) he owns Ben-hadad's dominion over him; "Tell my lord the king, I have no design to affront him, nor to recede from the surrender I have already made; what I offered at first, I will stand to, but this thing I may not do; I must not give what is none of my own." It was a mortification to Ben-hadad, that even such an abject spirit as Ahab's was, dares deny him; yet it should seem by his manner of expressing himself, that he durst not have done it, if his people had not animated him.

5. Ben-hadad proudly swears the ruin of Samaria: the threatening waves of his wrath, meeting with this check, rage and foam, and make a noise; in his fury, he imprecates the impotent revenge of his gods. If the dust of Samaria serve for handfuls for his army, (v. 10.) so numerous, so resolute, an army will he bring into the field against Samaria; and so confident is he of their success, it will be done as easily as the taking up of a handful of dust; all shall be carried away, even the ground on which the city stands. Thus confident is his pride, thus cruel is his malice; this prepares him to be ruined, though such a prince and such a people are unworthy of the satisfaction of seeing him ruined.

6. Ahab sends him a decent rebuke to his assurance; dares not defy his menaces, only reminds him of the uncertain turns of war; (v. 11.) "Let not him that begins a war, and his girding on his sword, his armour, his harness, boast of victory, or think himself sure of it, as if he had put it off, and were come home a conqueror." This, was one of the wisest words that ever Ahab spake, and is a good item or memento to us all: it is folly to boast before, of any day, since we know not what it may bring forth; (Prov. 27. 1.) but especially to boast of a day of battle, which may prove as much against us, as we promise ourselves it will be for us. It is impolitic to despise an enemy, and to be too sure of victory is the way to be beaten. Apply it to our spiritual conflicts; Peter fell by his confidence: while we are here, we are but girding on the harness, and therefore must never boast as though we had put it off. Happy is the man that feareth always, and is never off his watch.

12. And it came to pass, when Ben-hadad heard this message, as he was drinking, he and the kings in the pavilions, that he said unto his servants; Set yourselves in array: and they set themselves in array against the city. 13. And, behold, there came a prophet unto Ahab king of Israel, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Hast thou seen all this great multitude? behold, I will deliver it into thine hand this day; and thou shalt know that I am the LORD. 14. And Ahab said, By whom? And he said, Thus saith the LORD, Even by the young men of the princes of the provinces. Then he said, Who shall order the battle? And he answered, Thou. 15. Then he numbered the young men of the princes of the provinces, and they were two hundred and thirty-two: and after them he numbered all the people, even all the children of Israel, being seven thousand. 16. And they went out at noon: but Ben-hadad was drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings, the thirty and two kings that helped him. 17. And the young men of the princes of the provinces went out first; and Ben-hadad sent out, and they told him, saying, There are men come out of Samaria. 18. And he said, Whether they be come out for peace, take them alive; or whether they be come out for war, take them alive. 19. So these young men of the princes of the provinces came out of the city, and the army which followed them. 20. And they slew every one his man: and the Syrians fled; and Israel pursued them: and Ben-hadad the king of Syria escaped on a horse with the horsemen. 21. And the king of Israel went out, and smote the horses and chariots, and slew the Syrians with a great slaughter.

The treaty between the besiegers and the besieged being broken off abruptly, we have here an account of the battle that ensued immediately.

I. The Syrians, the besiegers, had their directions from a drunken king, who gave orders over his cups, as he was drinking, (v. 12.) drinking himself drunk (v. 16.) with the kings in the pavilions, and this, at noon. Drunkenness is a sin, which armies and their officers have, of old, been addicted to. Say not thou then the former days were, in this respect, better than these, though these are bad enough; had he not been very secure, he would not have sat to drink; and had he not been intoxicated, he would not have been so very secure: security and sensuality went together in the old world, and Sodom, Luke 17. 26, &c. Ben-hadad's drunkenness was the forerunner of his fall, as Belshazzar's was, Dan. 5. How could he prosper, that preferred his pleasure before his business, and kept his kings to drink with him, when they should have been at their respective posts to fight for him? In his drink, 1. He orders the town to be invested, the engines fixed, and every thing got ready for the making of a general attack, (v. 12.) but stirs not from his drunken club to see it done; Woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is such a child. 2. When the besieged made a sally, (and, by that time, he was far gone,) he gave orders to take them alive, (v. 18.) not to kill them, which might have been done more easily and safely, but to seize them, which gave them an opportunity of killing the aggressors; so imprudent was he in the orders he gave, as well as unjust, in ordering them to be taken prisoners, though they came for peace, and to renew the treaty; thus, as is usual, he drinks, and forgets the law, both the policies and the justice of war.

II. The Israelites, the besieged, had their directions from an inspired prophet, one of the prophets of the Lord, whom Ahab had hated and persecuted: And behold, a prophet, even one, drew near to the king of Israel; so it may be read, v. 13. Behold, and wonder, that God should send a prophet with a kind and gracious message to so wicked a prince as Ahab was; but he did it, 1. For his people Israel's sake, who, though wickedly degenerated, were the seed of Abraham his friend, and Jacob his chosen, the children of the covenant, and not yet cast off. 2. That he might magnify his mercy, in doing good to one so evil and unthankful; might either bring him to repentance, or leave him the more inexcusable. 3. That he might mortify the pride of Ben-hadad, and check his insolence: Ahab's idolatry shall be punished hereafter, but Ben-hadad's haughtiness shall be chastised now; for God resists the proud, and is pleased to say that he fears the wrath of the enemy, Deut. 32. 26, 27. There was but one prophet, perhaps, to be had in Samaria, and he drew near with this message, intimating that he had been forced to keep at a distance; Ahab, in his prosperity, would not have borne the sight of him, but now he bids him welcome, when none of the prophets of the groves could give him any assistance; he inquired not for a prophet of the Lord, but God sent one to him, unasked, for he waits to be gracious.

Now, (1.) This prophet animates him with an assurance of victory, which was more than all the elders of Israel could give him, (v. 8.) though they promised to stand by him. This prophet, who is not named, (for he shake in God's name), tells him, from God, that this very day the siege should be raised, and the army of the Syrians routed, v. 13. When the prophet said, Thus saith the Lord, we may suppose Ahab began to tremble, expecting a message of wrath: but he is revived, when it proves a gracious one. He is reminded of the use he must make of this blessed turn of affairs; "Thou shalt know that I am Jehovah, the sovereign Lord of all." God's foretelling a thing that was so very unlikely, proved that it was his own doing. (2.) He instructs him what to do for the gaining of this victory. [1.] He must not stay till the enemy had attacked him, but must sally out upon them, and surprise them in their trenches. [2.] The persons employed must be the young men of the princes of the provinces, the pages, the footmen, who were few in number, but 232, utterly unacquainted with war, and the unlikelyst men that could be thought of, for such a bold attempt; yet these must do it, those weak and foolish things must be the instruments of confounding the wise and strong, that while Ben-hadad's boasting is punished, Ahab's might be prevented and precluded, and the excellency of the power of God. [3.] Ahab must himself so far testify his confidence in the word of God, as to command in person, though, in the eye of reason, he exposed himself to the utmost danger by it; but it is fit that those who have the benefit of God's promises, should venture upon them. Yet, [4.] He is allowed to make use of what forces he had at hand, to follow the blow, when these young men had broken the ice. All he had in Samaria, or within call, were but 7000 men, v. 15. It is observable that it is the same number with their's that had not bowed the knee to Baal, (ch. 19. 18.) though, it is likely, not the same men.

III. The issue was accordingly; the proud Syrians were beaten, and the poor despised Israelites were more than conquerors; the young men gave an alarm to the Syrians, just at noon, at high dinner time, supported by what little force they had, v. 16. Ben-hadad despised them, at first, (v. 18.) but when they had, with unparalleled bravery and dexterity, slain every one his man, and so put the army into disorder, that proud man durst not face them, but mounted immediately, drunk as he was, and made the best of his way, v. 20. See how God slips off the spirit of princes, and makes himself terrible to the kings of the earth. Now where are the silver and gold he demanded of Ahab? Where the handfuls of Samaria's dust? Those that are most secure, are commonly least courageous. Ahab failed not to improve this advantage, but slew the Syrians with a great slaughter, v. 21. Note, God oftentimes makes one wicked man a scourge to another.

22. And the prophet came to the king of Israel, and said unto him, Go, strengthen thyself, and mark and see what thou doest: for at the return of the year the king of Syria will come up against thee. 23. And the servants of the king of Syria said unto him, Their gods are gods of the hills, therefore they were stronger than we: but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they. 24. And do this thing: Take the kings away, every man out of his place, and put captains in their rooms: 25. And number thee an army like the army that thou hast lost, horse for horse, and chariot for chariot: and we will fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they. And he hearkened unto their voice, and did so. 26. And it came to pass, at the return of the year, that Ben-hadad numbered the Syrians, and went up to Aphek, to fight against Israel. 27. And the children of Israel were numbered, and were all present, and went against them: and the children of Israel pitched before them like two little flocks of kids; but the Syrians filled the country. 28. And there came a man of God, and spake unto the king of Israel, and said, Thus saith the LORD, Because the Syrians have said, The LORD is God of the hills, but he is not God of the valleys, therefore will I deliver all this great multitude into thine hand, and ye shall know that I am the LORD. 29. And they pitched one over against the other seven days; and so it was, that in the seventh day the battle was joined: and the children of Israel slew of the Syrians a hundred thousand footmen in one day. 30. But the rest fled to Aphek, into the city; and there a wall fell upon twenty and seven thousand of the men that were left. And Ben-hadad fled, and came into the city, into an inner chamber.

We have here an account of another successful campaign, which Ahab, by divine aid, made against the Syrians, in which he gave them a greater defeat than in the former. Strange! Ahab idolatrous, and yet victorious; a persecutor, and yet a conqueror! God has wise and holy ends, in suffering wicked men to prosper, and in it glorifies his own name.

I. Ahab is admonished by a prophet to prepare for another war, v. 22. It should seem, he was now secure, and looked but a little way before him; those that are careless of their souls, are often as careless of their outward affairs; but the prophet (to whom God made known the following counsels of the Syrians) told him, they would renew their attempt, at the return of the year, hoping to retrieve the honour they had lost, and be avenged for the blow they had received. He therefore bade him strengthen himself, put himself into a posture of defence, and be ready to give them a warm reception. God had decreed the end, but Ahab must use the means, else he tempts God: "Help thyself, strengthen thyself, and God will help and strengthen thee." The enemies of God's Israel are restless in their malice, and though they may take some breathing time for themselves, yet are still breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the church. It concerns us always to expect assaults from our spiritual enemies, and therefore to mark and see what we do.

II. Ben-hadad is advised by those about him concerning the operations of the next campaign.

1. They advised him to change his ground, v. 23. They take it for granted that it was not Israel, but Israel's gods, that beat them; (so great a regard was then universally had to invisible powers;) but they speak very ignorantly of Jehovah—that he was many, whereas he is One, and his name One—that he was their God only, a local deity, peculiar to that nation, whereas he is the Creator and Ruler of all the world—and that he was a God of the hills only, because David, their great prophet, had said, I will lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my help, (Ps. 121. 1.) and that his foundation was in the holy mountain; (Ps. 87. 1.—78. 54.) and much was said of his holy hill, (Ps. 15. 1.—24. 3.) supposing him altogether such a one as their imaginary deities: they fancied he was confined to his hills, and could not, or would not, come down from them, and therefore an army in the valley would be below his cognizance, and from under his protection: thus vain were the Gentiles in their imaginations concerning God, so wretchedly were their foolish hearts darkened, and professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. 2. They advise him to change his officers; (v. 24, 25.) not to employ the kings, who were commanders by birth, but captains rather, who were commanders by merit, who, being inured to war, would not affect to make a show like the kings, but would go through with business; let every man be employed in that which he is brought up to, and used to, and preferred to that which he is fit for. Syria, it seems, was rich and populous, when it could furnish recruits sufficient, after so great a defeat, horse for horse, chariot for chariot.

III. Both armies take the field: Ben-hadad, with his Syrians, encamps near Aphek, in the tribe of Asher, a city, it is likely, in his own possession, one of those which his father had won, (v. 34.) and the country about, flat and level, and fit for his purpose, v. 26. Ahab, with his forces, posted himself at some distance over against them, v. 27. The disproportion of numbers was very remarkable; (v. 27.) the children of Israel, who were cantoned in two battalions, looked like two little flocks of kids, their numbers small, their equipage mean, and the figure they made contemptible; but the Syrians filled the country with their numbers, their noise, their chariots, their carriages, and their baggage.

IV. Ahab is encouraged to fight the Syrians, notwithstanding their advantages and confidence. A man of God is sent to him, to tell him that his numerous army should all be delivered into his hand, (v. 28.) but not for his sake; be it known to him, he was utterly unworthy, for whom God should do this: God would not do it, because Ahab had praised God, or prayed to him, (we do not read that he did either,) but because the Syrians had blasphemed God, and had said, He is the God of the hills and not of the valleys; therefore God will do it in his own vindication, and to preserve the honour of his own name: if the Syrians had said, "Ahab and his people have forsaken their God, and so put themselves out of his protection, and therefore we may venture to attack them," God would probably have delivered Israel into their hands: but when they go upon a presumption so very injurious to the divine omnipotence, and the honour of him who is Lord of all hosts, not only in hills and valleys, but in heaven and earth, which they are willingly ignorant of, they shall be undeceived, at the expense of that vast army which is so much their pride and confidence.

V. After the armies had faced one another seven days, (the Syrians, it is likely, boasting, and the Israelites trembling,) they engaged, and the Syrians were totally routed; 100,000 men slain by the sword of Israel, in the field of battle, (v. 29.) and 27,000 men, that thought themselves safe under the walls of Aphek, a fortified city, (from the walls of which, the shooters might annoy the enemy if they pursued them, 2Sam. 11. 24.) found their bane where they hoped for protection, the wall fell upon them, probably, overthrown by an earthquake, and, the cities of Canaan being walled up to heaven, it reached a great way, and they were all either killed, or hurt, or overwhelmed with dismay. Ben-hadad, who thought his city Aphek should have held out against the conquerors, finding it thus unwall, and the remnant of his forces dispirited and dispersed, had nothing but secrecy to rely upon for safety, and therefore hid himself in a chamber within a chamber, lest the pursuers should seize him. See how the greatest confidence often ends in the greatest cowardice; "Now, is the God of Israel the God of the valleys, or no?" He shall know, now that he is forced into an inner chamber to hide himself. See ch. 22. 25.

31. And his servants said unto him, Behold now, we have heard that the kings of the house of Israel are merciful kings: let us, I pray thee, put sackcloth on our loins, and ropes upon our heads, and go out to the king of Israel; peradventure he will save thy life. 32. So they girded sackcloth on their loins, and put ropes on their heads, and came to the king of Israel, and said, Thy servant Ben-hadad saith, I pray thee, let me live. And he said, Is he yet alive? he is my brother. 33. Now the men did diligently observe whether any thing would come from him, and did hastily catch it: and they said, Thy brother Ben-hadad. Then he said, Go ye, bring him. Then Ben-hadad came forth to him; and he caused him to come up into the chariot. 34. And Ben-hadad said unto him, The cities which my father took from thy father I will restore; and thou shalt make streets for thee in Damascus, as my father made in Samaria. Then said Ahab, I will send thee away with this covenant. So he made a covenant with him, and sent him away. 35. And a certain man of the sons of the prophets said unto his neighbour in the word of the LORD, Smite me, I pray thee. And the man refused to smite him. 36. Then said he unto him, Because thou hast not obeyed the voice of the LORD, behold, as soon as thou art departed from me, a lion shall slay thee. And as soon as he was departed from him, a lion found him, and slew him. 37. Then he found another man, and said, Smite me, I pray thee. And the man smote him, so that in smiting he wounded him. 38. So the prophet departed, and waited for the king by the way, and disguised himself with ashes upon his face. 39. And as the king passed by, he cried unto the king: and he said, Thy servant went out into the midst of the battle; and, behold, a man turned aside, and brought a man unto me, and said, Keep this man: if by any means he be missing, then shall thy life be for his life, or else thou shalt pay a talent of silver. 40. And as thy servant was busy here and there, he was gone. And the king of Israel said unto him, So shall thy judgment be; thyself hast decided it. 41. And he hastened, and took the ashes away from his face; and the king of Israel discerned him that he was of the prophets. 42. And he said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man whom I appointed to utter destruction, therefore thy life shall go for his life, and thy people for his people. 43. And the king of Israel went to his house heavy and displeased, and came to Samaria.

Here is an account of what followed the victory which Israel obtained over the Syrians.

I. Ben-hadad's tame and mean submission; even in his inner chamber he fears, and would, if he could, flee farther, though none pursues; his servants, seeing him and themselves reduced to the last extremity, advise that they surrender at discretion, and make themselves prisoners and petitioners to Ahab for their lives, v. 31. The servants will put their lives in their hands, and venture first, and their master shall act according as they speed. Their inducement to take this course, is, the great reputation the kings of Israel had for clemency above any of their neighbours; "We have heard that they are merciful kings, not oppressive to their subjects that are under their power," (as governments then went, that of Israel was one of the most easy and gentle,) "and therefore not cruel to their enemies, when they lie at their mercy." Perhaps they had this notion of the kings of Israel, because they had heard that the God of Israel proclaimed his name gracious and merciful, and they concluded their kings would make their God their pattern; it was an honour to the kings of Israel to be thus represented, as indeed every Israelite is then dressed as becomes him, when he puts on bowels of mercies. "They are merciful kings, therefore we may hope to find mercy, upon our submission;" this encouragement poor sinners have to repent and humble themselves before God; "Have we not heard that the God of Israel is a merciful God? Have we not found him so? Let us therefore rend our hearts and return to him." Joel 2. 13. That is evangelical repentance, which flows from an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ; there is forgiveness with him.

Two things they undertake to represent to Ahab;

1. Their master a penitent; for they girded sackcloth on their loins, as mourners, and put roses on their heads, as condemned criminals going to execution, pretending to be sorry that they had invaded his country, and disturbed his repose, and to own that they deserved to be hanged for it; here they are ready to do penance for it, and throw themselves at the feet of him whom they had injured; many take upon them to repent of their wrong-doing, when it does not succeed, who, if they had prospered in it, would have justified it, and gloried in it.

2. Their master a beggar, a beggar for his life; Thy servant Ben-hadad saith, "I pray thee, let me live, v. 32. Though I live a perpetual exile from my own country, and captive in this, yet, upon any terms, let me live!" What a great change is here, (1.) In his condition; how is he fallen from the height of power and prosperity, to the depths of disgrace and distress, and all the miseries of poverty and slavery! See the uncertainty of human affairs; such turns are they subject to, that the spoke which was uppermost, may soon come to be undermost. (2.) In his temper; in the beginning of the chapter, hectoring, swearing, and threatening, and none more high in his demands; but here, humbling and bemoaning himself, and none more low in his requests: how poorly does he beg his life at the hand of him whom he had been trampling upon! The most haughty in prosperity are commonly most abject in adversity; an evil spirit will thus affect a man in these conditions; see how God glorifies himself, when he looks upon proud men, and abases them, and hides them in the dust together, Job, 40. 11-13.

II. Ahab's foolish acceptance of his submission, and the league he suddenly made with him, upon it; he was proud to be thus courted by him whom he had feared, inquires for him with great tenderness, Is he yet alive? He is my brother, brother king, though not brother Israelite; and Ahab valued himself more on his royalty, than on his religion, and others accordingly. "Is he thy brother, Ahab? Did he use thee like a brother, when he sent thee that barbarous message? v. 5, 6. Would he have called thee brother, if he had been the conqueror? Would he now have called himself thy servant, if he had not been reduced to the utmost strait? Canst thou suffer thyself to be thus imposed upon by a forced and counterfeit submission?" This word brother they catch at, (v. 33.) and were encouraged by that to go and fetch him to the king; he that calls him brother, will let him live; let poor penitents hear God, in his word, calling them children, (Jer. 31. 20.) catch at it, echo to it, and call him Father. Ben-hadad, upon his submission, shall not only be honourably conveyed, (he took him up into the chariot,) but treated with as an ally; (v. 34.) he made a covenant with him, not consulting either God's prophets, or the elders of the land, or himself, concerning what was fit to be insisted on, but, as if Ben-hadad had been conqueror, he shall make his own terms: he might now have demanded some of Ben-hadad's cities, when all of them lay at the mercy of his victorious army, but is content with the restitution of his own; he might now have demanded the stores, and treasures, and magazines, of Damascus, to augment the wealth and strength of his own kingdom, but is content with a poor liberty, at his own expense, to build streets there, a point of honour, and no advantage, or no more than what the kings of Syria had had in Samaria, though they never had had so much power as he had now, to support the demand of it. With this covenant he sent him away, without so much as reproving him for his blasphemous reflections upon the God of Israel, whose honour Ahab had no concern for. Note, There are those on whom success is ill bestowed; they know not how to serve either God or their generation, or even their own true interests, with their prosperity: Let favour be shewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness.

III. The reproof given to Ahab for his clemency to Ben-hadad, and his covenant with him; it was given him by a prophet, in the name of the Lord; the Jews say it was Micaiah, and not unlikely, for Ahab complains of him, (ch. 22. 8.) that he used to prophesy evil concerning him; this prophet designed to reprove Ahab by a parable, that he might oblige him to condemn himself, as Nathan and the woman of Tekoa did David; to make his parable the more plausible, he finds it necessary to put himself into the posture of a wounded soldier.

1. With some difficulty, he gets himself wounded, for he would not do it with his own hands; he commanded one of his brother prophets, his neighbour, or companion, (for so the word signifies,) to smite him, and this, in God's name, (v. 35.) but finds him not so willing to give the blow as he is to receive it; he refused to smite him, others were forward enough to smite prophets, they need not smite one another; we cannot but think it was from a good principle he declined it; "If it must be done, let another do it, not I; I cannot find in my heart to strike my friend." Good men can much more easily receive a wrongful blow than give one; yet because he disobeyed an express command of God, (which was so much the worse if he were himself a prophet,) like that other disobedient prophet, ch. 13. 24. he was presently slain by a lion, v. 36. This was intended, not only to show, in general, how provoking disobedience is, (Col. 3. 6.) but to intimate to Ahab, who, no doubt, was told the story, that if a good prophet were thus punished for sparing his friend and God's, when God said, Smite, of much sorer punishment should a wicked king be thought worthy, who spared his enemy and God's, when God said, Smite. Shall mortal man pretend to be more just than God, more pure or more compassionate than his Maker? We must be merciful as he is merciful, and not otherwise. The next he met with, made no difficulty of smiting him, (Valenti non fit injuria—He that asks for an injury is not wronged by it,) and did it so that he wounded him; (v. 37.) he fetched blood with the blow; it is likely, in his face.

2. Wounded as he was, and disguised with ashes, that he might not be known to be a prophet, he made his application to the king in a story, whereby he charged himself with such a crime as the king was now guilty of in sparing Ben-hadad, and waits for the king's judgment upon it; the case, in short, is this:—A prisoner taken in the battle was committed to his custody, by a man, (we may suppose one that had authority over him as his superior officer,) with this charge, If he be missing, thy life shall be for his life, v. 39. The prisoner has made his escape through his carelessness. Can the chancery in the king's breast relieve him against his captain, who demands his life in lieu of the prisoner's? "By no means," says the king, "thou shouldst either not have undertaken the trust, or been more careful and faithful to it, there is no remedy, (Curat lex—Let the law take its course,) thou hast forfeited thy bond, and execution must go out upon it; so shall thy doom be, thyself hast decided it." Now the prophet has what he would have, puts off his disguise, and is known by Ahab himself to be a prophet, (v. 41.) and plainly tells him, "Thou art the man. Is it my doom? No, it is thine; thyself hast decided it; out of thine own mouth art thou judged; God, thy Superior and Commander in chief, delivered into thy hands one plainly marked for destruction, both by his own pride, and God's providence, and thou hast not carelessly lost him, but wittingly and willingly dismissed him, and so hast been false to thy trust; and lost the end of thy victory; expect therefore no other than that thy life shall go for his life, which thou hast spared," (and so it did, ch. 22. 35.) "and thy people for his people, whom likewise thou hast spared;" and so they did afterward, 2 Kings. 10. 32, 33. When their other sins brought them low, this came into the account. There is a time, when keeping back the sword from blood, is doing the work of the Lord deceitfully, Jer. 48. 10. Foolish pity spoils the city.

3. We are told how Ahab took this reproof; he went to his house heavy and displeased; (v. 43.) not truly penitent, or seeking to undo what he had done amiss, but enraged at the prophet, exasperated against God, (as if he had been too severe in the sentence passed upon him,) and yet vexed at himself, every way out of humour, notwithstanding his victory; he who, by his providence, had mortified the pride of one king, by his word, cast a damp upon the triumphs of another: Be wise therefore, O ye kings, and be instructed to serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling, Ps. 2. 10, 11.

CHAP. XXI.

Ahab is still the unhappy subject of the sacred history; from the great affairs of his camp and kingdom this chapter leads us into his garden, and gives us an account of some ill things, (and ill indeed they proved to him,) relating to his domestic affairs. I. Ahab is sick for Naboth's vineyard, v. 1. 4. II. Naboth dies by Jezebel's plot, that the vineyard may escheat to Ahab, v. 5. 14. III. Ahab goes to take possession, v. 15, 16. IV. Elijah meets him, and denounces the judgments of God against him for his injustice, v. 17. 24. V. Upon his humiliation a reprieve is granted, v. 25. 29.

1. AND it came to pass after these things, that Naboth the Jezreelite had a vineyard, which was in Jezreel, hard by the palace of Ahab king of Samaria. 2. And Ahab spake unto Naboth, saying, Give me thy vineyard, that I may have it for a garden of herbs, because it is near unto my house; and I will give thee for it a better vineyard than it: or, if it seem good to thee, I will give thee the worth of it in money. 3.

And Naboth said to Ahab, The LORD for bid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee. 4. And Ahab came into his house heavy and displeased, because of the word which Naboth the Jezreelite had spoken to him; for he had said, I will not give thee the inheritance of my fathers. And he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread.

Here is,

I. Ahab's coveting his neighbour's vineyard, which, unhappily, lay near his palace, and was convenient for a kitchen-garden: perhaps, Naboth had been pleased that he had a vineyard which lay so advantageously for a prospect of the royal gardens, or the vending of its productions to the royal family—but the situation of it proved fatal to him; if he had had no vineyard, or it had lain obscure in some remote place, he had preserved his life; but many a man's possessions have been his snare, and his neighbourhood to greatness, of pernicious consequence. Ahab sets his eye and heart on this vineyard; (v. 2.) it will be a pretty addition to his demesne, a convenient outlet to his palace, and nothing will serve him but it must be his own. He is welcome to the fruits of it, welcome to walk in it; Naboth perhaps would have made him a lease of it, for his life, to please him, but nothing will please him, unless he have an absolute property in it, he and his heirs for ever: yet he is not such a tyrant as to take it by force, but fairly proposes, either to give him the full value of it in money, or a better vineyard in exchange; he had tamely quitted the great advantages God had given him, of enlarging his dominion, for the honour of his kingdom, by his victory over the Syrians, and now is eager to enlarge his garden, only for the convenience of his house, as if to be penny-wise, would atone for being pound-foolish. To desire a convenience to his estate, was not evil; (there would be no buying, if there was no desire of what is bought; the virtuous woman considers a field and buys it;) but to desire any thing inordinately, though we would compass it by lawful means, is a fruit of selfishness, as if we must engross all the conveniences, and none must live, or live comfortably by us; contrary to the law of contentment, and the letter of the tenth commandment, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house.

II. The repulse he met with in this desire; Naboth would by no means part with it, (v. 3.) The Lord forbid it me; and the Lord did forbid it, else he would not have been so rude and uncivil to his prince, as not to gratify him in so small a matter. Canaan was, in a peculiar manner, God's land; the Israelites were his tenants; and this was one of the conditions of their leases, that they should not alienate, (no not to one another,) any part of that which fell to their lot, unless in case of extreme necessity, and then only till the year of Jubilee, Lev. 25. 28. Now Naboth foresaw that if his vineyard were sold to the crown, it would never return to his heirs, no not in the jubilee; he would gladly oblige the king, but he must obey God rather than men, and therefore in this matter he desires to be excused. Ahab knew the law, or should have known it, and therefore did ill to ask that which his subject could not grant without sin. Some conceive that Naboth looked upon his earthly inheritance as an earnest of his lot in the heavenly Canaan, and therefore would not part with the former, lest it should amount to a forfeiture of the latter: he seems to have been a conscientious man, who would rather hazard the king's displeasure than offend God; and, probably, was one of the 7000 that had not bowed the knee to Baal, for which, it may be, Ahab owed him a grudge.

III. Ahab's great discontent and uneasiness, hereupon; he was, as before, (ch. 20. 43.) heavy and displeased; (v. 4.) grew melancholy upon it, threw himself upon his bed, would not eat, nor admit company to come to him; he could by no means digest the affront; his proud spirit aggravated the indignity Naboth did him in denying him, as a thing not to be suffered; he cursed the squeamishness of his conscience, which he pretended to consult the peace of, and secretly meditated revenge; nor could he bear the disappointment, it cut him to the heart to be crossed in his desires, and he was perfectly sick for vexation. Note, 1. Discontent is a sin that is its own punishment, and makes men torment themselves; it makes the spirit sad, the body sick, and all the enjoyments sour; it is the heaviness of the heart, and the rottenness of the bones. 2. It is a sin that is its own parent; it arises not from the condition, but from the mind; as we find Paul contented in a prison, so Ahab discontented in a palace; he had all the delights of Canaan, that pleasant land, at command, the wealth of a kingdom, the pleasures of a court, and the honours and powers of a throne; and yet all this avails him nothing without Naboth's vineyard. Inordinate desires expose men to continual vexations, and they that are disposed to fret, be they ever so happy, will always find something or other to fret at.

5. But Jezebel his wife came to him, and said unto him, Why is thy spirit so sad, that thou eatest no bread? 6. And he said unto her, Because I spake unto Naboth the Jezreelite, and said unto him, Give me thy vineyard for money; or else, if it please thee, I will give thee another vineyard for it: and he answered, I will not give thee my vineyard. 7. And Jezebel his wife said unto him, Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel? Arise, and eat bread, and let thine heart be merry: I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite. 8. So she wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal, and sent the letters unto the elders and to the nobles that were in his city, dwelling with Naboth. 9. And she wrote in the letters, saying, Proclaim a fast, and set Naboth on high among the people; 10. And set two men, sons of Belial, before him, to bear witness against him, saying, Thou didst blaspheme God and the king: and then carry him out, and stone him, that he may die. 11. And the men of his city, even the elders and the nobles, who were the inhabitants in his city, did as Jezebel had sent unto them, and as it was written in the letters which she had sent unto them: 12. They proclaimed a fast, and set Naboth on high among the people. 13. And there came in two men, children of Belial, and sat before him: and the men of Belial witnessed against him, even against Naboth, in the presence of the people, saying, Naboth did blaspheme God and the king. Then they carried him forth out of the city, and stoned him with stones, that he died. 14. Then they sent to Jezebel, saying, Naboth is stoned, and is dead. 15. And it came to pass, when Jezebel heard that Naboth was stoned, and was dead, that Jezebel said to Ahab, Arise, take possession of the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which he refused to give thee for money: for Naboth is not alive, but dead. 16. And it came to pass, when Ahab heard that Naboth was dead, that Ahab rose up to go down to the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, to take possession of it.

Nothing but mischief is to be expected when Jezebel enters into the story—that cursed woman, 2 Kings 9. 34.

I. Under pretence of comforting her afflicted husband, she feeds his pride and passion, and blows the coals of his corruptions. It became her to take notice of his grief, and to inquire into the cause of it, v. 5. Those have forgotten both the duty and affection of the conjugal relation, that interest not themselves in each other's troubles. He tells her what troubled him, (v. 6.) yet invidiously conceals Naboth's reason for his refusal, representing it as peevish, when it was conscientious; I will not give it thee, whereas he said, I may not. What! (says Jezebel, v. 7.) Dost thou govern Israel? Arise, and eat bread. She does well to persuade him to shake off his melancholy, and not to sink under his burthen, to be easy and cheerful; whatever was his grief, grieving would not redress it, but pleasantness would alleviate it; her plea is, Dost thou now govern Israel? This is capable of a good sense, "Does it become so great a prince as thou art, to cast thyself down for so small a matter? Thou shamest thyself, and profanest thy crown; it is below thee to take notice of so inconsiderable a thing. Art thou fit to govern Israel, who hast no better a government of thine own passions? Or hast thou so rich a kingdom at command, and canst not thou be without this one vineyard?" We should learn to quiet ourselves, under our crosses, with the thoughts of the mercies we enjoy, especially our hopes of the kingdom. But she meant it in a bad sense, "Dost thou govern Israel, and shall any subject thou hast, deny thee any thing thou hast a mind to? Art thou a king? It is below thee to buy and pay, much more to beg and pray; use thy prerogative, and take by force what thou canst not compass by fair means: instead of resenting the affront thus, revenge it. If thou knowest not how to support the dignity of a king, let me alone to do it; give me but leave to make use of thy name, and I will soon give thee the vineyard of Naboth; right or wrong, it shall be thy own shortly, and cost thee nothing." Unhappy princes those are, and hurried apace toward their ruin, who have those about them, that stir them up to acts of tyranny, and teach them how to abuse their power.

II. In order to the gratifying of him, she projects and compasses the death of Naboth; no less than his blood will serve to atone for the affront he had given to Ahab, which she thirsts after the more greedily, because of his adherence to the law of the God of Israel. Had she aimed only at his land, her false witnesses might have sworn him out of that by a forged deed; (she could not have set up so weak a title, but the elders of Jezreel would have adjudged it good;) but the adulteress will hunt for the precious life, Prov. 6. 26. Revenge is sweet; Naboth must die, and die as a malefactor, to gratify it.

1. Never were more wicked orders given by any prince, than these which Jezebel sent to the magistrates of Jezreel, v. 8-10. She borrows the privy-seal, but the king shall not know what she will do with it: it is probable this was not the first time he had lent it her, but that with it she had signed warrants for the slaying of the prophets. She makes use of the king's name, knowing the thing would please him when it was done, yet fearing he might scruple the manner of doing it; in short, she commands them, upon their allegiance, to put Naboth to death, without giving them any reason. Had she sent witnesses to inform against him, the judges (who must go secundum allegata et probata—according to allegations and proofs) might have been imposed upon, and their sentence had been rather their unhappiness than their crime; but to oblige them to find the witnesses, sons of Belial, to suborn them themselves, and then to give judgment upon a testimony which they knew to be false, was such an impudent defiance to every thing that is just and sacred, as we hope cannot be paralleled in any story; she must look upon the elders of Jezreel as men perfectly lost to every thing that is honest and honourable, when she expected these orders should be obeyed; but she will put them in a way how to do it, having as much of the serpent's subtilty as she had of his poison.

(1.) It must be done under colour of religion.—“Proclaim a fast, signify to your city that you are apprehensive of some dreadful judgment coming upon you, which you must endeavour to avert, not only by prayer, but by finding out and putting away the accursed thing; take on you to be afraid that there is some great offender among you undiscovered, for whose sake God is angry with your city; charge the people, if they know of any such, on that solemn occasion to inform against him, as they tender the welfare of the city, and at last let Naboth be fastened upon as the suspected person, probably, because he does not join with his neighbours in their worship; that may serve for a pretence to set him on high among the people, to call him to the bar; let proclamation be made, if any one can inform the court against the prisoner, and prove him to be the Achan, they shall be heard; and then let the witnesses appear to give evidence against him.” Note, There is no wickedness so vile, so horrid, but religion has sometimes been made a cloak and cover for it. We must not at all think the worse of fasting and praying for their having been sometimes thus abused, but much the worse of those wicked designs that have at any time been carried on under the umbrage of them.

(2.) It must be done under colour of justice too, and with the formalities of a legal process. Had she sent to them to hire some of their banditti, some desperate ruffians to assassinate him, to stab him as he went along the streets in the night, it had been bad enough; but to do it by a course of law, to use that power for the murdering of the innocent, which ought to be their protection, was such a violent perverting of justice and judgment as yet we are bid not to marvel at, Eccl. 5. 8. The crime they must lay to his charge, was blaspheming God and the king; a complicated blasphemy. Sure she could not think to put a blasphemous sense upon the answer he had given to Ahab, as if denying him his vineyard were blaspheming the king, and giving the divine law for the reason, were blaspheming God. No, she pretends not any ground at all for the charge; though there was no colour of truth in it, though witnesses must swear it, and Naboth must not be permitted to speak for himself, or cross-examine the witnesses, but immediately, under pretence of a universal detestation of the crime, they must carry him out and stone him. His blaspheming God would be the forfeiture of his life, but not of his estate, and therefore he is also charged with treason, in blaspheming the king, for which his estate was to be confiscated, that so Ahab might have his vineyard.

2. Never were wicked orders more wickedly obeyed, than these were by the magistrates of Jezreel. They do not so much as dispute the command, or make any objections against it, though so palpably unjust; but punctually observed all the particulars of it, either because they feared Jezebel's cruelty, or because they hated Naboth's piety, or both. They did as it was written in the letters; (v. 11, 12.) neither made any difficulty of it, nor met with any difficulty in it, but cleverly carried on the villany; they stoned Naboth to death, (v. 13.) and, as it should seem, his sons with him, or after him: for when God came to make inquiry for blood, we find that article in the account, (2 Kings 9. 26.) I have seen the blood of Naboth and the blood of his sons. Perhaps they were secretly murdered, that they might not claim their father's estate, or complain of the wrong done him. Let us take occasion from this sad story, (1.) To stand amazed at the wickedness of the wicked, and the power of Satan in the children of disobedience. What a holy indignation may we be filled with, to see wickedness in the place of judgment, Eccl. 3. 16. (2.) To lament the hard case of oppressed innocence, and to mingle our tears with the tears of the oppressed that have no comforter, while on the side of the oppressors there is power, Eccl. 4. 1. (3.) To commit the keeping of our lives and comforts to God, for innocence itself will not always be our security. (4.) To rejoice in the belief of a judgment to come, in which such wrong judgments as these will be called over. Now we see that there be just men to whom it happens according to the work of the wicked, (Eccl. 8. 14.) but all will be set to rights in the great day.

III. Naboth being taken off, Ahab takes possession of his vineyard. 1. The elders of Jezreel sent notice to Jezebel very unconcernedly, sent it her as a piece of agreeable news, Naboth is stoned, and is dead, v. 14. Here let us observe, that as obsequious as the elders of Jezreel were to Jezebel's orders, which she sent from Samaria for the murder of Naboth, so obsequious were the elders of Samaria afterwards to Jehu's orders, which he sent from Jezreel for the murder of Ahab's seventy sons, only that was not done by course of law, 2 Kings 10. 6, 7. Those tyrants, that by their wicked orders debauch the consciences of their inferior magistrates, may, perhaps, find at last the wheel return upon them; and that those who will not stick to do one cruel thing for them, will be as ready to do another cruel thing against them. 2. Jezebel, jocund enough that her plot succeeded so well, brings notice to Ahab, that Naboth is not alive, but dead, therefore Arise, take possession of his vineyard, v. 15. He might have taken possession by one of his officers, but so pleased is he with this accession to his estate, that he will make a journey to Jezreel himself to enter upon it; and it should seem he went in state too, as if he had got some mighty victory, for Jehu remembers long after, that he and Bidkar attended him at this time, 2 Kings 9. 25. If Naboth's sons were all put to death, Ahab thought himself entitled to the estate, ob defectum sanguinis (as our law expresses it.) If not, yet Naboth dying as a criminal, he claimed it ob delictum criminis. Or if neither would make him a good title, the absolute power of Jezebel will give it him, and who dares oppose it? Might often prevails against right, and wonderful is the divine patience that suffers it to do so. God is certainly of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and yet for a time keeps silence when the wicked devours the man that is more righteous than he, Hab. 1. 13.

17. And the word of the LORD came to Elijah the Tishbite, saying, 18. Arise, go down to meet Ahab king of Israel, which is in Samaria: behold, he is in the vineyard of Naboth, whither he is gone down to possess it. 19. And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine. 20. And Ahab said to Elijah, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? And he answered, I have found thee; because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the LORD. 21. Behold, I will bring evil upon thee, and will take away thy posterity, and will cut off from Ahab him that pisseth against the wall, and him that is shut up and left in Israel. 22. And will make thine house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and like the house of Baasha the son of Ahijah, for the provocation wherewith thou hast provoked me to anger, and made Israel to sin. 23. And of Jezebel also spake the LORD, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel. 24. Him that dieth of Ahab in the city the dogs shall eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat. 25. But there was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the LORD, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up. 26. And he did very abominably in following idols, according to all things as did the Amorites, whom the LORD cast out before the children of Israel. 27. And it came to pass, when Ahab heard those words, that he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly. 28. And the word of the LORD came to Elijah the Tishbite, saying, 29. Seest thou how Ahab humbleth himself before me? Because he humbleth himself before me, I will not bring the evil in his days; but in his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house.

In these verses, we may observe,

I. The very bad character that is given of Ahab, (v. 25, 26.) which comes in here, to justify God in the heavy sentence passed upon him, and to show that though it was passed upon occasion of his sin, in the matter of Naboth, (which David's sin, in the matter of Uriah, did too much resemble,) yet God would not have punished him so severely, if he had not been guilty of many other sins, especially idolatry; whereas David, except in that one matter, did that which was right. But for Ahab there was none like him; so ingenious and industrious in sin, and that made a trade of it. He sold himself to work wickedness; that is, he made himself a perfect slave to his lusts, and was as much at their beck and command, as ever any servant was at his master's. He was wholly given up to sin, and, upon condition he might have the pleasures of it, he would take the wages of it, which is death, Rom. 6. 23. Blessed Paul complains that he was sold under sin, (Rom. 7. 14.) as a poor captive against his will; but Ahab was voluntary, he sold himself to sin; of choice, and as his own act and deed, he submitted to the dominion of sin. Yet this did not excuse him. Jezebel his wife stirred him up to do wickedly, and made him, in many respects, worse than otherwise he would have been: to what a pitch of impiety did he arrive, who had such tinder of corruption in his heart, and such a tempter in his bosom to strike fire into it. In many things, he did ill, but he did most abominably, in following idols, like the Canaanites; his immoralities were very provoking to God, but his idolatries were especially so. Israel's case was sad, when a prince of such a character as this reigned over them.

II. The message which Elijah was sent with to him, when he went to take possession of Naboth's vineyard, v. 17-19. Hitherto, God kept silence, did not intercept Jezebel's letters, nor stay the process of the elders of Jezreel; but now, Ahab is reprov'd, and his sin set in order before his eyes. 1. The person sent, is, Elijah. A prophet of lower rank was sent with messages of kindness to him, ch. 20. 13. But the father of the prophets is sent to try him, and condemn him, for his murder. 2. The place is Naboth's vineyard; the time, just when he was taking possession of it; then, and there, must his doom be read him. By taking possession, he avowed all that was done, and made himself guilty, ex post facto—as an accessory after the fact. There he was taken in the commission of the errors, and therefore the conviction would come upon him with so much the more force. "What hast thou to do in this vineyard? What good canst thou expect from it, when it is purchased with blood, (Hab. 2. 12.) and thou hast caused the owner thereof to lose his life?" Job 31. 39. Now that he was pleasing himself with his ill-gotten wealth, and giving direction for the turning of this vineyard into a flower-garden, his meat in his bowels is turned. He shall not feel quietness. When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, Job 20. 14, 20, 23. Let us see what passed between them.

(1.) Ahab vents his wrath against Elijah, falls into a passion at the sight of him, and, instead of humbling himself before the prophet, as he ought to have done, (2 Chron. 36. 12.) is ready to fly in his face, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? v. 20. This shows, [1.] That he hated him; the last time we found them together, they parted very good friends; (ch. 18. 46.) then Ahab had countenanced the reformation, and therefore then all was well between him and the prophet; but now he was relapsed, and worse than ever; his conscience told him he had made God his Enemy, and therefore he could not expect Elijah should be his friend. Note, That man's condition is very miserable, that has made the word of God his enemy, and very desperate, that reckons the ministers of that word his enemies, because they tell him the truth, Gal. 4. 16. Ahab, having sold himself to sin, was resolved to stand to his bargain, and could not endure him that would have helped to recover himself. [2.] That he feared him. Hast thou found me? Intimating that he shunned him all he could, and it was now a terror to him to see him. The sight of him was like that of the hand-writing upon the wall, to

(1.) Ahab vents his wrath against Elijah, falls into a passion at the sight of him, and, instead of humbling himself before the prophet, as he ought to have done, (2 Chron 36. 12.) is ready to fly in his face, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? v. 20. This shows, [1.] That he hated him; the last time we found them together, they parted very good friends; (ch. 18. 46.) then Ahab had countenanced the reformation, and therefore then all was well between him and the prophet; but now he was relapsed, and worse than ever; his conscience told him he had made God his Enemy, and therefore he could not expect Elijah should be his friend. Note, That man's condition is very miserable, that has made the word of God his enemy, and very desperate, that reckons the ministers of that word his enemies, because they tell him the truth, Gal. 4. 16. Ahab, having sold himself to sin, was resolved to stand to his bargain, and could not endure him that would have helped to recover himself. [2.] That he feared him. Hast thou found me? Intimating that he shunned him all he could, and it was now a terror to him to see him. The sight of him was like that of the hand-writing upon the wall, to Belshazzar, it made his countenance change, the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another. Never was poor debtor or criminal so confounded at the sight of the officer that came to arrest him. Men may thank themselves, if they make God and his word a terror to them.

(2.) Elijah denounces God's wrath against Ahab; I have found thee, (says he, v. 20.) because thou hast sold thyself to work evil. Note, Those that give up themselves to sin, will certainly be found out, sooner or later, to their unspeakable horror and amazement. Ahab is now set to the bar, as Naboth was, and trembles more than he did.

[1.] Elijah finds the indictment against him, and convicts him, upon the notorious evidence of the fact; (v. 19.) Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? He is here charged with the murder of Naboth; and it would not serve him to say the law killed him; (perverted justice is the highest injustice;) or, that if he were unjustly prosecuted, it was not his doing, he knew nothing of it: for it was to please him, that it was done, and he had showed himself pleased with it, and so had made himself guilty of all that was done in the unjust prosecution of Naboth. He killed, for he took possession. If he takes the garden, he takes the guilt with it. Terra transit cum onere—The land with the incumbrance.

[2.] He passes judgment upon him. That his family should be ruined and rooted out, (v. 21.) and all his posterity cut off. That his house should be made like the houses of his wicked predecessors, Jeroboam and Baasha; (v. 22.) particularly, that they who died in the city, should be meat for dogs, and they who died in the field, meat for birds, (v. 24.) which had been foretold of Jeroboam's house, (ch. 14. 11.) and of Baasha's ch. 16. 4. That Jezebel, particularly, should be devoured by dogs, (v. 23.) which was fulfilled; (2 Kings 9. 36.) and as for Ahab himself, that the dogs should lick his blood in the very same place where they licked Naboth's; (v. 19.) "Thy blood, even thine, though it be royal blood, though it swell thy veins with pride, and boil in thy heart with anger, ere long it shall be an entertainment for the dogs;" which was fulfilled, ch. 22. 38. This intimates that he should die a violent death, should come to his grave with blood, and that disgrace should attend him, the foresight of which must needs be a great mortification to a proud man. Punishments after death are here most insisted on, which, though such as affect the body only, perhaps, were designed as figures of the soul's misery after death.

III. Ahab's humiliation under the sentence passed upon him, and the favourable message sent him, thereupon.

1. Ahab was a kind of penitent. The message Elijah delivered him in God's name, put him into a fright for the present, so that he rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth, v. 27. He was still a proud hardened sinner, and yet thus reduced. Note, God can make the stoutest heart to tremble, and the proudest to humble itself. His word is quick and powerful, and is, when he pleases to make it so, like a fire, and a hammer, Jer. 32. 29. It made Felix tremble. Ahab put on the garb and guise of a penitent, and yet his heart was unhumiliated and unchanged. After this, we find, he hated a faithful prophet, ch. 22. 8. Note, It is no new thing to find the show and profession of repentance, where yet the truth and substance of it are wanting. Ahab's repentance was only what might be seen of men: Seest thou (says God to Elijah) how Ahab humbles himself? It was external only; and the garments rent, but not the heart. An hypocrite may go very far in the outward performances of holy duties, and yet come short.

2. He obtained, hereby, a reprieve, which I may call a kind of pardon. Though it was but an outside repentance, (lamenting the judgment only, and not the sin,) though he did not leave his idols, nor restore the vineyard to Naboth's heirs, yet because he did hereby give some glory to God, God took notice of it, and bade Elijah take notice of it; Seest thou how Ahab humbles himself? v. 29. In consideration of this, the threatened ruin of his house, which had not been fixed to any time, should be adjourned to his son's days. The sentence should not be revoked, but the execution suspended. Now, (1.) This discovers the great goodness of God, and his readiness to show mercy, which here rejoices against judgment. Favour is showed to this wicked man, that God might magnify his goodness, (says Bishop Sanderson,) even to the hazard of his other divine perfections; as if, (says he,) God would be thought unholy, or untrue, or unjust, (though he be none of these,) or any thing, rather than unmerciful. (2.) This teaches us to take notice of that which is good, even in those who are not so good as they should be: let it be commended as far as it goes. (3.) This gives a reason why wicked people sometimes prosper long: God is rewarding their external services with external mercies. (4.) This encourages all those that truly repent, and unfeignedly believe the holy gospel. If a pretending partial penitent shall go to his house, reprieved, doubtless, a sincere penitent shall go to his house, justified.

CHAP. XXII.

This chapter finishes the history of Ahab's reign. It was promised, in the close of the foregoing chapter, that the ruin of his house should not come in his days, but his days were soon at an end. His war with the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead, is that which we have an account of in this chapter. 1. His preparations for that war. He consulted, 1. His privy-council, v. 1. . 3. 2. Jehoshaphat, v. 4. 3. His prophets. (1.) His own, who encouraged him to go on this expedition, (v. 5, 6.) Zedekiah particularly, v. 11, 12. (2.) A prophet of the Lord, Micaiah, who was desired to come by Jehoshaphat, (v. 7, 8.) sent for, (v. 9, 10, 13, 14.) upbraided Ahab with his confidence in the false prophets, (v. 15.) but foretold his fall in this expedition, (16. . 18.) and gave him an account how he came to be thus imposed upon by his prophets, v. 19. . 23. He is abused by Zedekiah, (v. 24, 25.) and imprisoned by Ahab, v. 26. . 28. II. The battle itself; in which 1. Jehoshaphat is exposed. But, 2. Ahab is slain, v. 29. . 40. In the close of the chapter, we have a short account, (1.) Of the good reign of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, v. 41. . 50. (2.) Of the wicked reign of Ahaziah king of Israel, v. 51. . 53.

1. AND they continued three years without war between Syria and Israel. 2. And it came to pass, in the third year, that Jehoshaphat the king of Judah came down to the king of Israel. 3. And the king of Israel said unto his servants, Know ye that Ramoth in Gilead is ours, and we be still, and take it not out of the hand of the king of Syria? 4. And he said unto Jehoshaphat, Wilt thou go with me to battle to Ramoth-gilead? And Jehoshaphat said to the king of Israel, I am as thou art, my people as thy people, my horses as thy horses. 5. And Jehoshaphat said unto the king of Israel, Inquire, I pray thee, at the word of the LORD to-day. 6. Then the king of Israel gathered the prophets together, about four hundred men, and said unto them, Shall I go against Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And they said, Go up; for the LORD shall deliver it into the hand of the king. 7. And Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the LORD besides, that we might inquire of him? 8. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, There is yet one man, Micaiah the son of Imlah, by whom we may inquire of the LORD: but I hate him; for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil. And Jehoshaphat said, Let not the king say so. 9. Then the king of Israel called an officer, and said, Hasten hither Micaiah the son of Imlah. 10. And the king of Israel and Jehoshaphat the king of Judah sat each on his throne, having put on their robes, in a void place in the entrance of the gate of Samaria: and all the prophets prophesied before them. 11. And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah made him horns of iron: and he said, Thus saith the LORD, With these shalt thou push the Syrians, until thou have consumed them. 12. And all the prophets prophesied so, saying, Go up to Ramoth-gilead, and prosper: for the LORD shall deliver it into the king's hand. 13. And the messenger that was gone to call Micaiah spake unto him, saying, Behold now, the words of the prophets declare good unto the king with one mouth: let thy word, I pray thee, be like the word of one of them, and speak that which is good. 14. And Micaiah said, As the LORD liveth, what the LORD saith unto me, that will I speak.

Though Ahab continued under guilt and wrath, and the dominion of the lusts to which he had sold himself, yet, as a reward for his professions of repentance and humiliation, though the time drew near when he should descend into battle and perish, yet we have him blessed with a three years' peace, (v. 1.) and an honourable visit made him by Jehoshaphat king of Judah, v. 2. The Jews have a fabulous conceit, that when Ahab humbled himself for his sin, and lay in sackcloth, he sent for Jehoshaphat to come to him, to chastise him; and that he staid with him for some time, and gave him so many stripes every day. That is a groundless tradition. He came now, it is probable, to consult with him about the affairs of their kingdoms. It is strange that so great a man as Jehoshaphat, would pay so much respect to a kingdom revolted from the house of David; and that so good a man would show so much kindness to a king revolted from the worship of God. But though he was a godly man, his temper was too easy, which betrayed him into snares and inconveniences.

The Syrians durst not give Ahab any disturbance. But,

I. Ahab here meditates a war against the Syrians, and advises concerning it with those about him, v. 3. The king of Syria gave him the provocation; when he lay at his mercy, he promised to restore him his cities, (ch. 20. 34.) and Ahab foolishly took his word, when he ought not to have dismissed him, till the cities had been put into his possession. But now, he knows by experience, wh.

he ought to have considered, that as the kisses, so the promises, of an enemy are deceitful; and there is no confidence to be put in leagues extorted by distress. Ben-hadad is one of those princes that think themselves bound by their word no further and no longer, than it is for their interest. Whether any other cities were restored, we do not find, but Ramoth-gilead was not: a considerable city in the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan, a Levites' city, and one of the cities of refuge. Ahab blames himself, and his people, that they did not bestir themselves to recover it out of the hands of the Syrians, and to chastise Ben-hadad's violation of his league; and resolves to let that ungrateful perfidious prince know that as he had given him peace, he could give him trouble. Ahab has a good cause, yet succeeds not. Equity is not to be judged of by prosperity.

II. He engages Jehoshaphat, and draws him in, to join with him in this expedition, for the recovery of Ramoth-gilead, v. 4. And here, I do not wonder that Ahab should desire the assistance of so pious and prosperous a neighbour. Even bad men have often coveted the friendship of the good. It is desirable to have an interest in those that have an interest in heaven; and to have those with us, that have God with them. But it is strange that Jehoshaphat will go so entirely into Ahab's interests, as to say, I am as thou art, and my people as thy people. I hope not; Jehoshaphat, and his people, are not so wicked and corrupt as Ahab and his people. Too great a complaisance to evil-doers, has brought many good people, through unwariness, into a dangerous fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. Jehoshaphat had like to have paid dear for his compliment, when, in the battle, he was taken for Ahab. Yet some observe, that in joining with Israel against Syria, he atoned for his father's fault, in joining with Syria against Israel, ch. 15. 19, 20.

III. At the special instance and request of Jehoshaphat, he asks counsel of the prophets concerning this expedition. Ahab thought it enough to consult with his statesmen, but Jehoshaphat moves that they should inquire of the word of the Lord, v. 5. Note, 1. Whithersoever a good man goes, he desires to take God along with him, and will acknowledge him in all his ways, ask leave of him, and look up to him for success. Whithersoever a good man goes, he ought to take his religion along with him, and not be ashamed to own it, no not when he is with those who have no kindness for it. Jehoshaphat has not left behind him, at Jerusalem, his affection and veneration for the word of the Lord, but both avows it, and endeavours to introduce it into Ahab's court. If Ahab drew him into his wars, he will draw Ahab into his devotions.

IV. Ahab's 400 prophets, the standing regiment he had of them, (prophets of the groves they called them,) agreed to encourage him in this expedition, and to assure him of success, v. 6. He put the question to them with a seeming fairness, Shall I go, or shall I forbear? But they knew which way his inclination was, and designed only to humour the two kings. To please Jehoshaphat, they made use of the name Jehovah. He shall deliver it into the hand of the king; they stole the word from the true prophets, (Jer. 23. 30.) and spake their language. To please Ahab, they said, Go up. They had, indeed, probabilities on their side; Ahab had, not long since, beaten the Syrians twice; he had now a good cause, and was much strengthened by his alliance with Jehoshaphat; but they pretended to speak by prophecy, not by rational conjecture; by divine, not human, foresight: "Thou shalt certainly recover Ramoth-gilead." Zedekiah, a leading man among these prophets, in imitation of the true prophets, illustrated his false prophecy with a sign, v. 11. He made him a pair of iron horns, representing the two kings, and their honour and power, (both which were signified by horns, exaltation and force,) and with these the Syrians must be pushed. All the prophets agreed, as one man, that Ahab should return from this expedition, a conqueror, v. 12. Unity is not always the mark of a true church, and true ministry. Here were 400 men that prophesied with one mind and one mouth, and yet all in an error.

V. Jehoshaphat cannot relish this sort of preaching; it is not like what he was used to; the false prophets cannot so mimic the true, but that he who had spiritual senses exercised, could discern the fallacy, and therefore he inquires for a prophet of the Lord besides, v. 7. He is too much a courtier to say any thing by way of reflection on the king's chaplains, but he waits to see a prophet of the Lord; intimating that he could not look upon these to be so. They seemed to be somewhat, (whatever they were, it made no matter to him,) but in conference, they added nothing to him, they gave him no satisfaction, Gal. 2. 6. One faithful prophet of the Lord was worth them all.

VI. Ahab has another, but one he hates, Micaiah by name, and, to please Jehoshaphat, he is willing to have him sent for, v. 8-10. Ahab owned they might inquire of the Lord by him, that he was a true prophet, and one that knew God's mind. And yet, 1. He hated him, and was not ashamed to own to the king of Judah that he did so, and to give this for his reason, He doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil. And whose fault was that? If Ahab had done well, he had heard accordingly, from heaven; if he do ill, he may thank himself for all the uneasiness which the reproofs and threats of God's word give him. Note, These are wretchedly hardened in sin, and are ripening apace for ruin, who hate God's ministers, because they deal plainly with them, and faithfully warn them of their misery and danger by reason of sin, and reckon those their enemies, that tell them the truth. 2. He had (it should seem) imprisoned him; for when he committed him, (v. 26.) he bade the officer carry him back; namely, to the place whence he came. We may suppose that this was he that reproved him for his clemency to Ben-hadad, (ch. 20. 38, &c.) and for that was cast into prison, where he had lain these three years. And hence Ahab knew where to find him so readily, v. 9. But his imprisonment had not excluded him from divine visits, the spirit of prophecy continued with him there; he was bound, but the word of the Lord was not. Nor did it in the least abate his courage, or make him less confident or faithful in delivering his message. Jehoshaphat gave too gentle a reproof to Ahab, for expressing his indignation against a faithful prophet, Let not the king say so, v. 8. He should have said, "Thou art unjust to the prophet, unkind to thyself, and puttest an affront upon his Lord and thine, in saying so." Such sinners as Ahab, must be rebuked sharply. However, he so far yielded to the reproof, that, for fear of provoking Jehoshaphat to break off from his alliance with him, he orders Micaiah to be sent for with all speed, v. 9. The two kings sat each in their robes and chairs of state, in the gate of Samaria, ready to receive this poor prophet, and to hear what he has to say; for many will give God's word the hearing, that will not lend it an obedient ear. They were attended with a crowd of flattering prophets, that could not think of prophesying any thing but what was very sweet, and very smooth, to two such glorious princes now in confederacy. They that love to be flattered, shall not want flatterers.

Lastly, Micaiah is pressed by the officer that fetched him, to follow the cry, v. 13. That officer was unworthy the name of an Israelite, who pretended to prescribe to a prophet; but he thought him altogether such a one as the rest, who studied to please men, and not God. He tells him how unanimous the other prophets were in foretelling the king's good success; how agreeable it was to the king: that it was his interest to say as they said; he might gain not only enlargement, but preferment, by it. They that dote upon worldly things themselves, think every body else should do so too, and, true or false, right or wrong, speak and act for their secular interest only. He intimates likewise, that it would be to no purpose to contradict such a numerous and unanimous vote; he would be ridiculed, as affecting a foolish singularity, if he should. But Micaiah knows better things, protests it, and backs his protestation with an oath, that he will deliver his message from God with all faithfulness, whether it be pleasing or displeasing to his prince; (v. 14.) What the Lord saith to me, that will I speak, without addition, diminution, or alteration. Bravely resolved! And as became one who had his eye to a greater King than either of these, arrayed with brighter robes, and sitting on a higher throne.

15. So he came to the king. And the king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go against Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall we forbear? And he answered him, Go, and prosper: for the LORD shall deliver it into the hand of the king. 16. And the king said unto him, How many times shall I adjure thee that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the LORD? 17. And he said, I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd: and the LORD said, These have no master; let them return every man to his house in peace. 18. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, Did I not tell thee that he would prophesy no good concerning me, but evil? 19. And he said, Hear thou, therefore, the word of the LORD: I saw the LORD sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him, on his right hand and on his left. 20. And the LORD said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. 21. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the LORD, and said, I will persuade him. 22. And the LORD said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also: go forth, and do so. 23. Now therefore, behold, the LORD hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the LORD hath spoken evil concerning thee. 24. But Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah went near, and smote Micaiah on the cheek, and said, Which way went the Spirit of the LORD from me to speak unto thee? 25. And Micaiah said, Behold, thou shalt see in that day, when thou shalt go into an inner chamber to hide thyself. 26. And the king of Israel said, Take Micaiah, and carry him back unto Amon the governor of the city, and to Joash the king's son; 27. And say, Thus saith the king, Put this fellow in the prison, and feed him with bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, until I come in peace. 28. And Micaiah said, If thou return at all in peace, the LORD hath not spoken by me. And he said, Hearken, O people, every one of you.

Here Micaiah does well, but, as is common, suffers ill for so doing.

1. We are here told how faithfully he delivered his message, as one that was more solicitous to please God than to humour either the great or the many. Three ways he delivers the message, and all displeasing to Ahab.

1. He speaks as the rest of the prophets did, but ironically, Go, and prosper, v. 15. Ahab put the same question to him, that he had put to his own prophets, Shall we go, or shall we forbear? Seemingly desirous to know God's mind, when, like Balaam, he was strongly bent to do his own; which Micaiah plainly took notice of, when he bade him go, but with such an air of pronounciation, as plainly showed he spake it by way of derision; as if he had said, "I know you are determined to go, and I hear your own prophets are unanimous in assuring you of success; go then, and take what follows. They say, The Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king; but I do not tell thee that thus saith the Lord; no, he saith otherwise." Note, Those deserve to be bantered, that love to be flattered; and it is just with God to give up those to their own counsels, that give up themselves to their own lusts, Eccl. 11. 9. In answer to this, Ahab adjures him to tell him the truth, and not to jest with him, (v. 16.) as if he sincerely desired to know both what God would have him do, and what he would do with him; yet intending to represent the prophet as a perverse ill-humoured man, that would not tell him the truth, till he was thus put to his oath, or adjured to do it.

2. Being thus pressed, he plainly foretold that the king would be cut off in this expedition, and his army scattered, v. 17. He saw them in a vision, or dream, dispersed upon the mountains, as sheep that have no one to guide them: Smite the shepherd and the sheep will be scattered, Zech. 13. 7. This intimates, (1.) That Israel should be deprived of their king, who was their shepherd; God took notice of it, These have no master. (2.) That they would be obliged to retire re infecta—without accomplishing what they went for. He does not foresee any great slaughter in the army, but that they should make a dishonourable retreat; Let them return every man to his house in peace: put into disorder indeed for the present, but no great losers, by the death of their king: he shall fall in war, but they shall go home in peace. Thus Micaiah, in his prophecy, testified what he had seen and heard, (let them take it how they pleased,) while the others prophesied merely out of their own hearts; see Jer. 23. 28. The prophet that has a dream, let him tell that, and so quote his authority; and he that has my word, let him speak my word faithfully, and not his own; for what is the chaff to the wheat? Now Ahab finds himself aggrieved, turns to Jehoshaphat, and appeals to him, whether Micaiah had not manifestly a spite against him, v. 18. They that bear malice to others, are generally willing to believe that they bear malice to them, though they have no cause for it, and therefore to put the worst constructions upon all they say. What evil did Micaiah prophesy to Ahab, in telling him, if he proceeded in this expedition, it would be fatal to him, while he might choose whether he would proceed in it or no? The greatest kindness we can do to one that is going in a dangerous way, is, to tell him of his danger.

3. He informed the king how it was, that all his prophets encouraged him to proceed; God permitted Satan, by them, to deceive him into his ruin, and he, by vision, knew of it: it was represented to him, and he represented it to Ahab, that the God of heaven had determined he should fall at Ramoth-gilead; (v. 19, 20.) that the favour he had wickedly shown to Ben-hadad, might be punished by him and his Syrians, and that he being in some doubt whether he should go to Ramoth-gilead or no, and resolving to be advised by his prophets, they should persuade him to do it, and prevail; (v. 21, 22.) and hence it was, that they encouraged him with so much assurance; (v. 23.) it was a lie from the father of lies, but by the divine permission. This matter is here represented after the manner of men; we are not to imagine that God is ever put upon new counsels, or is ever at a loss for means whereby to effect his purpose, or that he needs to consult with angels, or any creature, about the methods he should take, or that he is the Author of sin, or the cause of any man's either telling or believing a lie; but beside what was intended by this, with reference to Ahab himself, it is to teach us, (1.) That God is a great King above all kings, and has a throne above all the thrones of earthly princes; "You have your thrones," (said Micaiah to these two kings,) "and you think you may do what you will, and we must all say as you would have us; but I saw the Lord sitting upon his throne, and every man's judgment proceeding from him, and therefore I must say as he says; he is not a man, as you are." (2.) That he is continually attended and served by an innumerable company of angels, those heavenly hosts, who stand by him, ready to go where he sends them, and to do what he bids them, messengers of mercy on his right hand, of wrath on his left hand. (3.) That he not only takes cognizance of, but presides over, all the affairs of this lower world, and overrules them according to the counsel of his own will: the rise and fall of princes, the issues of war, and all the great affairs of state, which are the subject of the consultation of wise and great men, are no more above God's direction, than the meanest concerns of the poorest cottagers are below his notice. (4.) God has many ways of bringing about his own counsels, particularly concerning the fall of sinners when they are ripe for ruin; he can do it either in this manner or in that manner. (5.) That there are malicious and lying spirits, which go about continually seeking to devour, and, in order to that, seeking to deceive, and especially to put lies into the mouths of prophets, by them to entice many to their destruction. (6.) It is not without the divine permission, that the Devil deceives men. Thereby God serves his own purposes. With him is strength and wisdom; the deceived and the deceiver are his, Job. 12. 16. When he pleases, for the punishment of those who receive not the truth in the love of it, he not only lets Satan loose to deceive them, (Rev. 20. 7, 8.) but gives up men to strong delusions to believe him, 2 Thess. 2. 11, 12. (7.) Those are manifestly marked for ruin, that are thus given up; God has certainly spoken evil concerning those whom he has given up to be imposed upon by lying prophets; thus Micaiah gave Ahab fair warning, not only of the danger of proceeding in this war, but of the danger of believing those that encouraged him to proceed; thus we are warned to beware of false prophets, and to try the spirits; the lying spirit never deceives so fatally, as in the mouth of prophets.

II. We are here told, how he was abused for delivering his message thus faithfully, thus plainly, in a way so very proper both to convince and to affect.

1. Zedekiah, a wicked prophet, impudently insulted him in the face of the court, smote him on the cheek, to reproach him, to silence him and stop his mouth, and to express his indignation at him; (thus was our blessed Saviour abused, Matth. 26. 67. that Judge of Israel, Mic. 5. 1.) and as if he not only had the Spirit of the Lord, but the monopoly of this Spirit, that he might not go without his leave, he asks, Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me to speak to thee? v. 24. The false prophets were always the worst enemies the true prophets had, and not only stirred up the government against them, but were themselves abusive to them, as Zedekiah here. To strike within the verge of the court, especially in the king's presence, is looked upon by our law as a high misdemeanour, yet this wicked prophet gives this abuse to a prophet of the Lord, and is not reprimanded or bound to his good behaviour for it; Ahab was pleased with it, and Jehoshaphat had not courage to appear for the injured prophet, pretending it was out of his jurisdiction; but Micaiah, though he returns not his blow, (God's prophets are no strikers nor persecutors, dare not avenge themselves, render blow for blow, or be, any way, accessory to the breach of the peace,) yet, since he boasted so much of the Spirit, as those commonly do, that know least of his operations; he leaves him to be convinced of his error by the event, Thou shalt know when thou hidest thyself in an inner chamber, v. 25. It is likely, Zedekiah went with Ahab to the battle, and took his horns of iron with him, to encourage the soldiers, to see with pleasure the accomplishment of his prophecy, and return in triumph with the king; but the army being routed, he fled among the rest from the sword of the enemy, sheltered himself as Ben-hadad had done, in a chamber within a chamber, (ch. 20. 30.) lest he should perish, as he knew he deserved to do, with those whom he had deluded, as Balaam did, (Numb. 31. 8.) and lest the blind prophet should fall into the ditch, with the blinded prince whom he had misled. Note, Those that will not have their mistakes rectified in time by the word of God, will be undeceived, when it is too late, by the judgments of God.

2. Ahab, that wicked king, committed him to prison; (v. 27.) not only ordered him to be taken into custody, or remitted to the prison whence he came, but to be fed with bread and water, coarse bread and puddle-water, till he should return; not doubting but he should return a conqueror, and then he would put him to death for a false prophet, v. 27. Hard usage for one that would have prevented his ruin! But by this it appeared that God had determined to destroy him, as 2 Chron. 25. 16. How confident is Ahab of success! He doubts not but he shall return in peace, forgetting what he himself had reminded Ben-hadad of, Let not him that girdeth on the harness, boast; but there was little likelihood of his coming home in peace, when he left one of God's prophets behind him in prison. Micaiah puts it upon the issue, and calls all the people to be witnesses that he did so, "If thou return in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me, v. 28. Let me incur the reproach and punishment of a false prophet, if the king come home alive." He ran no hazard by this appeal, for he knew whom he had believed; he that is terrible to the kings of the earth, and treads upon princes as mortar, will rather let thousands of them fall to the ground, than one jot or tittle of his own word; he will not fail to confirm the word of his servants, Isa. 44. 26.

29. So the king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, went up to Ramoth-gilead. 30. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, I will disguise myself, and enter into the battle; but put thou on thy robes. And the king of Israel disguised himself, and went into the battle. 31. But the king of Syria commanded his thirty and two captains that had rule over his chariots, saying, Fight neither with small nor great, save only with the king of Israel. 32. And it came to pass, when the captains of the chariots saw Jehoshaphat, that they said, Surely, it is the king of Israel. And they turned aside to fight against him: and Jehoshaphat cried out. 33. And it came to pass, when the captains of the chariots perceived that it was not the king of Israel, that they turned back from pursuing him. 34. And a certain man drew a bow at a venture, and smote the king of Israel between the joints of the harness: wherefore he said unto the driver of his chariot, Turn thine hand, and carry me out of the host; for I am wounded. 35. And the battle increased that day; and the king was stayed up in his chariot against the Syrians, and died at even: and the blood ran out of the wound into the midst of the chariot. 36. And there went a proclamation throughout the host about the going down of the sun, saying, Every man to his city, and every man to his own country. 37. So the king died, and was brought to Samaria; and they buried the king in Samaria. 38. And one washed the chariot in the pool of Samaria, and the dogs licked up his blood, (and they washed his armour,) according unto the word of the LORD which he spake. 39. Now the rest of the acts of Ahab, and all that he did, and the ivory house which he made, and all the cities that he built, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? 40. So Ahab slept with his fathers; and Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead.

The matter in contest between God's prophet and Ahab's prophet, is here soon determined, and it is made to appear which was in the right. Here,

I. The two kings march with their forces to Ramoth-gilead, v. 29. That the king of Israel, who hated God's prophet, should so far disbelieve his admonition, as to persist in his resolution, notwithstanding, is not strange; but that Jehoshaphat, that pious prince, who had desired to inquire by a prophet of the Lord, as disrelishing and discrediting Ahab's prophets, should yet proceed, after so fair a warning, is matter of astonishment; but by the easiness of his temper he was carried away with the delusion (as Barnabas was with the dissimulation, Gal. 2. 13.) of his friends; he gave too much heed to Ahab's prophets, because they pretended to speak from God too, and in his country he had never been imposed upon by such cheats; he was ready to give his opinion with the majority, and to conclude that it was 400 to one but they should succeed; Micaiah had not forbidden them to go; nay, at first, he said, Go, and prosper; if it came to the worst, it was only Ahab's fall that was foretold, and therefore he hoped he might venture.

II. Ahab contrives to secure himself, and expose his friend; (v. 30.) "I will disguise myself, and go in the habit of a common soldier, but let Jehoshaphat put on his robes, to appear in the dress of a general." He pretended hereby to do honour to Jehoshaphat, and to compliment him with the sole command of the army in this action; he shall direct and give orders, and Ahab will serve as a soldier under him; but he intended, 1. To make a liar of a good prophet; thus he hoped to elude the danger, and so to defeat the threatening, as if, by disguising himself, he could escape the divine cognizance, and the judgments that pursued him. 2. To make a fool of a good king, whom he did not cordially love, because he was one that adhered to God, and so condemned his apostasy; he knew that if any perished, it must be the shepherd, so Micaiah had foretold; and perhaps he had intimation of the charge the enemy had, to fight chiefly against the king of Israel, and therefore basely intended to betray Jehoshaphat to the danger, that he might secure himself. Ahab was marked for ruin: one would not have been in his attire for a great sum; yet he will over-persuade this godly king to muster for him. See what they get, that join in affinity with vicious men, whose consciences are debauched, and who are lost to every thing that is honourable. How can it be expected that he should be true to his friend, that has been false to his God?

III. Jehoshaphat, having more piety than policy, put himself into the post of honour, though it was the post of danger, and was thereby brought into peril of his life, but God graciously delivered him: the king of Syria charged his captains to level their force, not against the king of Judah, for with him he had no quarrel, but with the king of Israel only, (v. 31.) to aim at his person, as if against him he had a particular enmity; now Ahab was justly repaid for sparing Ben-hadad, who, as the seed of the serpent commonly do, stung the bosom in which he was fostered, and saved from perishing; some think that he designed only to have him taken prisoner, that he might now give him as honourable a treatment as he had formerly received from him. Whatever was the reason, this charge the officers received, and endeavoured to oblige their prince in this matter; for, seeing Jehoshaphat in his royal habit, they took him for the king of Israel, and surrounded him. Now, 1. By his danger, God let him know that he was displeased with him for joining in confederacy with Ahab; he had said, in compliment to Ahab, (v. 4.) I am as thou art, and now he was indeed taken for him; they that associate with evil doers, are in danger of sharing in their plagues. 2. By his deliverance, God let him know that though he was displeased with him, yet he had not deserted him; some of the captains that knew him, perceived their mistake, and so retired from the pursuit of him; but it is said, (2 Chron. 18. 31.) God moved them (for he has all hearts in his hand) to depart from him; to him he cried out, not in cowardice, but devotion, and from him his relief came; Ahab was in no care to succour him; God is a Friend that will not fail us, when other friends do.

IV. Ahab received his mortal wound in the battle, notwithstanding his endeavours to secure himself in the habit of a private sentinel. Let no man think to hide himself from God's judgments, no, not in masquerade; Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies, whatever disguise they are in, v. 34. The Syrian that shot him, little thought of doing such a piece of service to God and his king, for he drew a bow at a venture, not aiming particularly at any man; yet God so directed the arrow, that, 1. He hit the right person, the man that was marked for destruction, whom, if they had taken alive, as was designed, perhaps Ben-hadad would have spared; those cannot escape with life, whom God hath doomed to death. 2. He hit him in the right place, between the joints of the harness, the only place about him where this arrow of death could find entrance. No armour is proof against the darts of divine vengeance: case the criminal in steel, and it is all one; he that made him, can make his sword to approach to him. That which to us seems altogether casual, is done by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God.

V. The army was dispersed by the enemy, and sent home by the king. Either Jehoshaphat or Ahab ordered the retreat of the sheep, when the shepherd was smitten: "Every man to his city, for it is to no purpose to attempt any thing more," v. 36. Ahab himself lived long enough to see that part of Micaiah's prophecy accomplished, that all Israel should be scattered upon the mountains of Gilead, (v. 17.) and perhaps with his dying lips did himself give orders for it; for though he would be carried out of the army, to have his wounds dressed, (v. 34.) yet he would be stayed up in his chariot, to see if his army were victorious; but when he saw the battle increase against them, his spirits sunk, and he died, but his death was so lingering, that he had time to feel himself die; and we may well imagine with what horror he now reflected upon the wickedness he had committed, the warnings he had slighted, Baal's altars, Naboth's vineyard, Micaiah's imprisonment; now he sees himself flattered into his own ruin, and Zedekiah's horns of iron, pushing, not the Syrians, but himself, into destruction. Thus is he brought to the king of terrors, without hope in his death.

VI. The royal corpse was brought to Samaria, and buried there, (v. 37.) and thither were brought the bloody chariot and bloody armour in which he died, v. 38. One particular circumstance is taken notice of, because there was in it the accomplishment of a prophecy, That when they brought the chariot to the pool of Samaria, to be washed, the dogs (and swine, says the Septuagint) gathered about it, and, as is usual, licked the blood, or, as some think, the water in which it was washed, with which the blood was mingled: the dogs made no difference between royal blood and other blood. Now Naboth's blood was avenged, (ch. 21. 19.) and that word of David, as well as Elijah's word, was fulfilled, (Ps. 68. 23.) That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same. The dogs licking the guilty blood, was perhaps designed to represent the terrors that prey upon the guilty soul after death.

Lastly, The story of Ahab is here concluded in the usual form, v. 39, 40. Among his works, mention is made of an ivory house which he built, so called, because many parts of it were inlaid with ivory; perhaps it was intended to vie with the stately palace of the kings of Judah, which Solomon built.

41. And Jehoshaphat the son of Asa began to reign over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab king of Israel. 42. Jehoshaphat was thirty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty and five years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi. 43. And he walked in all the ways of Asa his father; he turned not aside from it, doing that which was right in the eyes of the LORD: nevertheless the high places were not taken away; for the people offered and burnt incense yet in the high places. 44. And Jehoshaphat made peace with the king of Israel. 45. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, and his might that he showed, and how he warred, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? 46. And the remnant of the Sodomites, which remained in the days of his father Asa, he took out of the land. 47. There was then no king in Edom: a deputy was king. 48. Jehoshaphat made ships of Tharshish to go to Ophir for gold; but they went not: for the ships were broken at Ezion-geber. 49. Then said Ahaziah the son of Ahab unto Jehoshaphat, Let my servants go with thy servants in the ships: but Jehoshaphat would not. 50. And Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead. 51. Ahaziah the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and reigned two years over Israel. 52. And he did evil in the sight of the LORD, and walked in the way of his father, and in the way of his mother, and in the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin: 53. For he served Baal, and worshipped him, and provoked to anger the LORD God of Israel, according to all that his father had done.

Here is,

I. A short account of the reign of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, which we shall have a much fuller narrative of in the book of Chronicles, and of the greatness and goodness of that prince, neither of which was lessened nor sullied by any thing but his intimacy with the house of Ahab, which, upon several accounts, was a diminution to him; his confederacy with Ahab in war, we have already found dangerous to him, and his confederacy with Ahaziah his son in trade, sped no better; he offered to go partner with him in a fleet of merchantships, that should fetch gold from Ophir as Solomon's navy did, v. 48. See 2 Chron. 20. 35, 36. But while they were preparing to set sail, they were exceedingly damaged and disabled by a storm, broken at Ezion-geber, which a prophet gave Jehoshaphat to understand was a rebuke to him for his league with wicked Ahaziah, 2 Chron. 20. 37. And therefore, as we are told here, (v. 49.) when Ahaziah desired a second time to be a partner with him, or, if that could not be obtained, that he might but send his servants with some effects on board Jehoshaphat's ships, he refused; Jehoshaphat would not; the rod of God, expounded by the word of God, had effectually broken him off from his confederacy with that ungodly unhappy prince. Better buy wisdom dear than be without it; but experience is therefore said to be the mistress of fools, because they are fools that will not learn till they are taught by experience, and particularly, till they are taught the danger of associating with wicked people.

Now Jehoshaphat's reign appears here to have been none of the longest, but one of the best. 1. It was none of the longest, for he reigned but 25 years; (v. 42.) but then it was in the prime of his time, between 35 and 60, and these 25, added to his father's happy 41, give us a grateful idea of the flourishing condition of the kingdom of Judah, and of religion in it, for a great while, even when things were very bad, upon all accounts, in the kingdom of Israel. If Jehoshaphat reigned not so long as his father, to balance that, he had not those blemishes on the latter end of his reign, that his father had; (2 Chron. 16. 9, 10, 12.) and it is better for a man that has been in reputation for wisdom and honour, to die in the midst of it, than to outlive it. 2. Yet it was one of the best, both in respect of piety and prosperity. (1.) He did well, he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord; (v. 43.) observed the commands of his God, and trod in the steps of his good father, and persevered therein, he turned not aside from it; yet every man's character has some but or other, so had his; the high places were not taken away, no, not out of Judah and Benjamin, though those tribes lay so near Jerusalem, that they might easily bring their offerings and incense to the altar there, and could not pretend, as some other of the tribes, the inconvenience of lying remote; but old corruptions are with difficulty rooted out, especially when they have formerly had the patronage of those that were good, as the high places had of Samuel, Solomon, and some others. (2.) His affairs did well; he prevented the mischiefs which had attended their wars with the kingdom of Israel, establishing a lasting peace, (v. 44.) which had been a greater blessing, if he had contented himself with a peace, and not carried it on to an affinity with Israel: he put a deputy, or viceroy, in Edom, so that that kingdom was tributary to him; (v. 47.) and therein the prophecy concerning Esau and Jacob was fulfilled, that the elder should serve the younger; and, in general, mention is made of his might and his wars, v. 45. He pleased God, and God blessed him with strength and success; his death is spoken of, (v. 50.) to shut up his story, yet, in the history of the kings of Israel, we find mention of him afterward, 2 Kings 3. 7.

II. The beginning of the story of Ahaziah the son of Ahab; (v. 51. . 53.) his reign was very short, not two years. Some sinners God makes quick work with. It is a very bad character that is here given him; he not only kept up Jeroboam's idolatry, but the worship of Baal likewise: though he had heard of the ruin of Jeroboam's family, and had seen his own father drawn into destruction by the prophets of Baal, who had often been proved false prophets, yet he received no instruction, took no warning, but followed the example of his wicked father, and the counsel of his more wicked mother Jezebel, who was still living. Miserable are the children that not only derive a stock of corruption from their parents, but are thus taught by them to trade with it; and unhappy, most unhappy parents, they that help to damn their children's souls.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE SECOND BOOK OF

K I N G S.

---

This second book of the Kings (which the Septuagint, numbering from Samuel, calls the fourth) is a continuation of the former book; and, some think, might better have been made to begin with the 51st verse of the foregoing chapter, where the reign of Ahaziah begins. The former book had an illustrious beginning, in the glories of the kingdom of Israel, when it was entire; this has a melancholy conclusion, in the desolations of the kingdoms of Israel first, and then of Judah, after they had been long broken into two; for a kingdom, divided against itself, cometh to destruction. But as Elijah's mighty works were very much the glory of the former book, toward the latter end of it; so were Elisha's the glory of this, toward the beginning of it. These prophets outshone their princes; and therefore, as far as they go, the history shall be accounted for in them. Here is,

- I. Elijah fetching fire from heaven, and ascending in fire to heaven, ch. 1, 2.
  - II. Elisha working many miracles, both for prince and people, Israelites and foreigners, ch. 3-7.
  - III. Hazael and Jehu anointed, the former for the correction of Israel, the latter for the destruction of the house of Ahab, and the worship of Baal, ch. 8-10.
  - IV. The reigns of several of the kings, both of Judah and Israel, ch. 11-16.
  - V. The captivity of the ten tribes, ch. 17.
  - VI. The good and glorious reign of Hezekiah, ch. 18-20.
  - VII. Manasseh's wicked reign, and Josiah's good one, ch. 21-23.
  - VIII. The destruction of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon, ch. 24, 25. This history, in the several passages of it, confirms that observation of Solomon, That righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is the reproach of any people.

II. KINGS, I.

CHAP. I.

We here find Ahaziah, the genuine son and successor of Ahab, on the throne of Israel. His reign continued not two years; he died by a fall in his own house; which, after the mention of the revolt of Moab, (v. 1.) we have here an account of. I. The message, which, on that occasion, he sent to the god of Ekron, v. 2. II. The message he received from the God of Israel, v. 3-8. III. The destruction of the messengers he sent to seize the prophet, once and again, v. 9-12. IV. His compassion to, and compliance with, the third messenger, upon his submission, and the delivery of the message to the king himself, v. 13-16. V. The death of Ahaziah, v. 17, 18. In the story we may observe how great the prophet looks, and how little the prince.

I. THEN Moab rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab. 2. And Ahaziah fell down through a lattice in his upper chamber that was in Samaria, and was sick: and he sent messengers, and said unto them, Go, inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, whether I shall recover of this disease. 3. But the angel of the LORD said to Elijah the Tishbite, Arise, go up to meet the messengers of the king of Samaria, and say unto them, Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron? 4. Now, therefore, thus saith the LORD, Thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. And Elijah departed. 5. And when the messengers turned back unto him, he said unto them, Why are ye now turned back? 6. And they said unto him, There came a man up to meet us, and said unto us, Go, turn again unto the king that sent you, and say unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that thou sendest to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron? therefore thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. 7. And he said unto them, What manner of man was he which came up to meet you, and told you these words? 8. And they answered him, He was a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins. And he said: It is Elijah the Tishbite.

We have here, Ahaziah, the wicked king of Israel, under God's rebukes, both by his providence and by his prophesy; by his rod and by his word.

I. He is crossed in his affairs. How can those expect to prosper, that do evil in the sight of the Lord, and provoke him to anger? When he rebelled against God, and revolted from his allegiance to him, Moab rebelled against Israel, and revolted from the subjection they had long paid to the kings of Israel, v. 1. The Edomites that bordered on Judah, and were tributaries to the kings of Judah, still continued so, as we find in the chapter before, (v. 47.) till, in the wicked reign of Joram, they broke that yoke, (ch. 8. 22.) as the Moabites did now. If men break their covenants with us, and withdraw their duty, we must reflect upon our breach of covenant with God, and the neglect of our duty to him. Sin weakens and impoverishes us. We shall hear of the Moabites, ch. 3. 5.

II. He is seized with sickness in body, not from any inward cause, but by a severe accident; He fell down through a lattice, and was much bruised with the fall; perhaps it threw him into a fever, v. 2. Wherever we go, there is but a step between us and death. A man's house is his castle, but not to secure him against the judgments of God. The cracked lattice is as fatal to the son, when God pleases to make it so, as the bow drawn at a venture, was to the father. Ahaziah would not attempt to reduce the Moabites, lest he should perish in the field of battle; but he is not safe, though he tarry at home. Royal palaces do not always yield firm footing. The snare is laid for the sinner in the ground where he thinks least of it, Job 18. 9, 10. The whole creation, which groans under the burthen of man's sin, will, at length, sink and break under the weight, like this lattice. He is never safe, that has God for his Enemy.

III. In his distress, he sends messengers to inquire of the god of Ekron, whether he should recover or no, v. 2. And here, 1. His inquiry was very foolish; Shall I recover? Even nature itself would rather have asked, "What means may I use, that I may recover?" But as one solicitous only to know his fortune, not to know his duty, his question is only this, Shall I recover? which a little time would give an answer to. We should be more thoughtful what will become of us after death, than how, or when, or where, we shall die; and more desirous to be told how we may conduct ourselves well in our sickness, and get good to our souls by it, than whether we shall recover from it. 2. His sending to Baal-zebub was very wicked; to make a dead and dumb idol, perhaps newly erected, (for idolaters were fond of new gods,) his oracle, was no less a reproach to his reason than to his religion. Baal-zebub signifies the lord of a fly; one of their Baals, that, perhaps, gave his answers either by the power of the demons, or the craft of the priests, with a humming noise, like that of a great fly; or that had (as they fancied) rid their country of the swarms of flies wherewith it was infested, or of some pestilential disease brought among them by flies. Perhaps this dunghill-deity was as famous then, as the oracle of Delphos was, long after, in Greece. In the New Testament, the prince of the devils is called Beel-zebub; (Matth. 12. 24.) for the gods of the Gentiles were devils, and this, perhaps, grew to be one of the most famous.

IV. Elijah, by direction from God, meets the messengers, and turns them back with an answer that shall save them the labour of going to Ekron. Had Ahaziah sent for Elijah, humbled himself, and begged his prayers, he might have had an answer of peace; but if he send to the god of Ekron, instead of the God of Israel, that, like Saul's consulting the witch, shall fill the measure of his iniquity, and bring upon him a sentence of death. They that will not inquire of the word of God for their comfort, shall be made to hear it, whether they will or no, to their amazement.

1. He faithfully reproves his sin; (v. 3.) Is it not because there is not (that is, because you think there is not) a God in Israel, (because there is no God, none in Israel, so it may be read,) that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, a despicable town of the Philistines, (Zech. 9. 7.) long since vanquished by Israel? Here, (1.) The sin was bad enough, giving that honour to the Devil, which is due to God alone, which was done as much by their inquiries, as by their sacrifices. Note, It is a very wicked thing, upon any occasion or pretence whatsoever, to consult with the Devil. This wickedness reigned in the heathen world, (Isa. 47. 12, 13.) and remains too much even in the christian world, and the Devil's kingdom is supported by it. (2.) The construction which Elijah, in God's name, puts upon it, makes it much worse: "It is because you think not only that the God of Israel is not able to tell you, but that there is no God at all in Israel; else you would not send so far for a divine answer." Note, A practical and constructive atheism is the cause and malignity of our departures from God. Surely we think there is no God in Israel, when we live at large, make flesh our arm, and seek a portion in the things of this world.

2. He plainly reads his doom; "Go, tell him, he shall surely die, v. 4. Since he is so anxious to know his fate, this is it; let him make the best of it." The certain fearful looking for of judgment and indignation which this message must needs cause, cannot but cut him to the heart.

V. The message being delivered to him by his servants, he inquires of them by whom it was sent him, and concludes, by their description of him, that it must be Elijah, v. 7, 8. For, 1. His dress was the same that he had seen him in, in his father's court. He was clad in a hairy garment, and had a leathern girdle about him, plain and homely in his garb. John Baptist, the Elias of the New Testament, herein resembled him; for his clothes were made of hair-cloth, and he was girt with a leathern girdle, Matth. 3. 4. He that was clothed with the Spirit, despised all rich and gay clothing. 2. His message was such as he used to deliver to his father, to whom he never prophesied good, but evil. Elijah is one of those witnesses that still torment the inhabitants of the earth, Rev. 11. 10. He that was a thorn in Ahab's eyes, will be so in the eyes of his son, while he treads in the steps of his wickedness; and he is ready to cry out, as his father did, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? Let sinners consider, that the word which took hold of their fathers, is still as quick and powerful as ever. See Zech. 1. 6. Heb. 4. 12.

9. Then the king sent unto him a captain of fifty with his fifty. And he went up to him; (and, behold, he sat on the top of a hill;) and he spake unto him, Thou man of God, the king hath said, Come down. 10. And Elijah answered and said to the captain of fifty, If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty. 11. Again also he sent unto him another captain of fifty with his fifty. And he answered and said unto him, O man of God, thus hath the king said, Come down quickly. 12. And Elijah answered and said unto them, If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And the fire of God came down from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty. 13. And he sent again a captain of the third fifty with his fifty. And the third captain of fifty went up, and came and fell on his knees before Elijah, and besought him; and said unto him, O man of God, I pray thee, let my life, and the life of these fifty thy servants, be precious in thy sight. 14. Behold, there came fire down from heaven, and burnt up the two captains of the former fifties with their fifties: therefore let my life now be precious in thy sight. 15. And the angel of the LORD said unto Elijah, Go down with him; be not afraid of him. And he arose, and went down with him unto the king. 16. And he said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Forasmuch as thou hast sent messengers to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, (is it not because there is no God in Israel to inquire of his word?) therefore thou shalt not come down off that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. 17. So he died, according to the word of the LORD, which Elijah had spoken: and Jehoram reigned in his stead, in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah; because he had no son. 18. Now the rest of the acts of Ahaziah which he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?

Here,

I. The king issues out a warrant for the apprehending of Elijah. If the God of Ekron had told him he should die, it is probable he would have taken it quietly; but now that a prophet of the Lord tells him so, reproving him for his sin, and reminding him of the God of Israel, he cannot bear it: so far is he from making any good improvement of the warning given him, that he is enraged against the prophet; neither his sickness, nor the thoughts of death, made any good impressions upon him, or possessed him with any fear of God: no external alarms will startle and soften secure sinners, but rather exasperate them. Did the king think Elijah a prophet, a true prophet? Why then durst he persecute him? Did he think him a common person? What occasion was there to send such a force, in order to seize him? Thus a band of men must take our Lord Jesus.

II. The captain that was sent with his fifty soldiers, found Elijah on the top of a hill, (some think Carmel,) and commanded him, in the king's name, to surrender himself, v. 9. Elijah was now so far from absconding, as formerly, in the close recesses of a cave, that he makes a bold appearance on the top of a hill; experience of God's protection makes him more bold. The captain calls him a man of God, not that he believed him to be so, or revered him as such a one, but because he was commonly called so; had he really looked upon him as a prophet, he would not have attempted to make him his prisoner; and had he thought him intrusted with the word of God, he would not have pretended to command him with the word of a king.

III. Elijah calls for fire from heaven, to consume this haughty daring sinner, not to secure himself, he could have done that some other way, nor to avenge himself, for it was not his own cause that he appeared and acted in; but to prove his mission, and to reveal the wrath of God from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. This captain had, in scorn, called him a man of God: "If I be so," says Elijah, "thou shalt pay dear for making a jest of it." He valued himself upon his commission, (the king has said, Come down,) but Elijah will let him know that the God of Israel is superior to the king of Israel, and has a greater power to enforce his commands. It was not long since Elijah had fetched fire from heaven, to consume the sacrifice, (1 Kings 18. 38.) in token of God's acceptance of that sacrifice as an atonement for the sins of the people; but they having slighted that, now the fire falls, not on the sacrifice, but on the sinners themselves, v. 10. See here, 1. What an interest the prophets had in heaven; what the Spirit of God in them demanded, the power of God effected; Elijah did but speak, and it was done; he that formerly had fetched water from heaven, now fetches fire. O the power of prayer! Concerning the work of my hands, command ye me, Isa. 45. 11. 2. What an interest heaven had in the prophets! God was always ready to plead their cause, and avenge the injuries done to them. Kings shall still be rebuked for their sakes, and charged to do his prophets no harm. One Elijah is more to God than 10,000 captains and their fifties. Doubtless Elijah did this by a divine impulse, and yet our Saviour would not allow the disciples to draw it into a precedent, Luke 9. 54. They were now not far from the place where Elias did this act of justice upon provoking Israelites, and would needs, in like manner, call for fire upon those provoking Samaritans; "No," says Christ, "by no means; you know not what manner of spirit you are of;" that is, (1.) "You do not consider what manner of spirit, as disciples, you are called to, and how different from that of the Old Testament dispensation; it was agreeable enough to that dispensation of terror, and of the letter, for Elias to call for fire; but the dispensation of the Spirit and of grace will by no means allow of it." (2.) "You are not aware what manner of spirit you are, upon this occasion, actuated by, and how different from that of Elias: he did it in holy zeal, you in passion; he was concerned for God's glory, you for your own reputation only." God judges men's practices by their principles, and his judgment is according to truth.

IV. This is repeated a second time; would one think it? 1. Ahaziah sends, a second time, to apprehend Elijah, (v. 11.) as if he were resolved not to be baffled by omnipotence itself; obstinate sinners must be convinced and conquered, at last, by the fire of hell, for fire from heaven, it seems, will not do it. 2. Another captain is ready with his fifty, who, in his blind rage against the prophet, and his blind obedience to the king, dares engage in that service which had been fatal to the last undertakers; this is as impudent and imperious as the last, and more in haste; not only, "Come down quietly," and do not struggle," but, without taking any notice of what had been done, he says, "Come down quickly," and do not trifle, the king's business requires haste; come down, or I will fetch thee down." 3. Elijah relents not, but calls for another flash of lightning, which instantly lays this captain and his fifty dead upon the spot; they that will sin like others, must expect to suffer like them; God is inflexibly just.

V. The third captain humbled himself, and cast himself upon the mercy of God and Elijah. It does not appear that Ahaziah ordered him to do so, (his stubborn heart is as hard as ever; so regardless is he of the terrors of the Lord, so little affected with the manifestations of his wrath, and withal so prodigal of the lives of his subjects, that he sent a third with the same provoking message to Elijah,) but he took warning by the fate of his predecessors, who, perhaps, lay dead before his eyes; and, instead of summoning the prophet down, fell down before him, and begged for his life and the lives of his soldiers, acknowledging their own evil deserts, and the prophet's power; (v. 13, 14.) Let my life be precious in thy sight. Note, There is nothing to be got by contending with God: if we would prevail with him, it must be by supplication; if we would not fall before God, we must bow before him; and those are wise for themselves, who learn submission from the fatal consequences which others entail by their obstinacy.

VI. Elijah does more than grant the request of this third captain. God is not severer with those that stand it out against him, than he is ready to show mercy to those that repent, and submit to him; never any found it in vain to cast themselves upon the mercy of God. This captain not only has his life spared, but is permitted to carry his point; Elijah, being so commanded by the angel, goes down with him to the king, v. 15. Thus he shows that he, before, refused to come, not because he feared the king or court, but because he would not be imperiously summoned, and would not lessen the honour of his master; he magnifies his office. He comes boldly to the king, and tells him, to his face, (let him take it as he may,) what he had, before, sent to him, (v. 16.) that he should surely and shortly die; he mitigates not the sentence, either for fear of the king's displeasure, or in pity to his misery: the God of Israel has condemned him, let him send to see whether the God of Ekron can deliver him. So thunder-struck is Ahaziah with this message, when it comes from the prophet's own mouth, that neither he, nor any of those about him, durst offer him any violence, nor so much as give him an affront; but out of that den of lions he comes unhurt, like Daniel. Who can harm those whom God will shelter?

Lastly, The prediction is accomplished in a few days; Ahaziah died, (v. 17.) and, dying childless, left his kingdom to his brother Jehoram; his father reigned wickedly twenty-two years, he not two; sometimes the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power; but they who therefore promise themselves prosperity in impiety, may, perhaps, find themselves deceived; for, (as Bishop Hall observes here,) "Some sinners live long, to aggravate their judgment, others die soon, to hasten it;" but it is certain that evil pursues sinners, and, sooner or later, it will overtake them; nor will any thing fill the measure sooner than that complicated iniquity of Ahaziah; honouring the Devil's oracles, and hating God's oracles.

In this chapter, we have, I. That extraordinary event, the translation of Elijah; in the close of the foregoing chapter, we had a wicked king leaving the world in disgrace, here we have a holy prophet leaving it in honour; the departure of the former was his greatest misery, of the latter, his greatest bliss: men are as their end is. Here is, 1. Elijah taking leave of his friends, the sons of the prophets, and especially Elisha, who kept close to him, and walked with him through Jordan, v. 1. .10. 2. His rapture into heaven by the ministry of angels, (v. 11.) and Elisha's lamentation of the loss this earth had of him, v. 12. II. The manifestation of Elisha, as a prophet in his room. 1. By the dividing of Jordan, v. 13, 14. 2. By the respect which the sons of the prophets paid him, v. 15. .18. 3. By the healing of the unwholesome waters of Jericho, v. 19. .22. 4. By the destruction of the children of Beth-el that mocked him, v. 23. .25. This revolution in prophecy makes a greater figure than the revolution of a kingdom.

1. AND it came to pass, when the LORD would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind, that Elijah went with Elisha from Gilgal. 2. And Elijah said unto Elisha, Tarry here, I pray thee; for the LORD hath sent me to Beth-el. And Elisha said unto him, As the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. So they went down to Beth-el. 3. And the sons of the prophets that were at Beth-el came forth to Elisha, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the LORD will take away thy master from thy head to-day? And he said, Yea, I know it; hold you your peace. 4. And Elijah said unto him, Elisha, tarry here, I pray thee; for the LORD hath sent me to Jericho. And he said, As the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. So they came to Jericho. 5. And the sons of the prophets that were at Jericho came to Elisha, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the LORD will take away thy master from thy head to-day? And he answered, Yea I know it; hold you your peace. 6. And Elijah said unto him, Tarry, I pray thee, here; for the LORD hath sent me to Jordan. And he said, As the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. And they two went on. 7. And fifty men of the sons of the prophets went, and stood to view afar off: and they two stood by Jordan. 8. And Elijah took his mantle, and wrapped it together, and smote the waters, and they were divided hither and thither; so that they two went over on dry ground.

Elijah's times, and the events concerning him, are as little dated as those of any great man in scripture; we are not told of his age, nor in what year of Ahab's reign he first appeared, nor in what year of Joram's he disappeared, and therefore cannot conjecture how long he flourished; it is supposed about 20 years in all.

Here we are told,

I. That God had determined to take him up into heaven by a whirlwind, v. 1. He would do it, and, it is probable, let him know of his purpose.

some time before, that he would shortly take him from the world, not by death, but translate him body and soul to heaven, as Enoch was, only causing him to undergo such a change as would be necessary to the qualifying of him to be an inhabitant in that world of spirits; and such as they shall undergo, who will be found alive at Christ's coming. It is not for us to say, why God would put such a peculiar honour upon Elijah above any other of the prophets; he was a man subject to like passions as we are, knew sin, and yet never tasted death. Wherefore is he thus dignified, thus distinguished, as a man whom the King of kings did delight to honour? We may suppose that herein, 1. God looked back upon his past services, which were eminent and extraordinary, and intended him a recompense for those, and an encouragement to the sons of the prophets to tread in the steps of his zeal and faithfulness, and, whatever it cost them, to witness against the corruptions of the age they lived in. 2. He looked down upon the present dark and degenerate state of the church, and would thus give a very sensible proof of another life after this, and draw the hearts of the faithful few upward toward himself, and that other life. 3. He looked forward to the evangelical dispensation, and, in the translation of Elijah, gave a type and figure of the ascension of Christ, and the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Elijah had, by faith and prayer, conversed much with heaven, and now he is taken thither, to assure us that if we have our conversation in heaven, while we are here on earth, we shall be there shortly, the soul shall, (and that is the man,) be happy there, there for ever.

II. That Elisha had determined, as long as he continued on earth, to cleave to him, and not to leave him: Elijah seemed desirous to shake him off, would have had him stay behind at Gilgal, at Beth-el, at Jericho, v. 2, 4, 6. Some think, out of humility; he knew what glory God designed for him, but would not seem to glory in it, nor desired it should be seen of men; (God's favourites covet not to have it proclaimed before them, that they are so, as the favourites of earthly princes do;) or rather, it was to try him, and make his constant adherence to him, the more commendable, like Naomi's persuading Ruth to go back: in vain does Elijah entreat him to tarry here, and tarry there; he resolves to tarry no where behind his master, till he goes to heaven, and leaves him behind on this earth; whatever comes of it, I will not leave thee; and why so? Not only because he loved him, but, 1. Because he desired to be edified by his holy heavenly converse as long as he staid on earth; it had always been profitable, but, we may suppose, now, more so than ever. We should therefore do all the spiritual good we can, one to another, and get all we can, one by another, while we are together, because we are to be together but a while. 2. Because he desired to be satisfied concerning his departure, and to see him when he was taken up, that his faith might be confirmed, and his acquaintance with the invisible world increased. He had long followed Elijah, and he would not leave him now when he hoped for the parting blessing; let not those that follow Christ, come short by tiring at last.

III. That Elijah, before his departure, visited the schools of the prophets, and took leave of them; it seems that there were such schools in many of the cities of Israel, probably, even in Samaria itself; here we find sons of the prophets, and considerable numbers of them, even at Beth-el, where one of the calves was set up, and at Jericho, which was lately built in defiance of a divine curse. At Jerusalem, and in the kingdom of Judah, they had priests and Levites, and the temple-service, the want of which, in the kingdom of Israel, God graciously made up by those colleges, where men were trained up and employed in the exercises of religion and devotion, and whither good people resorted to solemnize the appointed feasts with praying and hearing, when they had not conveniences for sacrifice or incense; and thus religion was kept up in a time of general apostasy. Much of God was among these prophets, and more were the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife; none of all the High Priests were comparable to these two great men Elijah and Elisha, who, for aught we know, never attended in the temple at Jerusalem. These seminaries of religion and virtue, which Elijah, it is probable, had been instrumental to found, he now visits, before his departure, to instruct, encourage, and bless them. Note, Those that are going to heaven themselves, ought to be concerned for those they leave behind them on earth, and to leave with them their experiences, testimonies, counsels, and prayers, 2 Pet. 1. 15. When Christ said, with triumph, Now I am no more in the world, he added, with tenderness, But these are; Father, keep them.

IV. That the sons of the prophets had intelligence, (either from Elijah himself, or by the spirit of prophecy in some of their own society,) or suspected, by the solemnity of Elijah's farewell, that he was now shortly to be removed; and, 1. They told Elisha of it, both at Beth-el, (v. 3.) and at Jericho; (v. 5.) Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day? This they said, not as upbraiding him with his loss, or expecting that when his master was gone, he would be upon the level with them, but to show how full they were of the thoughts of this matter, and big with expectation of the event, and to admonish Elisha to prepare for the loss: know we not that our nearest relations, and dearest friends, must shortly be taken from us? The Lord will take them, we lose them not till he calls for them, whose they are, and who taketh away, and none can hinder him. He takes away superiors from our head, inferiors from our feet, equals from our arms; let us therefore carefully do the duty of every relation, that we may reflect upon it with comfort, when it comes to be dissolved. Elisha knew it too well, and sorrow had filled his heart upon this account, (as it did the disciples in a like case, John 16. 6.) and therefore he did not need to be told of it, did not care for hearing of it, and would not be interrupted in his contemplations on this great concern, or, in the least, diverted from his attendance upon his master; I know it, hold ye your peace: he speaks not this peevishly, or in contempt of the sons of the prophets, but as one that was himself, and would have them, composed and sedate, and with an awful silence expecting the event; I know it, be silent, Zech. 2. 13. 2. They went themselves to be witnesses of it at a distance, though they might not closely attend; (v. 7.) Fifty of them stood to view afar off, intending to satisfy their own curiosity, but God so ordered it, that they might be eye-witnesses of the honour Heaven did to that prophet, who was despised and rejected of men. God's works are well worthy our notice; when a door is opened in heaven, the call is, Come up hither, come and see.

V. That the miraculous dividing of the river Jordan was the preface to Elijah's translation into the heavenly Canaan, as it had been to the entrance of Israel into the earthly Canaan, v. 8. He must go on the other side Jordan, to be translated, because it was his native country, and that he might be near the place where Moses died, and that thus honour might be put on that part of the country, which was most despised. He and Elisha might have gone over Jordan by a ferry, as other passengers did, but God would magnify Elijah in his exit, as he did Joshua in his entrance, by the dividing of this river, Josh. 3. 7. As Moses with his rod divided the sea, so Elijah with his mantle divided Jordan, both, the insignia—the badges of their office; these waters, of old, yielded to the ark, now, to the prophet's mantle, which, to those that wanted the ark, was an equivalent token of God's presence. When God will take up his faithful ones to heaven, death is the Jordan which, immediately before their translation, they must pass through, and they find a way through it, a safe and comfortable way; the death of Christ has divided those waters, that the ransomed of the Lord may pass over; O death, where is thy sting! thy hurt, thy terror?

9. And it came to pass, when they were gone over, that Elijah said unto Elisha, Ask what I shall do for thee, before I be taken away from thee. And Elisha said, I pray thee, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me. 10. And he said, Thou hast asked a hard thing: nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so. 11. And it came to pass, as they still went on, and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven. 12. And Elisha saw it, and he cried, My father, my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. And he saw him no more: and he took hold of his own clothes, and rent them in two pieces.

Here,

I. Elijah makes his will, and leaves Elisha his heir, now anointing him to be a prophet in his room, more than when he cast his mantle upon him, 1 Kings 19. 19.

1. Elijah, being greatly pleased with the constancy of Elisha's affection and attendance, bade him ask what he should do for him, what blessing he should leave him at parting; he does not say, (as Bishop Hall well observes,) "Ask of me when I am gone, in heaven I shall be better able to befriend thee," but, "Ask before I go." Our friends on earth may be spoken to, and can give us an answer, but we know not that we can have access to any friend in heaven but Christ, and God in him; Abraham is ignorant of us.

2. Elisha, having this fair opportunity to enrich himself with the best riches, prays for a double portion of his spirit; he asks not for wealth, or honour, or exemption from trouble, but to be qualified for the service of God and his generation; he asks, (1.) For the Spirit; not that the gifts and graces of the Spirit were in Elijah's power to give, therefore he says not, "Give me the Spirit," (he knew very well it was God's gift,) but, "Let it be upon me, intercede with God for this, for me." Christ bade his disciples ask what they would, not one, but all, and promised to send the Spirit, with much more authority and assurance than Elijah could. (2.) For his spirit; because he was to be a prophet in his room, to carry on his work, to father the sons of the prophets, and face their enemies; because he had the same difficulties to encounter, and the same perverse generation to deal with, that he had, so that if he have not his spirit, he has not strength according to the day. (3.) For a double portion of his spirit; he does not mean double to what he had, but double to what the rest of the prophets had, from whom so much would not be expected as from Elisha, who had been brought up under Elijah. It is a holy ambition to covet earnestly the best gifts, and those which will render us most serviceable to God and our brethren. Note, We all ought, both ministers and people, to set before us the examples of our predecessors, to labour after their spirit, and to be earnest with God for that grace which carried them through their work, and enabled them to finish well.

3. Elijah promises him that which he asked, but under two provisos, v. 10. (1.) Provided he put a due value upon it, and esteem it highly: this he teaches him to do, by calling it a hard thing; not too hard for God to do, but too great for him to expect. Those are best prepared for spiritual blessings, that are most sensible of their worth, and their own unworthiness to receive them. (2.) Provided he kept close to his master, even to the last, and was observant of him: If thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so, otherwise not. A diligent attendance upon his master's instructions, and a careful observance of his example, particularly now in his last scene, were the condition, and would be a proper means of obtaining much of his spirit: taking strict notice of the manner of his ascension, would likewise be of great use to him. The comforts of departing saints, and their experiences, will mightily help, both to gild our comforts, and to steel our resolutions. Or, perhaps, this was intended only as a sign; "If God favour thee so far as to give thee a sight of me when I ascend, take that for a token that he will do this for thee, and depend upon it." Christ's disciples saw him ascend, and were, thereupon, assured that they should, in a little time, be filled with his Spirit, Acts 1. 8. Elisha, we may suppose, hereupon, prayed earnestly, Lord, show me this token for good.

II. Elijah is carried up to heaven in a fiery chariot, v. 11. Like Enoch, he was translated, that he should not see death; and was (as Mr. Cowley expresses it)

"The second man that leap'd the ditch
Where all the rest of mankind fell,
And went not downward to the sky."

Many curious questions might be asked about this matter, which could not be answered. Let it suffice that we are here told,

1. What his Lord, when he came, found him doing. He was talking with Elisha, instructing and encouraging him, directing him in his work, and quickening him to it, for the good of those whom he left behind. He was not meditating or praying, as one wholly taken up with the world he was going to, but engaged in edifying discourse, as one concerned about the kingdom of God among men. We mistake, if we think our preparation for heaven is carried on only by contemplation, and the acts of devotion. Usefulness to others will pass as well in our account as any thing. Thinking of divine things is good, but talking of them (if it come from the heart) is better, because for edification, 1 Cor. 14. 4. Christ ascended as he was blessing his disciples.

2. What convoy his Lord sent for him; a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, which appeared either descending upon them from the clouds, or (as Bishop Patrick thinks) running toward them upon the ground: in this form the angels appeared. The souls of all the faithful are carried by an invisible guard of angels into the bosom of Abraham; but Elijah being to carry his body with him, this heavenly guard was visible, not in a human shape, as usual, though they might so have borne him up in their arms, or carried him as on eagles' wings, but that had been to carry him like a child, like a lamb; (Isa. 40. 11, 31.) they appear in the form of a chariot and horses, that he may ride in state, may ride in triumph, like a prince, like a conqueror, yea, more than a conqueror; the angels are called, in scripture, Cherubim and Seraphim, and their appearance here, though it may seem below their dignity, answers to both those names; for, (1.) Seraphim signifies fiery, and God is said to make them a flame of fire, Ps. 104. 4. (2.) Cherubim (as many think) signifies chariots, and they are called the chariots of God, Ps. 68. 17. And he is said to ride upon a cherub, (Ps. 18. 10.) to which perhaps there is an allusion in Ezekiel's vision of four living creatures, and wheels, like horses and chariots; in Zechariah's vision they are so represented, Zech. 1. 8.—6. 1. Compare Rev. 6. 2, &c. See the readiness of the angels to do the will of God, even in the meanest services, for the good of them that shall be heirs of salvation. Elijah must remove to the world of angels, and therefore, to show how desirous they were of his company, some of them would come to fetch him; the chariot and horses appeared like fire, not for burning, but brightness, not to torture or consume him, but to render his ascension conspicuous and illustrious in the eyes of those that stood afar off to view it. Elijah had burned with holy zeal for God and his honour, and now with a heavenly fire he was refined and translated.

3. How he was separated from Elisha; this chariot parted them both asunder. Note, The dearest friends must part; Elisha had protested he would not leave him, yet now is left behind by him.

4. Whither he was carried; he went up by a whirlwind into heaven; the fire tends upward, the whirlwind helped to carry him through the atmosphere, out of the reach of the magnetic virtue of this earth, and then how swiftly he ascended through the pure ether to the world of holy and blessed spirits, we cannot conceive.

"But where he stopt, will ne'er be known,
Till phoenix-nature, aged grown,
To a better being shall aspire,
Mounting herself, like him, to eternity in fire."—COWLEY.

Elijah had once, in a passion, wished he might die; yet God was so gracious to him, as not only not to take him at his word then, but to honour him with this singular privilege, that he should never see death; and by this instance, and that of Enoch, (1.) God showed how men should have left the world, if they had not sinned, not by death, but by a translation. (2.) He gave a glimpse of that life and immortality which are brought to light by the gospel, of the glory reserved for the bodies of the saints, and the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers, as then to Elijah; it was also a figure of Christ's ascension.

III. Elisha pathetically laments the loss of that great prophet, but attends him with an encomium, v. 12. 1. He saw it; thus he received the sign by which he was assured of the grant of his request for a double portion of Elijah's spirit; he looked steadfastly toward heaven, whence he was to expect that gift, as the disciples did, Acts 1. 10. He saw it a while, but the vision was presently out of his sight; and he saw him no more. 2. He rent his own clothes, in token of the sense he had of his own and the public loss; though Elijah was gone triumphantly to heaven, yet this world could ill spare him, and therefore his removal ought to be much regretted by the survivors. Surely their hearts are hard, whose eyes are dry, when God, by taking away faithful useful men, calls for weeping and mourning. Though Elijah's departure made way for Elisha's eminency, especially since he was now sure of a double portion of his spirit, yet he lamented the loss of him, for he loved him, and could have served him for ever. 3. He gave him a very honourable character, as the reason why he thus lamented the loss of him. (1.) He himself had lost the guide of his youth; My father, my father! he saw his own condition like that of a fatherless child thrown upon the world, and laments it accordingly. Christ, when he left his disciples, did not leave them orphans, (John 14. 15.) but Elijah must. (2.) The public had lost its best guard; he was the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. He would have brought them all to heaven, as in this chariot, if it had not been their own fault; they used not chariots and horses in their wars, but Elijah was to them, by his counsels, reproofs, and prayers, better than the strongest force of chariot and horse, and kept off the judgments of God; his departure was like the routing of an army, an irreparable loss. Better have lost all our men of war than this man of God.

13. He took up also the mantle of Elijah that fell from him, and went back, and stood by the bank of Jordan; 14. And he took the mantle of Elijah that fell from him, and smote the waters, and said, Where is the LORD God of Elijah? And when he also had smitten the waters, they parted hither and thither: and Elisha went over. 15. And when the sons of the prophets, which were to view at Jericho, saw him, they said, The spirit of Elijah doth rest upon Elisha. And they came to meet him, and bowed themselves to the ground before him: 16. And they said unto him, Behold now, there be with thy servants fifty strong men; let them go, we pray thee, and seek thy master; lest peradventure the Spirit of the LORD hath taken him up, and cast him upon some mountain, or into some valley. And he said, Ye shall not send. 17. And when they urged him till he was ashamed, he said, Send. They sent, therefore, fifty men; and they sought three days, but found him not. 18. And when they came again to him, (for he tarried at Jericho,) he said unto them, Did I not say unto you, Go not?

We have here an account of what followed immediately after the rapture of Elijah.

I. The tokens of God's presence with Elisha, and the marks of his elevation into Elijah's room, to be, as he had been, a father to the sons of the prophets, and the chariot and horsemen of Israel.

1. He was possessed of Elijah's mantle, the badge of his office, which, we may suppose, he put on, and wore, for his master's sake, v. 13. When Elijah went to heaven, though he did not let fall his body as others do, he let fall his mantle instead of it; for he was unclothed, that he might be clothed upon with immortality: he was going to a world where he needed not the mantle, either to adorn him, or to shelter him from weather, or to wrap his face in, as 1 Kings 19. 13. He left his mantle as a legacy to Elisha, and though in itself it was of small value, yet as it was a token of the descent of the Spirit upon him, it was more than if he had bequeathed to him thousands of gold and silver. Elisha took it up, not as a sacred relic to be worshipped, but as a significant garment to be worn, and a recompense to him for his own garments which he had rent; he loved this cloak ever since it was first cast over him, 1 Kings 19. 19. He that then so cheerfully obeyed the summons of it, and became Elijah's servant, is now dignified with it, and becomes his successor. There are remains of great and good men, which, like this mantle, ought to be gathered up and preserved by the survivors, their sayings, their writings, their examples, that as their works follow them in the reward of them, they may stay behind in the benefit of them.

2. He was possessed of Elijah's power to divide Jordan, v. 14. Having parted with his father, he returns to his sons in the schools of the prophets; Jordan was between him and them, it had been divided to make way for Elijah to his glory, he will try whether it will divide to make way for him to his business, and by that he will know that God is with him, and that he has the double portion of Elijah's spirit; Elijah's last miracle shall be Elisha's first; thus he begins where he left off, and there is no vacancy. In dividing the waters, (1.) He made use of Elijah's mantle, as Elijah himself had done, (v. 8.) to signify that he designed to keep to his master's methods, and would not introduce any thing new, as those affect to do, that think themselves wiser than their predecessors. (2.) He applied himself to Elijah's God, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? He does not ask, "Where is Elijah?" either as poring upon the loss of him, as if he could not be easy now that he was gone, or as doubting of his happy state, as if, like the sons of the prophets here, he knew not what was become of him, or as curiously inquiring concerning him, and the particulars of that state he was removed to; no, that is a hidden life, it does not yet appear what we shall be: nor as expecting help from him; no, Elijah is happy, but is neither omniscient, nor omnipotent: but he asks, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Now that Elijah was taken to heaven, God had abundantly proved himself the God of Elijah; if he had not prepared for him that city, and done better for him there than ever he did for him in this world, he would have been ashamed to be called his God, Heb. 11. 16. Matth. 27. 31, 32. Now that Elijah was taken to heaven, Elisha inquired, [1.] After God; when our creature-comforts are removed, we have a God to go to, that lives for ever. [2.] After the God of Elijah, the God that Elijah served, and honoured, and pleaded for, and adhered to, when all Israel had deserted him. This honour is done to those who cleave to God in times of general apostasy, that God will be, in a peculiar manner, their God. "The God that owned, and protected, and provided for, Elijah, and, many ways, honoured him, especially now at last; where is he? Lord, am not I promised Elijah's spirit? Make good that promise." The words which next follow in the original, Aph-his—even he, which we join to the following clause, when he also had smitten the waters, some make an answer to this question, Where is Elijah's God? Etiam ille adhuc superest—"He is in being still, and nigh at hand; we have lost Elijah, but we have not lost Elijah's God; he has not forsaken the earth, it is even he that is still with me." Note, First, It is the duty and interest of the saints on earth to inquire after God, and apply themselves to him as the Lord God of the saints that are gone before to heaven, the God of our fathers. Secondly, It is very comfortable to those who inquire after God, that they know where to find him; it is even he that is in his holy temple, (Ps. 11. 4.) and nigh to all who call upon him, Ps. 145. 18. Thirdly, Those that walk in the spirit and steps of their godly faithful predecessors, shall certainly experience the same grace that they experienced; Elijah's God will be Elisha's too; the Lord God of the holy prophets is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; and what will it avail us to have the mantles of those that are gone, their places, their books, if we have not their spirit, their God?

3. He was possessed of Elijah's interest in the sons of the prophets, v. 15. Some of the fellows of the college at Jericho, who had placed themselves conveniently near Jordan, to see what passed, were surprised to see Jordan divided before Elisha in his return, and took that as a convincing evidence that the spirit of Elijah did rest upon him, and that therefore they ought to pay the same respect and deference to him, that they had done to Elijah. Accordingly, they went to meet him, to congratulate him on his safe passage through fire and water, and the honour God had put upon him; and they bowed themselves to the ground before him: they were trained up in the schools, Elisha was taken from the plough, yet, when they perceive that God is with him, and that this is the man whom he delights to honour, they readily submit to him, as their head and father, as the people to Joshua, when Moses was dead, Josh. 1. 17. Those that appear to have God's Spirit and presence with them, ought to have our esteem and best affections, notwithstanding the meanness of their extraction and education. Whomsoever God honours, we must. This ready submission of the sons of the prophets, no doubt, was a great encouragement to Elisha, and helped to clear his call.

II. The needless search which the sons of the prophets made for Elijah. 1. They suggested it possible that he was dropt, either alive or dead, upon some mountain, or in some valley; and it would be a satisfaction to them, if they sent some strong men, whom they had at command, in quest of him, v. 16. Some of them perhaps started this as a demurrer to the choice of Elisha; "Let us first be sure that Elijah is quite gone. Can we think Elijah thus neglected by heaven, that chosen vessel thus cast away as a vessel in which was no pleasure?" 2. Elisha consented not to their motion, till they overcame him with importunity, v. 17. They urged him till he was ashamed to oppose it any further, lest he should be thought wanting in his respect to his old master, or loath to resign the mantle again. Wise men may yield to that, for the sake of peace, and the good opinions of others, which yet their judgment is against, as needless and fruitless. 3. The issue made them as much ashamed of their proposal, as they, by their importunity, had made Elisha ashamed of opposing it. Their messengers, after they had tired themselves with fruitless search, returned with a non est inventus—he is not to be found, and gave Elisha an opportunity of upbraiding his friends with their folly; Did I not say unto you, Go not? v. 18. This would make them the more willing to acquiesce in his judgment another time. Traversing hills and valleys, will never bring us to Elijah, but the imitation of his holy faith and zeal will, in due time.

19. And the men of the city said unto Elisha, Behold, I pray thee, the situation of this city is pleasant, as my lord seeth: but the water is naught, and the ground barren. 20. And he said, Bring me a new cruse, and put salt therein. And they brought it to him. 21. And he went forth unto the spring of the waters, and cast the salt in there, and said, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed

these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death or barren land. 22. So the waters were healed unto this day, according to the saying of Elisha which he spake. 23. And he went up from thence unto Beth-el: and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald-head; go up, thou bald-head. 24. And he turned back, and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the LORD. And there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them. 25. And he went from thence to mount Carmel; and from thence he returned to Samaria.

Elisha had, in this respect, a double portion of Elijah's spirit, that he wrought more miracles than he did. Some reckon them in number just double. Two are recorded in these verses—a miracle of mercy to Jericho, and a miracle of judgment to Beth-el, Ps. 101. 1.

I. Here is a blessing upon the waters of Jericho, which was effectual to heal them. Jericho was built in disobedience to a command, in defiance to a threatening, and at the expense of the lives of all the builders' children; yet, when it was built, it was not ordered to be demolished again, nor were God's prophets or people forbidden to dwell in it, but even within those walls that were built by iniquity, we find a nursery of piety. Fools, they say, build houses for wise men to dwell in. Here the wealth of the sinner provided a habitation for the just. We find Christ at Jericho, Luke 19. 1. Hither Elisha came, to confirm the souls of the disciples with a more particular account of Elijah's translation than their spies could give them, who saw it at a distance. Here he staid while the fifty men were searching for him.

And, 1. The men of Jericho represented to him their grievance, v. 19. God's faithful prophets love to be employed; it is wisdom to make use of them, the little while that their light is with us. They had not applied themselves to Elijah concerning the matter, perhaps because he was not so easy of access as Elisha was; but now, we may hope, by the influence of the divinity-school in their city, they were reformed. The situation was pleasant, and afforded a good prospect; but they had neither wholesome water to drink, nor fruitful soil to yield them food; and what pleasure could they take then in their prospect? Water is a common mercy, which we should estimate by the greatness of the calamity which the want or unwholesomeness of it would be. Some think that it was not all the ground about Jericho, that was barren, and had bad water, but some one part only, and that where the sons of the prophets had their lodgings, who are here called the men of the city.

2. He soon redressed their grievance. Prophets should endeavour to make every place they come to, some way or other, the better for them, endeavouring to sweeten bitter spirits, and to make barren souls fruitful, by the due application of the word of God. Elisha will heal their waters; but, (1.) They must furnish him with salt in a new cruse, v. 20. If salt had been proper to season the water, yet what could so small a quantity do towards it, and what the better for being in a new cruse? But thus they that would be helped, must be employed, and their faith and obedience tried. God's works of grace are wrought, not by any operations of our's, but in our observance of his institutions. (2.) He cast the salt into the spring of the waters, and so healed the streams, and the ground they watered. Thus the way to reform men's lives, is, to renew their hearts; let those be seasoned with the salt of grace, for out of them are the issues of life. Make the tree good, and the fruit will be good. Purify the heart, and that will cleanse the hands. (3.) He did not pretend to do this by his own power, but in God's name; Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters. He is but the instrument, the channel through which God is pleased to convey this healing virtue. By doing them this kindness with a Thus saith the Lord, they would be made the more willing, hereafter, to receive from him a reproof, admonition, or command, with the same preface. If, in God's name, he can help them, in God's name, let him teach and rule them. Thus saith the Lord, out of Elisha's mouth, must, ever after, be of mighty force with them. (4.) The cure was lasting, and not for the present only. The waters were healed unto this day, v. 22. What God doeth, it shall be for ever, Eccl. 3. 14. When he, by his Spirit, heals a soul, there shall be no more death nor barrenness; the property is altered; what was useless and offensive, becomes grateful and serviceable.

II. Here is a curse upon the children of Beth-el, which was effectual to destroy them; for it was not a curse causeless. At Beth-el there was another school of prophets, thither Elisha goes next, in this his primary visitation; the scholars there, no doubt, welcomed him with all possible respect, but the townsmen were abusive to him. One of Jeroboam's calves was at Beth-el; this they were proud of, and fond of, and hated them that reproved them. The law did not empower them to suppress this pious academy, but we may suppose it was their usual practice to jeer the prophets as they went along the streets, to call them by some nickname or other, that they might expose them to contempt, prejudice their youth against them, and, if possible, drive them out of their town. Had the abuse done to Elisha, been the first offence of that kind, it is probable that it would not have been so severely punished. But mocking the messengers of the Lord, and misusing the prophets, was one of the crying sins of Israel, as we find, 2 Chron. 36. 16. Now here we have,

1. An instance of that sin. The little children of Beth-el (the boys and girls that were playing in the streets, notice, it is likely, being come to the town of his approach) went out to meet him, not with their hosannas, as they ought to have done, but with their scoffs; they gathered about him, and mocked him, as if he had been a fool, or one fit to make sport with: among other things that they used to jeer the prophets with, they had this particular taunt for him, Go up, thou bald-head; Go up, thou bald-head. It is a wicked thing to reproach any for their natural infirmities or deformities; it is adding affliction to the afflicted; and if they are as God made them, the reproach reflects upon him. But this was such a thing as scarcely deserved to be called a blemish, and would never have been turned to his reproach, if they had had any thing else to reproach him with. It was his character, as a prophet, that they designed to abuse. The honour God had crowned him with, should have been sufficient to cover his bald head, and protect him from their scoffs. They bade him go up, perhaps reflecting on the assumption of Elijah: "Thy master," they say, "is gone up; why dost not thou go up after him? Where is the fiery chariot? When shall we be rid of thee too?" These children said as they were taught; they had learned of their idolatrous parents to call foul names, and give bad language, especially to prophets. Perhaps their parents, did, at the same time, send them out, and set them on, that, if possible, they might keep the prophet out of their town.

2. A specimen of that ruin which came upon Israel; at last, for misusing God's prophets, and of which this was intended to give them fair warning. Elisha heard their taunts, a good while, with patience; but, at length, the fire of holy zeal for God was kindled in his breast by the continued provocation, and he turned and looked upon them, to try if a grave and severe look would put them out of countenance, and oblige them to retire; to see if he could discern in their faces any marks of ingenuousness: but they were not ashamed, neither could they blush; and therefore he cursed them in the name of the Lord, both imprecated and denounced the following judgment, not in personal revenge for the indignity done to himself, but as the mouth of divine justice to punish the dishonour done to God. His summons was immediately obeyed; two she-bears (bears perhaps robbed of their whelps) came out of an adjacent wood, and presently killed 42 children, v. 24. Now in this, (1.) The prophet must be justified, for he did it by divine impulse. Had the curse come from any bad principle, God would not have said, Amen, to it. We may think it had been better to have called for two rods for the correction of these children, than two bears for the destruction of them. But Elisha knew, by the Spirit, the bad character of these children, what a generation of vipers they were; and what mischievous enemies they would be to God's prophets, if they should live to be men, who began so early to be abusive to them. He intended hereby to punish the parents, and to make them afraid of God's judgments. (2.) God must be glorified, as a righteous God that hates sin, and will reckon for it, even in little children. Let the hideous shrieks and groans of this wicked wretched brood make our flesh tremble for fear of God. Let little children be afraid of speaking wicked words, for God notices what they say. Let them not mock at any for their defects in mind or body, but pity them rather; especially let them know that it is at their peril, if they jeer God's people or ministers, and scoff at any for well-doing. Let parents that would have comfort in their children, train them up well, and do their utmost betimes to drive out the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts; for, (as Bishop Hall says,) "In vain do we look for good of those children whose education we have neglected; and in vain do we grieve for those miscarriages which our care might have prevented."

Elisha comes to Beth-el, and fears not the revenges of the bereaved parents; God, who bade him do what he did, he knew would bear him out. Thence he goes to mount Carmel, (v. 25.) where, it is probable, there was a religious house fit for retirement and contemplation. Thence he returned to Samaria, where, being a public place, this father of the prophets might be most serviceable. Bishop Hall observes here, "That he can never be a profitable seer, who is either always or never alone."

CHAP. III.

We are now called to attend the public affairs of Israel, in which we shall find Elisha concerned. Here is, I. The general character of Jehoram king of Israel, v. 1. 3. II. A war with Moab, in which Jehoram and his allies were engaged, v. 4. 8. III. The straits which the confederate army was reduced to in their expedition against Moab, and their consulting of Elisha in that distress, with the answer of peace he gave them, v. 9. 19. IV. The glorious issue of this campaign, (v. 20. 25.) and the barbarous method the king of Moab took, to oblige the confederate army to retire, v. 26, 27. The house of Ahab is doomed to destruction; and though in this chapter we have both its character and its condition better than before, yet the threatened ruin is not far off.

I. NOW Jehoram the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and reigned twelve years. 2. And he wrought evil in the sight of the LORD; but not like his father, and like his mother; for he put away the image of Baal that his father had made. 3. Nevertheless he cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, which made Israel to sin; he departed not therefrom. 4. And Mesha king of Moab was a sheep-master, and rendered unto the king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs, and a hundred thousand rams, with the wool. 5. But it came to pass, when Ahab was dead, that the king of Moab rebelled against the king of Israel.

Jehoram, the son of Ahab, and brother of Ahaziah, is here upon the throne of Israel; and though he was but a bad man, yet two things are here recorded of him.

1. That he removed his father's idols. He did evil in many things, but not like his father Ahab, or his mother Jezebel, v. 2. Bad he was, but not so bad, so overmuch wicked, as Solomon speaks, Eccl. 7. 17. Perhaps Jehoshaphat, though by his alliance with the house of Ahab he made his own family worse, did something toward making Ahab's better. Jehoram saw his father and brother cut off for worshipping Baal, and wisely took warning by God's judgments on them, and put away the image of Baal, resolving to worship the God of Israel only, and consult none but his prophets. So far was well, yet it did not prevent the destruction of Ahab's family, nay, that destruction came in his days, and fell immediately upon him, (ch. 9. 24.) though he was one of the best of the family, for then the measure of its iniquity was full. Jehoram's reformation was next to none: for, (1.) He only put away the image of Baal which his father had made, and this, probably, in compliment to Jehoshaphat, who otherwise would not have come into confederacy with him, any more than with his brother, 1 Kings 22. 49. But he did not destroy the worship of Baal among the people, for Jehu found it prevalent, ch. 10. 19. It was well to reform his family, but it was not enough; he ought to have used his power for the reforming of his kingdom. (2.) When he put away the image of Baal, he maintained the worship of the calves, that politic sin of Jeroboam, v. 3. He departed not therefrom, because that was the state engine by which the division between the two tribes was supported. Those do not truly nor acceptably repent or reform, who only part with the sins that they lose by, but continue their affection to the sins that they get by. (3.) He only put away the image of Baal, he did not break it in pieces, as he ought to have done. He laid it aside for the present, yet not knowing but he might have occasion for it another time; and Jezebel, for reasons of state, was content to worship her Baal in private.

2. That he did what he could, to recover his brother's losses. As he had something more of the religion of an Israelite than his father, so he had something more of the spirit of a king than his brother. Moab rebelled against Israel immediately upon the death of his father, ch. 1. 1. And we do not find that Ahaziah made any attempt to chastise or reduce them, but tamely let go his interest in them rather than entertain the cares, undergo the fatigues, and run the hazards, of a war with them. His folly and pusillanimity, herein, and his indifference to the public good, were the more aggravated, because the tribute which the king of Moab paid was a very considerable branch of the revenue of the crown of Israel. A hundred thousand lambs, and a hundred thousand rams, v. 4. The riches of kings then lay more in cattle than coin, and they thought it not below them to know the state of their flocks and herds themselves, because, as Solomon observes, the crown doth not endure to every generation, Prov. 27. 23, 24. Taxes were then paid, not so much in money, as in the commodities of the country, which was an ease to the subject, whether it were an advantage to the prince or no. The revolt of Moab was a great loss to Israel, yet Ahaziah sat still in sloth and ease. But an upper chamber in his house proved as fatal to him, as the high places of the field could have been; (ch. 1. 2.) and the breaking of his lattice let into his throne a man of a more active genius, that will not lose the dominion of Moab, without making, at least, one push for its preservation.

6. And king Jehoram went out of Samaria the same time, and numbered all Israel. 7. And he went and sent to Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, saying, The king of Moab hath rebelled against me: wilt thou go with me against Moab to battle? And he said, I will go up: I am as thou art, my people as thy people, and my horses as thy horses. 8. And he said, Which way shall we go up? And he answered, The way through the wilderness of Edom. 9. So the king of Israel went, and the king of Judah, and the king of Edom: and they fetched a compass of seven days' journey: and there was no water for the host, and for the cattle that followed them. 10. And the king of Israel said, Alas! that the LORD hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab! 11. But Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the LORD, that we may inquire of the LORD by him? And one of the king of Israel's servants answered and said, Here is Elisha the son of Shaphat, which poured water on the hands of Elijah. 12. And Jehoshaphat said, The word of the LORD is with him. So the king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat, and the king of Edom, went down to him. 13. And Elisha said unto the king of Israel, What have I to do with thee? get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother. And the king of Israel said unto him, Nay: for the LORD hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab. 14. And Elisha said, As the LORD of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, surely, were it not that I regarded the presence of Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, I would not look toward thee, nor see thee. 15. But now bring me a minstrel. And it came to pass, when the minstrel played, that the hand of the LORD came upon him. 16. And he said, Thus saith the LORD, Make this valley full of ditches: 17. For thus saith the LORD, Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet that valley shall be filled with water, that ye may drink, both ye, and your cattle, and your beasts. 18. And this is but a light thing in the sight of the LORD: he will deliver the Moabites also into your hand. 19. And ye shall smite every fenced city, and every choice city, and shall fell every good tree, and stop all wells of water, and mar every good piece of land with stones.

Jehoram has no sooner got the sceptre into his hand, than he takes the sword into his hand, to reduce Moab. Crowns bring such cares and perils to the heads that wear them; no sooner in honour than in war. Now here we have,

I. The concerting of this expedition between Jehoram king of Israel and Jehoshaphat king of Judah. Jehoram levied an army, (v. 6.) and such an opinion he had of the godly king of Judah, that, 1. He courted him to be his confederate: Wilt thou go with me against Moab? And he gained him. Jehoshaphat said, I will go up, I am as thou art, v. 7. Judah and Israel, though unhappily divided from each other, yet can unite against Moab a common enemy. Jehoshaphat upbraids them not with their revolt from the house of David, nor makes it an article of their alliance, that they should return to their allegiance, though he had good reason to insist upon it, but treats with Israel as a sister-kingdom. Those are no friends to their own peace and strength, who can never find in their hearts to forgive and forget an old injury, and unite with those that have formerly broken in upon their rights.—Quod initio non valuit, tractu temporis invalescit—That which was originally destitute of authority, in the progress of time, acquires it. 2. He consulted him as his confidant, v. 8. He took advice of Jehoshaphat, who had more wisdom and experience than himself, which way they should make their descent upon the country of Moab; and he advised that they should not march against them the nearest way, over Jordan, but go round through the wilderness of Edom, that they might take the king of Edom (who was tributary to him) and his forces along with them: if two be better than one, much more will not a threefold cord be easily broken. Jehoshaphat had like to have paid dear for his joining with Ahab, yet he joins with his son, and this expedition also had like to have been fatal to him. There is nothing got by being yoked with unbelievers.

II. The great straits that the army of the confederates was reduced to in this expedition. Before they saw the face of an enemy, they were all in danger of perishing for want of water, v. 9. This ought to have been considered before they ventured a march through the wilderness, the same wilderness, (or very near it,) where their ancestors wanted water, Numb. 20. 2. God suffers his people, by their own providence, to bring themselves into distress, that the wisdom, power, and goodness, of his providence may be glorified in their relief. What is more cheap and common, than water? It is drink to every beast of the field; (Ps. 104. 11.) yet the want of it will soon humble and ruin kings and armies. The king of Israel sadly laments the present distress, and the imminent danger it put them in, of falling into the hands of their enemies the Moabites, to whom, when weakened by thirst, they would be an easy prey, v. 10. It was he that had called these kings together, yet he charges it upon Providence, and reflects upon that as unkind,

The Lord has called them together. Thus the foolishness of man perverteth his way, and then his heart fretteth against the Lord, Prov. 19. 3.

III. Jehoshaphat's good motion to ask counsel of God in this exigence, v. 11. The place they were now in, could not but remind them of the wonders which their fathers told them of, the waters fetched out of the rock for Israel's seasonable supply. The thought of this, we may suppose, encouraged Jehoshaphat to ask, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord, like unto Moses? He was the more concerned, because it was by his advice that they fetched this compass through the wilderness, v. 8. It was well that Jehoshaphat inquired of the Lord now, but it had been much better, if he had done it sooner, before he engaged in this war, or steered this course; so the distress might have been prevented. Good men are sometimes remiss and forgetful, and neglect their duty, till necessity and affliction drive them to it.

IV. Elisha recommended as a proper person for them to consult with, v. 11. And here we may wonder, 1. That Elisha should follow the camp, especially in such a tedious march as this, as a volunteer, unasked, unobserved, and in no post of honour at all; not in the office of priest of the war, (Deut. 20. 2.) or president of the council of war, but in such obscurity, that none of the kings knew they had such a jewel in the treasures of their camp, nor so good a friend in their retinue. We may suppose it was by special direction from heaven, that Elisha attended the war, as the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. Thus does God go before his people with the blessings of his goodness, and provide his oracles for those that provide them not for themselves. It would often be bad with us, if God did not take more care of us, both for soul and body, than we for ourselves. 2. That a servant of the king of Israel knew of his being there, when the king himself did not. Probably, it was such a servant as Obadiah was to his father Ahab, one that feared the Lord; to such a one Elisha made himself known, not to the kings. The account he gives of him, is, that it was he that poured water on the hands of Elijah, that is, he was his servant, and, particularly, attended him when he washed his hands. He that will be great, let him learn to minister: he that will rise high, let him begin low.

V. The application which the kings made to Elisha. They went down to him to his quarters, v. 12. Jehoshaphat had such an esteem for a prophet with whom the word of the Lord was, that he would condescend to visit him in his own person, and not send for him up to him. The other two were moved by the straits they were in, to make their court to the prophet. He that humbled himself, was thus exalted, and looked great, when three kings came to knock at his door, and beg his assistance; see Rev. 3. 9.

VI. The entertainment which Elisha gave them.

1. He was very plain with the wicked king of Israel; (v. 13.) "What have I to do with thee? How canst thou expect an answer of peace from me? Get thee to the prophets of thy father and mother, whom thou hast countenanced and maintained in thy prosperity, and let them help thee now in thy distress." Elisha was not imposed upon, as Jehoshaphat was, by his partial and hypocritical reformation; he knew that though he had put away the image of Baal, Baal's prophets were still dear to him, and perhaps some of them were now in his camp. Go, said he, go to them. Get you to the gods whom ye have served, Judg. 10. 14. The world and the flesh have ruled you, let them help you; why should God be inquired of by you? Ezek. 14. 3. Elisha tells him to his face, in a holy indignation at his wickedness, that he could scarcely find in his heart to look toward him, or to see him, v. 14. Jehoram is to be respected as a prince, but as a wicked man, he is a vile person, and is to be contemned, Ps. 15. 4. Elisha, as a subject, will honour him, but, as a prophet, he will make him to know his iniquity. For them that had such an extraordinary commission, it was fit (though not for a common person) to say to a king, Thou art wicked, Job 34. 18. Jehoram has so much self-command as to take it patiently; he cares not now for hearing of the prophets of Baal; but is a humble suitor to the God of Israel and his prophet, representing the present case as very deplorable, and humbly recommends it to the prophet's compassionate consideration. In effect, he owns himself unworthy, but let not the other kings be ruined for his sake.

2. He showed a great respect to the godly king of Judah, regarded his presence, and, for his sake, would inquire of the Lord for them all. It is good being with those that have God's favour, and his prophet's love. Wicked people often fare the better for the friendship and society of those that are godly.

3. He composed himself to receive instructions from God: his mind was somewhat ruffled and disturbed at the sight of Jehoram; though he was not put into a sinful heat or passion, nor had spoken unadvisedly, yet his zeal, for the present, indisposed him for prayer and the operations of the Spirit, which require a mind very calm and sedate. He therefore called for a musician, (v. 15.) a devout musician, one accustomed to play upon his harp, and sing psalms to it. To hear God's praises sweetly sung, as David had appointed, would cheer his spirits, and settle his mind, and help to put him into a right frame, both to speak to him, and to hear from him. We find a company of prophets prophesying with a psaltery and a tabret before them, 1 Sam. 10. 5. Those that desire communion with God, must keep their spirits quiet and serene. Elisha being refreshed, and having the tumult of his spirits laid by this divine music, the hand of the Lord came upon him, and his visit did him more honour than that of three kings.

4. God, by him, gave them assurance that the issue of the present distress would be comfortable and glorious.

(1.) They should speedily be supplied with water, v. 16, 17. To try their faith and obedience, he bids them make the valley full of ditches to receive the water. They that expect God's blessings, must prepare room for them, dig the pools for the rain to fill, as they did in the valley of Baca, and so made even that a well, Ps. 84. 6. To raise their wonder, he tells them they should have water enough, and yet there should be neither wind nor rain. Elijah, by prayer, obtained water out of the clouds, but Elisha fetches it nobody knows whence. The spring of these waters shall be as secret as the head of the Nile. God is not tied to second causes. Ordinarily, it is by a plentiful rain, that God confirms his inheritance, (Ps. 68. 9.) but here it is done without rain, at least, without rain in that place. Some of the fountains of the great deep, it is likely, were broken up on this occasion; and, to increase the miracle, that valley only (as it should seem) was filled with water, and no other place had any share of it.

(2.) That supply should be an earnest of victory, v. 18. "This is but a light thing in the sight of the Lord; you shall not only be saved from perishing, but shall return in triumph." As God gives freely to the unworthy, so he gives richly, like himself, more than we are able to ask or think. His grants outdo our requests and expectations. They that sovereignly seek for the dew of God's grace, shall have it, and by it be made more than conquerors. It is promised that they should be masters of the rebellious country, and they are permitted to lay it waste and ruin it, v. 19. The law forbade them to fell fruit-trees to be employed in their sieges, (Deut. 20. 19.) but not when it was intended, in justice, for the starving of a country that had forfeited its fruits, by denying tribute to whom tribute is due.

20. And it came to pass in the morning, when the meat-offering was offered, that, behold, there came water by the way of Edom; and the country was filled with water. 21. And when all the Moabites heard that the kings were come up to fight against them, they gathered all that were able to put on armour, and upward, and stood in the border. 22. And they rose up early in the morning, and the sun shone upon the water, and the Moabites saw the water on the other side as red as blood: 23. And they said, This is blood: the kings are surely slain, and they have smitten one another: now therefore, Moab, to the spoil. 24. And when they came to the camp of Israel, the Israelites rose up and smote the Moabites, so that they fled before them: but they went forward smiting the Moabites, even in their country. 25. And they beat down the cities, and on every good piece of land cast every man his stone, and filled it; and they stopped all the wells of water, and felled all the good trees: only in Kir-haraseth left they the stones thereof; howbeit, the singers went about it, and smote it. 26. And when the king of Moab saw that the battle was too sore for him, he took with him seven hundred men that drew swords, to break through even unto the king of Edom: but they could not. 27. Then he took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. And there was great indignation against Israel: And they departed from him, and returned to their own land.

We have here the divine gift of both those things which God had promised by Elisha; water and victory; and the former not only a pledge of the latter, but a means of it. God, who created, and commands, all the waters both above and beneath the firmament, sent them an abundance of water on a sudden, which did them double service.

I. It relieved their armies, which were ready to perish, v. 20. And, which was very observable, this relief came just at the time of the offering of the morning-sacrifice upon the altar at Jerusalem, a certain time, and universally known; that time Elisha chose for his hour of prayer, (it is likely looking toward the temple, for so they were to do in their prayers, when they were going out to battle, and encamped at a distance, 1 Kings 8. 44.) in token of his communion with the temple-service, and his expectation of success, by virtue of the great Sacrifice. We now cannot pitch upon any hour more acceptable than another, because our High Priest is always appearing for us, to present and plead his sacrifice. That time God chose for the hour of mercy, to put an honour upon the daily sacrifice which had been despised. God answered Daniel's prayer just at the time of the evening-sacrifice, (Dan. 9. 21.) for he will glorify his own institutions.

II. It deceived their enemies, who were ready to triumph, into their destruction. Notice is brought to the Moabites of the advances of the confederate army; to oppose which, all that were able to put on armour, were raised, and posted upon the frontiers, where they are ready to give them a warm reception, (v. 21.) promising themselves, that it would be easy dealing with an army fatigued by so long a march through the wilderness of Edom. But see here,

1. How easily they were drawn into their own delusions; observe the steps of their self-deceit. (1.) They saw the water in the valley where the army of Israel encamped, and concited it was blood, (v. 22.) because they knew it was a dry valley, and (there having been no rain) could not imagine it should be water. The sun shone upon it, and, probably, the sky was red and lowering, a presage of foul weather that day, (Matth. 16. 3.) and so it proved to them. But this making the water look red, their own fancies, which made them willing to believe what made for them, suggested, This is blood; God permitting them thus to impose upon themselves. (2.) If their camp was thus full of blood, they conclude, "Certainly the kings have fallen out, (as confederates of different interests are apt to do,) and they have slain one another, (v. 23.) for what else should slay them?" And, (3.) "If the armies have slain one another, we have nothing to do but to divide the prey. Now therefore, Moab, to the spoil." These were the gradual suggestions of some sanguine spirits among them, that thought themselves wiser and happier in their conjectures than their neighbours; and the rest, being desirous it should be so, were forward to believe it was so. Quod volumus facile credimus—What we wish, we readily believe. Thus they that are to be destroyed, are first deceived, (Rev. 20. 8.) and none are so effectually deceived as those that deceive themselves.

2. How fatally they thereby ran upon their own destruction. They rushed carelessly into the camp of Israel, to plunder it, but were undeceived, when it was too late. The Israelites, animated by the assurances Elisha had given them of victory, fell upon them with the utmost fury, routed them, and pursued them into their own country, (v. 24.) which they laid waste; (v. 25.) destroyed the cities, marred the ground, stopped up the wells, felled the timber, and left only the royal city standing; in the walls of which they made great breaches with their battering engines. Thus they got by rebelling against Israel. Who ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered?

In the close of the chapter, we are told what the king of Moab did, when he found himself reduced to the last extremity by the besiegers, and that his capital city was likely to fall into their hands.

(1.) He attempted that which was bold and brave. He got together 700 choice men, and with them sallied out upon the intrenchments of the king of Edom, who, being but a mercenary in this expedition, would not, he hoped, make any great resistance if he were vigorously attacked, and so he might make his escape that way. But it would not do; even the king of Edom proved too hard for him, and obliged him to retire, v. 26.

(2.) This failing, he did that which was brutish and barbarous; he took his own son, his eldest son, that was to succeed him, than whom nothing could be more dear to himself, and his people, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall, v. 27. He designed by this, [1.] To obtain the favour of Chemosh his god, which, being a devil, delighted in blood and murder, and the destruction of mankind. The dearer any thing was to them, the more acceptable those idolaters thought it must needs be, if offered in sacrifice to their gods, and therefore burnt their children in the fire to their honour. [2.] To terrify the besiegers, and oblige them to retire. Therefore he did it upon the wall, in their sight, that they might see what desperate courses he resolved to take rather than surrender, and how dear he would sell his city and life. He intended hereby to render them odious, and to exasperate and enrage his own subjects against them. This effect it had; there was great indignation against Israel for driving him to this extremity. Whereupon, they raised the siege, and returned. Tender and generous spirits would not do that, though just, which will drive any man distracted, or make him desperate.

CHAP. IV.

Great service Elisha had done, in the foregoing chapter, for the three kings; by his prayers and prophecies they owed their lives and triumphs. One would have expected that the next chapter should have told us what honours and what dignities were conferred on Elisha for this: that he should immediately have been preferred at court, and made prime-minister of state; that Jehoshaphat should have taken him home with him, and advanced him in his kingdom. No, the wise man delivered the army, but no man remembered the wise man, Eccl. 9. 15. Or, if he had preferment offered him, he declined it; he preferred the honour of doing good in the schools of the prophets before that of being great in the courts of princes. God magnified him, and that sufficed him; magnified him indeed, for we have him here employed in working no less than five miracles. I. He multiplied the poor widow's oil, v. 1. . . 7. II. He obtained for the good Shunammite the blessing of a son in her old age, v. 8. . . 17. III. He raised that child to life, when it was dead, v. 18. . . 37. IV. He healed the deadly pottage, v. 38. . . 41. V. He fed a hundred men with twenty small loaves, v. 42. . . 44.

I. NOW there cried a certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets unto Elisha, saying, Thy servant my husband is dead; and thou knowest that thy servant did fear the LORD: and the creditor is come to take unto him my two sons to be bondmen. 2. And Elisha said unto her, What shall I do for thee? tell me: what hast thou in the house? And she said, Thine handmaid hath not any thing in the house save a pot of oil. 3. Then he said, Go, borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbours, even empty vessels; borrow not a few. 4. And when thou art come in, thou shalt shut the door upon thee and upon thy sons, and shalt pour out into all those vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full. 5. So she went from him, and shut the door upon her and her sons, who brought the vessels to her, and she poured out. 6. And it came to pass, when the vessels were full, that she said unto her son, Bring me yet a vessel. And he said unto her, There is not a vessel more. And the oil stayed. 7. Then she came and told the man of God: and he said, Go, sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest.

Elisha's miracles were for use, not for show: this here was so; an act of real charity: Christ's were so; not only great wonders, but great favours, to them for whom they were wrought. God magnifies his goodness with his power.

I. Elisha readily receives a poor widow's complaint. She was a prophet's widow; to whom therefore should she apply herself, but to him that was a father to the sons of the prophets, and concerned himself in the welfare of their families? It seems, the prophets had wives, as well as the priests, though prophecy went not by entail, as the priesthood did. Marriage is honourable in all, and not inconsistent with the most sacred professions. Now, by the complaint of this poor woman, (v. 1.) we are given to understand, 1. That her husband, being one of the sons of the prophets, was well known to Elisha. Ministers of eminent gifts and stations should make themselves familiar with those that are every way their inferiors, and know their character, and state. 2. That he had the reputation of a godly man. Elisha knew him to be one that feared the Lord, else he had been unworthy of the honour, and unfit for the work, of a prophet. He was one that kept his integrity in a time of general apostasy; one of the 7000 that had not bowed the knee to Baal. 3. That he was dead, though a good man, a good minister. The prophets—do they live for ever? They that were clothed with a Spirit of prophecy, were not thereby armed against the stroke of death. 4. That he died poor, and in debt more than he was worth. He did not contract his debts by prodigality, and luxury, and riotous living, for he was one that feared the Lord, and therefore durst not allow himself in such courses: nay, religion obliges men not to live above what they have, nor to spend more than what God gives them, no not in expenses otherwise lawful; for thereby, of necessity, they must disable themselves, at last, to give every one his own, and so prove guilty of a continued act of injustice all along; yet it may be the lot of those that fear God, to be in debt, and insolvent, through afflictive providences, losses by sea, or bad debts, or their own imprudence, for the children of light are not always wise for this world. Perhaps this prophet was impoverished by persecution: when Jezebel ruled, prophets had much ado to live, and especially if they had families. 5. That the creditors were very severe to her. Two sons she had, to be the support of her widowed state, and their labour is reckoned assets in her hand; that must go therefore, and they must be bondmen for seven years, (Exod. 21. 2.) to work out this debt. Those that leave their families under a load of debt disproportionable to their estates, know not what trouble they entail. In this distress, the poor widow goes to Elisha, in dependence upon the promise, that the seed of the righteous shall not be forsaken. The generation of the upright may expect help from God's providence, and countenance from his prophets.

II. He effectually relieves this poor widow's distress, and puts her in a way both to pay her debt, and to maintain herself and her family. He did not say, Be warmed, be filled; but gave her real help. He did not give her some small matter for her present provision, but set her up in the world to sell oil, and put a stock into her hand to begin with. This was done by miracle, but it is an indication to us what is the best method of charity, and the greatest kindness one can do to poor people, which is, if possible, to help them into a way of improving what little they have, by their own industry and ingenuity.

1. He directed her what to do; considered her case; What shall I do for thee? The sons of the prophets were poor, and it would signify little to make a collection for her among them: but the God of the holy prophets is able to supply all her need; and if she has a little committed to her management, her need must be supplied by his blessing and increasing that little. Elisha therefore inquires what she had to make money of, and finds she had nothing to sell but one pot of oil, v. 2. If she had had any plate or furniture, he would have bidden her part with it, to enable her to be just to her creditors. We cannot reckon that really, nor comfortably, our own, which is not so when all our debts are paid. If she had not had this pot of oil, the divine power could have supplied her; but having this, it will work upon this, and so teach us to make the best of what we have. The prophet, knowing her to have credit among her neighbours, bids her borrow of them empty vessels, (v. 3.) for, it seems, she had sold her own, toward the satisfying of her creditors. He directs her to shut the door upon her and her sons, while she filled all those vessels out of that one. She must shut the door, to prevent interruptions from the creditors and others while it was in the doing, that they might not seem proudly to boast of this miraculous supply, and that they might have opportunity for prayer and praise to God upon this extraordinary occasion. Observe, (1.) The oil was to be multiplied in the pouring, as the other widow's meal in the spending. The way to increase what we have, is, to use it; to him that so hath, shall be given. It is not hoarding the talents, but trading with them, that doubles them. (2.) It must be poured out by herself, not by Elisha, or some of the sons of the prophets, to intimate that it is after our careful and diligent endeavours, that we may expect the blessing of God to enrich us, both for this world and the other. What we have, will increase best in our own hand.

2. She did it accordingly. She did not tell the prophet he designed to make a fool of her, but, firmly believing the divine power and goodness, and in pure obedience to the prophet, she borrowed vessels large and many of her neighbours, and poured out her oil into them; one of her sons was employed to bring her empty vessels, and the other carefully to set aside those that were full, while they were all amazed to find their pot, like a fountain of living water, always flowing, and yet always full; they see not the spring that supplies it, but believe it to be in Him in whom all our springs are. Job's metaphor is now verified in the letter; (Job 29. 6.) The rock poured me out rivers of oil. Perhaps this was in the tribe of Asher, part of whose blessing it was, that he should difi his foot in oil, Deut. 33. 24.

3. The oil continued flowing as long as she had any empty vessels to receive it; when every vessel was full, the oil stayed, (v. 6.) for it was not fit that this precious liquor should run over, and be as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again. Note, We are never straitened in God, and in his power and bounty, and the riches of his grace; all our straitness is in ourselves. It is our faith that fails, not his promise. He gives above what we ask: were there more vessels, there is enough in God to fill them; enough for all, enough for each. Was not this pot of oil exhausted, as long as there were any vessels to be filled from it? And shall we fear lest the golden oil which flows from the very root and fatness of the good olive, should fail, as long as there are any lamps to be supplied from it? Zech. 4. 12.

4. The prophet directed her what to do with the oil she had, v. 7. She must not keep it for her own use, to make her face to shine. Those whom Providence has made poor, must be content with poor accommodations for themselves—that is knowing how to want; and must not think, when they get a little of that which is better than ordinary, to feed their own luxury; no; (1.) She must sell the oil to those that were rich, and could afford to bestow it on themselves. We may suppose, being produced by miracle, it was the best of its kind; (like the wine, John 2. 10.) so that she might have both a good price, and a quick market, for it. Probably, the merchants bought it to export, for oil was one of the commodities that Israel traded in, Ezek. 27. 17. (2.) She must pay her debt with the money she received for her oil. Though her creditors were too rigorous with her, yet they must not therefore lose their debt. Her first care, now that she has where-withal, must be to discharge that, even before she makes any provision for her children. It is one of the fundamental laws of our religion, that we render to all their due, pay every just debt, give every one his own, though we leave ever so little for our selves; and this, not of constraint, but willingly and without grudging; not only for wrath, to avoid being sued, but also for conscience-sake. They that bear an honest mind, cannot with pleasure eat their daily bread, unless it be their own bread. (3.) The rest must not be laid up, but she and her children must live upon it, not upon the oil, but upon the money received from it, with which they must put themselves into a capacity of getting an honest livelihood. No doubt, she did as the man of God directed; and hence, [1.] Let those that are poor and in distress, be encouraged to trust God for supply in the way of duty: Verily, thou shalt be fed, though not feasted. It is true, we cannot now expect miracles, yet we may expect mercies, if we wait on God, and seek to him. Let widows particularly, and prophets' widows in a special manner, depend upon him to preserve them and their fatherless children alive, for to them he will be a Husband, a Father. [2.] Let those whom God has blessed with plenty, use it for the glory of God, and under the direction of his word: let them do justly with it, as the widow did, and serve God cheerfully in the use of it; and, as Elisha, be ready to do good to those that need them, be eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame.

8. And it fell on a day, that Elisha passed to Shunem, where was a great woman; and she constrained him to eat bread. And so it was, that, as oft as he passed by, he turned in thither to eat bread. 9. And she said unto her husband, Behold now, I perceive that this is a holy man of God which passeth by us continually. 10. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick: and it shall be, when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither. 11. And it fell on a day that he came thither, and he turned into the chamber, and lay there. 12. And he said to Gehazi his servant, Call this Shunammite. And when he had called her, she stood before him. 13. And he said unto him, Say now unto her, Behold, thou hast been careful for us with all this care; what is to be done for thee? wouldest thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host? And she answered, I dwell among mine own people. 14. And he said, What then is to be done for her? And Gehazi answered, Verily she hath no child, and her husband is old. 15. And he said, Call her. And when he had called her, she stood in the door. 16. And he said, About this season, according to the time of life, thou shalt embrace a son. And she said, Nay, my lord, thou man of God, do not lie unto thine handmaid. 17. And the woman conceived, and bare a son at that season that Elisha had said unto her, according to the time of life.

The giving of a son to such as were old, and had been long childless, was an ancient instance of the divine power and favour, in the case of Abraham, and Isaac, and Manoah, and Elkanah: we find it here among the wonders wrought by Elisha. This was wrought in recompense for the kind entertainment which a good woman gave him, as the promise of a son was given to Abraham, when he entertained angels. Observe here,

I. The kindness of the Shunammite woman to Elisha. Things are bad enough in Israel, yet not so bad, but that God's prophet finds friends, wherever he goes. Shunem was a city in the tribe of Issachar, that lay in the road between Samaria and Carmel, a road that Elisha often travelled, as we find ch. 2. 25. There lived a great woman, who kept a good house, and was very hospitable, her husband having a good estate, and his heart safely trusting in her, and in her discreet management, Prov. 31. 11. So famous a man as Elisha, could not pass or repass unobserved. Probably, he had been accustomed to take some private obscure lodgings in the town; but this pious matron, having notice once of his being there, pressed him with great importunity, and, with much difficulty, constrained him to dine with her, v. 8. He was modest, and loath to be troublesome; humble, and affected not to associate with those of the first rank; so that it was not without some difficulty, that he was first drawn into an acquaintance there: but afterward, whenever he came that way in his circuit, he constantly called there. So well pleased was she with her guest, and so desirous of his company, that she will not only bid him welcome to her table, but provided a lodging-room for him in her house, that he might make the longer stay, not doubting but her house would be blessed for his sake, and all under her roof edified by his pious instructions and example; a good design, yet she will not do it without acquainting her husband, will neither lay out his money, nor invite strangers to his house, without his consent asked and obtained, v. 9, 10. She suggests to him, 1. That the stranger she would invite, was a holy man of God, who therefore would do good to their family, and God would recompense the kindness done to him; perhaps, she had heard how well paid the widow of Sarepta was for entertaining Elijah. 2. That the kindness she intended him, would be no great charge to them; she would build him only a little chamber: perhaps, she had no spare room in the house, or none private and retired enough for him, who spent much of his time in contemplation, and cared not for being disturbed with the noise of the family. The furniture shall be very plain; no costly hangings, no stands, no couches, no looking-glasses; but a bed, and a table, a stool, and a candlestick; all that was needful for his convenience, not only for his repose, but for his study, his reading and writing. Elisha seems highly pleased with these accommodations, for he turned in and lay there, (v. 11.) and, as it should seem, his man in the same chamber, for he was far from taking state.

II. Elisha's gratitude for this kindness; being exceedingly pleased with the quietness of his apartment, and the friendliness of his entertainment, he began to consider with himself what recompense he should make her. They that receive courtesies, should study to return them; it ill becomes men of God to be ungrateful, or to sponge upon those that are generous.

1. He offers to use his interest for her in the king's court, v. 13. Thou hast been careful for us with all this care; thus does he magnify the kindness he received, as those that are humble are accustomed to do, though, in the purse of one so rich, and in the breast of one so free, it was as nothing, now what shall be done for thee? As the liberal devise liberal things, so the grateful devise grateful things. "Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or the captain of the host, for an office for thine husband, civil or military? Hast thou any complaint to make, any petition to present, any suit at law depending, that needs the countenance of the higher powers? Wherein can I serve thee?" It seems, Elisha had got such an interest by his late services, that though he chose not to prefer himself by it, yet he was capable of preferring his friends; a good man can take as much pleasure in serving others, as in raising himself. But she needs not any good offices of this kind to be done for her, I dwell (says she) among mine own people, that is, "We are well off as we are, and do not aim at preferment." It is a happiness to dwell among our own people, that love and respect us, and to whom we are in a capacity of doing good; and a greater happiness to be content to do so, to be easy, and to know when we are well off; why should those that live comfortably among their own people, covet to live delicately in kings' palaces? It would be well with many, if they did but know when they are well off. Some years after this, we find this Shunammite had occasion to be spoken for to the king, though now she needed it not, ch. 8. 3, 4. Those that dwell among their own people, must not think their mountain stands so strong as that it cannot be moved; they may be driven, as this good woman was, to sojourn among strangers; our continuing city is above.

2. He did use his interest for her in the court of heaven, which was far better. Elisha consulted with his servant what kindness he should do for her, such a freedom did this great prophet admit even his servant to: Gehazi tells him she is childless, has a great estate, but no son to leave it to, and was past hopes of having any, her husband being old; if Elisha can obtain this favour from God for her, it will be the removal of that which, at present, was her only grievance. Those are the most welcome kindnesses, which are most suited to our necessities. He sent for her immediately; she very humbly and respectfully stood in the door, (v. 15.) according to her accustomed modesty, and then he assured her that within a year she should bring forth a son, v. 16. She had received this prophet in the name of a prophet, and now she had not a courtier's reward, in being spoken for to the king, but a prophet's reward, a signal mercy given by prophets, and in answer to prayer: the promise was a surprise to her, and she begs she may not be flattered by it; "Nay, my lord, thou art a man of God, and therefore, I hope, speakest seriously, and dost not jest with me, nor lie unto thine handmaid." The event, within the time limited, confirmed the truth of the promise; she bare a son at the season that Elisha spake of, v. 17. God built up her house, in reward of her kindness in building the prophet a chamber. We may well imagine what joy this brought to the family; Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear.

18. And when the child was grown, it fell on a day that he went out to his father to the reapers. 19. And he said unto his father, My head, my head! And he said to a lad, Carry him to his mother. 20. And when he had taken him, and brought him to his mother, he sat on her knees till noon, and then died. 21. And she went up, and laid him on the bed of the man of God, and shut the door upon him, and went out. 22. And she called unto her husband, and said, Send me, I pray thee, one of the young men, and one of the asses, that I may run to the man of God, and come again. 23. And he said, Wherefore wilt thou go to him to-day? it is neither new moon nor sabbath. And she said, It shall be well. 24. Then she saddled an ass, and said to her servant, Drive, and go forward; slack not thy riding for me, except I bid thee. 25. So she went, and came unto the man of God to mount Carmel. And it came to pass, when the man of God saw her afar off, that he said to Gehazi his servant, Behold, yonder is that Shunammite: 26. Run now, I pray thee, to meet her; and say unto her, Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child? And she answered, It is well. 27. And when she came to the man of God to the hill, she caught him by the feet: but Gehazi came near to thrust her away. And the man of God said, Let her alone; for her soul is vexed within her: and the Lord hath hid it from me, and hath not told me. 28. Then she said, Did I desire a son of my lord? did I not say, Do not deceive me? 29. Then he said to Gehazi, Gird up thy loins, and take my staff in thine hand, and go thy way: if thou meet any man, salute him not; and if any salute thee, answer him not again: and lay my staff upon the face of the child. 30. And the mother of the child said, As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. And he arose, and followed her. 31. And Gehazi passed on before them, and laid the staff upon the face of the child; but there was neither voice nor hearing: wherefore he went again to meet him, and told him, saying, The child is not awaked. 32. And when Elisha was come into the house, behold, the child was dead, and laid upon his bed. 33. He went in therefore, and shut the door upon them twain, and prayed unto the Lord. 34.

And he went up, and lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and he stretched himself upon the child, and the flesh of the child waxed warm. 35. Then he returned, and walked in the house to and fro; and went up, and stretched himself upon him: and the child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes. 36. And he called Gehazi, and said, Call this Shunammite. So he called her. And when she was come in unto him, he said, Take up thy son. 37. Then she went in, and fell at his feet, and bowed herself to the ground, and took up her son, and went out.

We may well suppose, after the birth of this son, that the prophet was doubly welcome to the good Shunammite: he had thought himself indebted to her, but from henceforth, as long as she lives, she will think herself in his debt, and that she can never do too much for him. We may also suppose that the child was very dear to the prophet, as the son of his prayers, and very dear to the parents, as the son of their old age. But here is,

I. The sudden death of the child, though so much a darling; he is so far past the perils of infancy; that he is able to go to the field to his father, who, no doubt, is pleased with his engaging talk, and his joy of his son is greater than the joy of his harvest; but either the cold or the heat of the open field overcame the child, that was bred tenderly, and he complains to his father that his head aches, v. 19. Whither should we go with our complaints, but to our heavenly Father? Thither the Spirit of adoption brings believers with all their grievances, all their desires, teaching them to cry, with groanings that cannot be uttered, "My head, my head; my heart, my heart." The father sends him to his mother's arms, his mother's lap, little suspecting any danger in his indisposition, but hoping he will drop asleep in his mother's bosom, and awake well; but it proves fatal, he sleeps the sleep of death; (v. 20.) well in the morning, and dead by noon; all the mother's care and tenderness cannot keep him alive: a child of promise, a child of prayer, and given in love, yet taken away. Little children lie open to the arrests of sickness and death. But how admirably does the prudent pious mother guard her lips, under this surprising affliction! Not one peevish indecent word comes from her; she has a strong belief that the child will be raised to life again: like a genuine daughter of Abraham's faith, as well as loins, she accounts that God is able to raise him from the dead, for thence she received him in a figure, Heb. 11. 19. She had heard of the raising of the widow's son of Sarepta, and that the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha; and such confidence had she of God's goodness, that she was very ready to believe that he who so soon took away what he had given, would restore what he had now taken away; by this faith, women received their dead raised to life, Heb. 11. 35. In this faith, she makes no preparation for the burial of her dead child, but for its resurrection; for she lays him on the prophet's bed, (v. 21.) expecting that he would stand her friend; O woman, great is thy faith! He that wrought it, would not frustrate it.

II. The sorrowful mother's application to the prophet, on this sad occasion; for it happened very opportunely that he was now at the college upon mount Carmel, not far off.

1. She begged leave of her husband to go to the prophet, yet not acquainting him with her errand, lest he should not have faith enough to let her go, v. 22. He objected, It is neither new-moon nor sabbath; (v. 23.) which intimates that on those feasts of the Lord, she used to go to the assembly in which he presided, with other good people, to hear the word, and to join with him in prayers and praises; she did not think it enough to have his help sometimes in her own family, but, though a great woman, attended on public worship, for which this was none of the times appointed; "Wherefore," said the husband, "why wilt thou go to-day? What is the matter?" "No harm," said she; "it shall be well, so you will say yourself, hereafter." See how this husband and wife vied with each other, in showing mutual regard; she was so dutiful to him, that she would not go till she had acquainted him with her journey, and he so kind to her, that he would not oppose it, though she did not think fit to acquaint him with her business.

2. She made all the haste she could to the prophet, (v. 24.) who, seeing her at a distance, sent his servant to inquire whether any thing was amiss, v. 25, 26. The questions were particular, Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with the child? Note, It well becomes the men of God, with tenderness and concern, to inquire about the welfare of their friends, and their families; the answer was general, It is well. Gehazi was not the man that she came to complain to, and therefore she puts him off with this; she said little, and little said is soon amended; (Ps. 39. 1, 2.) but what she did say, was very patient; "It is well with me, with my husband, with the child"—all well, and yet the child dead in the house. Note, When God calls away our dearest relations by death, it becomes us quietly to say, "It is well both with us and them;" it is well, for all is well that God does; all is well with them that are gone, if they are gone to heaven, and all well with us that stay behind, if by the affliction we are furthered in our way thither.

3. When she came to the prophet, she humbly reasoned with him concerning her present affliction; she threw herself at his feet, as one troubled and in grief, which she never showed till she came to him, who, she believed, could help her, v. 27. When her passion would do her service, she knew how to discover it, as well as how to conceal it, when it would do her disservice. Gehazi knew his master would not be pleased to see her lie at his feet, and therefore would have raised her up; but Elisha waited to hear from her, since he might not know immediately from God, what was the cause of her trouble. God discovered things to his prophets, as he saw fit, not always as they desired; God did not show this to the prophet, because he might know it from the good woman herself. What she said, was very pathetic; she appeals to the prophet, (1.) Concerning her indifference to this mercy which was now taken from her; "Did I desire a son of my lord?" No, thou knowest I did not; it was thine own proposal, not mine; I did not fret for the want of a son, as Hannah, nor beg, as Rachel, Give me children, or else I die." Note, When any creature-comfort is taken from us, it is well, if we can say, through grace, that we did not set our hearts inordinately upon it; for if we did, we have reason to fear it was given in anger, and taken away in wrath. (2.) Concerning her entire dependence upon the prophet's word; Did I not say, Do not deceive me? Yes, she did say so, (v. 16.) and this reflection upon it may be considered either, [1.] As quarrelling with the prophet for deceiving her; she was ready to think herself mocked with the mercy, when it was so soon removed, and that it had been better she had never had this child, than to be deprived of him, when she began to have comfort in him. Note, The loss of a mercy should not make us undervalue the gift of it; or, [2.] As pleading with the prophet for the raising of the child to life again; I said, Do not deceive me, and I know thou wilt not. Note, However the providence of God may disappoint us, we may be sure the promise of God never did, nor ever will, deceive us: hope in that will not make us ashamed.

III. The raising of the child to life again; we may suppose that the woman gave Elisha a more express account of the child's death, and he gave her a more express promise of his resurrection, than is here related, where we are briefly told,

1. That Elisha sent Gehazi to go, in all haste, to the dead child, gave him his staff, and bade him lay that on the face of the child, v. 29. I know not what to make of this; Elisha knew that Elijah raised the dead child with a very close application, stretching himself upon the child, and praying again and again; and could he think to raise this child by so slight a ceremony as this, especially when nothing hindered him from coming himself? Shall such a power as this be delegated, and to no better a man than Gehazi? Bishop Hall suggests that it was done out of human conceit, and not by divine instinct, and therefore it failed of the effect; God will not have such great favours made too cheap, nor shall they be too easily come by, lest they be undervalued.

2. The woman resolves not to go back without the prophet himself; (v. 30.) I will not leave thee. She had no great expectation from the staff, she will have the hand, and she was in the right of it; perhaps, it was intended hereby to teach us not to put that confidence in creatures that are servants, which the power of the Creator, their Master and our's will alone bear the weight of. Gehazi returns re infecta—without success, without the tidings of any sign of life in the child; (v. 31.) The child is not awaked; intimating, to the comfort of the mother, that its death was but a sleep, and that he expected it would shortly be awaked. In the raising of dead souls to spiritual life, ministers can do no more by their own power than Gehazi here could; they lay the word, like the prophet's staff, before their faces, but there is neither voice nor hearing, till Christ, by his Spirit, comes himself; the letter alone kills, it is the Spirit that gives life; it is not prophesying upon dry bones, that will put life into them, breath must come from heaven, and breathe upon those slain.

3. The prophet, by earnest prayer, obtains from God the restoring of this dead child to life again; he found the child dead upon his own bed, (v. 32.) and shut the door upon them twain, v. 33. Even the dead child is spoken of as a person, one of the twain, for it was still in being, and not lost; he shut out all company, that he might not seem to glory in the power God had given him, or to use it for ostentation, and to be seen of men.

Observe, (1.) How closely the prophet applied himself to this great operation; perhaps being sensible that he had tempted God too much, in thinking to effect it by the staff in Gehazi's hand, for which he thought himself rebuked by the disappointment, he now finds it a harder task than he then thought, and therefore addresses himself to it with great solemnity. [1.] He prayed unto the Lord, (v. 33.) probably, as Elijah had done, Let this child's soul come into him again. Christ raises the dead to life, as one having authority, Damsel, arise; Young man, I say unto thee, Arise; Lazarus come forth: for he was powerful and faithful as a Son, the Lord of life, but Elijah and Elisha did it by petition as servants. [2.] He lay upon the child, (v. 34.) as if he would communicate to him some of his vital heat or spirits; thus he expressed the earnestness of his desire, and gave a sign of that divine power which he depended upon for the accomplishment of this great work. He first put his mouth to the child's mouth, as if, in God's name, he would breathe into him the breath of life, then his eyes to the child's eyes, to open them again to the light of life, then his hands to the child's hands, to put strength into them. He then returned, and walked in the house, as one full of care and concern, and wholly intent upon what he was about; then he went up stairs again, and, the second time, stretched himself upon the child, v. 35. Those that would be instrumental in conveying spiritual life to dead souls, must thus affect themselves with their case, and accommodate themselves to it, and labour fervently in prayer for them.

(2.) How gradually the operation was performed; at the first application, the flesh of the child waxed warm, (v. 34.) which gave the prophet encouragement to continue instant in prayer; after a while, the child sneezed seven times, which was an indication, not only of life, but liveliness. Some have reported it is an ancient tradition, That when God breathed into Adam the breath of life, the first evidence of his being alive, was sneezing, which gave rise to the usage of paying respect to those that sneeze. Some observe here, that sneezing clears the head, and there lay the child's distemper.

(3.) How joyfully the child was returned alive to his mother, (v. 36, 37.) and all parties concerned were not a little comforted, Acts 20. 12. See the power of God, who kills and makes alive again; see the power of prayer; as it has the key of the clouds, so it has the key of death: see the power of faith; that fixed law of nature (that death is a way whence there is no returning) shall rather be dispensed with, than this believing Shunammite shall be disappointed.

38. And Elisha came again to Gilgal, and there was a dearth in the land, and the sons of the prophets were sitting before him: and he said unto his servant, Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets. 39. And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not. 40. So they poured out for the men to eat: and it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out, and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot; and they could not eat thereof. 41. But he said, Then bring meal. And he cast it into the pot; and he said, Pour out for the people, that they may eat. And there was no harm in the pot. 42. And there came a man from Baal-shalisha, and brought the man of God bread of the first-fruits, twenty loaves of barley, and full ears of corn in the husk thereof. And he said, Give unto the people, that they may eat. 43. And his servitor said, What, should I set this before a hundred men? He said again, Give the people, that they may eat: for thus saith the LORD, They shall eat, and shall leave thereof. 44. So he set it before them, and they did eat, and left thereof, according to the word of the LORD.

We have here Elisha, in his place, in his element, among the sons of the prophets, teaching them, and, as a father, providing for them; and happy it was for them, that they had one over them, who naturally cared for their state, under whom they were well fed and well taught. There was a dearth in the land, for the wickedness of them that dwelt therein, the same that we read of, ch. 8. 1. It continued seven years, just as long again as that in Elijah's time; a famine of bread there was, but not of hearing the word of God, for Elisha had the sons of the prophets sitting before him, to hear his wisdom, who were taught, that they might teach others. Two instances we have here of the care he took about their meat. Christ twice fed those whom he preached to; Elisha was in the more care about it now, because of the dearth, that the sons of the prophets might not be ashamed in this evil time, but even, in the days of famine, might be satisfied, Ps. 37. 19.

I. He made hurtful food to become safe and wholesome.

1. On the lecture-day, the sons of the prophets being all to attend, he ordered his servant to provide food for their bodies, while he was breaking to them the bread of life for their souls; whether there was any flesh-meat for them, does not appear; he orders only that pottage should be seethed for them of herbs, v. 38. The sons of the prophets should be examples of temperance and mortification, not desirous of dainties, but content with plain food: if they have neither savoury meats, nor sweet meats, nay, if a mess of pottage be all the dinner, let them remember that this great prophet entertained himself and his guests no better.

2. One of the servitors, that was sent to gather herbs, (which, it should seem, must serve instead of flesh for the pottage;) by mistake, brought in that which was noxious, or, at least, very nauseous, and shred it into the pottage, wild gourds they are called, v. 39. Some think it was coloquintida, a herb strongly cathartic, and, if not qualified, dangerous. The sons of the prophets, it seems, were better skilled in divinity than in natural philosophy, and read their Bibles more than their Herbals. If any of the fruits of the earth be hurtful, we must look upon it as an effect of the curse, (Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee,) for the original blessing made all good.

3. The guests complained to Elisha of the unwholesomeness of their food. Nature has given man the sense of tasting, not only that wholesome food may be pleasant, but that that which is unwholesome, may be discovered before it comes to the stomach; the mouth tries meat by tasting it, Job 12. 11. This pottage was soon found by the taste of it to be dangerous, so that they cried out, There is death in the pot, v. 40. The table often becomes a snare, and that which should be for our welfare, proves a trap, which is a good reason why we should not feed ourselves without fear; when we are receiving the supports and comforts of life, we must keep up an expectation of death, and a fear of sin.

4. Elisha immediately cured the bad taste, and prevented the bad consequences, of this unwholesome pottage; as before, he had healed the bitter waters with salt, so now, the bitter broth with meal, v. 41. It is probable that there was meal in it before, but that was put in by a common hand, only to thicken the pottage; this was the same thing, but cast in by Elisha's hand, and with intent to heal the pottage; by which it appears that the change was not owing to the meal, (that was the sign only, not the means,) but to the divine power. Now all was well, not only no death, but no harm, in the pot; we must acknowledge God's goodness in making our food wholesome and nourishing; I am the Lord that healeth thee.

II. He made a little food to go a great way.

1. Elisha had a present brought him of 20 barley-loaves and some ears of corn, (v. 42.) a present which, in those ages, would not be despicable at any time, but now in a special manner valuable, when there was a dearth in the land. It is said to be of the first-fruits, which was God's due out of their increase; and when the priests and Levites were all at Jerusalem, out of their reach, the religious people among them, with good reason, looked upon the prophets as God's receivers, and brought their first-fruits to them, which helped to maintain their schools.

2. Having freely received, he freely gave, ordering it all to be set before the sons of the prophets, reserving none for himself, none for hereafter, Let the morrow take thought for the things of itself, give it all to the people that they may eat. It well becomes the men of God to be generous and open-handed, and the fathers of the prophets to be liberal to the sons of the prophets.

3. Though the loaves were little, it is likely, no more than what one man would ordinarily eat at a meal, yet with 20 of them he satisfied 100 men, v. 43, 44. His servant thought that to set so little meat before so many men, was but to tantalize them, and shame his master for making so great an invitation to such short commons; but he, in God's name, pronounced it a full meal for them, and so it proved; they did eat, and left thereof, not because their stomachs failed them, but because the bread increased in the eating; God has promised his church, (Ps. 132. 15.) that he will abundantly bless her provision, and satisfy her poor with bread; for whom he feeds, he fills, and what he blesses, comes to much, as what he blows upon, comes to little. Hag. 1. 9. Christ's feeding his hearers was a miracle far beyond this, but both teach us that those who wait upon God in the way of duty, may hope to be both protected and supplied by a particular care of Divine Providence.

CHAP. V.

Two more of Elisha's miracles are recorded in this chapter. 1. The cleansing of Naaman, a Syrian, a stranger, from his leprosy; and there, I. The badness of his case, v. 1. 2. The providence that brought him to Elisha, the intelligence given him by a captive maid, v. 2. 4. A letter from the king of Syria to the king of Israel, to introduce him, v. 5. 7. And the invitation Elisha sent him, v. 8. 3. The method prescribed for his cure: his submission, after objecting to that method, and his cure thereby, v. 9. 14. 4. The grateful acknowledgments he made to Elisha, hereupon, v. 15. 19. II. The smiting of Gehazi, his own servant, with that leprosy. 1. Gehazi's sins, which were, belying his master to Naaman, (v. 20. 24.) and lying to his master when he examined him, v. 25. 2. His punishment for this sin; Naaman's leprosy was entailed on his family, v. 26, 27. And if Naaman's cure was typical of the calling of the Gentiles, as our Saviour seems to make it, (Luke 4. 27.) Gehazi's stroke may be looked upon as typical of the blinding and rejecting of the Jews, who envied God's grace to the Gentiles, as Gehazi envied Elisha's favour to Naaman.

I. NOW Naaman, captain of the host of the king of Syria, was a great man with his master, and honourable; because by him the LORD had given deliverance unto Syria: he was also a mighty man in valour, but he was a leper. 2. And the Syrians had gone out by companies, and had brought away captive out of the land of Israel a little maid; and she waited on Naaman's wife. 3. And she said unto her mistress, Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy. 4. And one went in and told his lord, saying, Thus said the maid that is of the land of Israel. 5. And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel. And he departed, and took with him ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment. 6. And he brought the letter to the king of Israel, saying, Now, when this letter is come unto thee, behold, I have therewith sent Naaman my servant to thee, that thou mayest recover him of his leprosy. 7. And it came to pass, when the king of Israel had read the letter, that he rent his clothes, and said, Am I God, to kill and to make alive, that this man doth send unto me to recover a man of his leprosy? Wherefore consider, I pray you, and see how he seeketh a quarrel against me. 8. And it was so, when Elisha the man of God had heard that the king of Israel had rent his clothes, that he sent to the king, saying, Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? let him come now to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel.

Our Saviour's miracles were intended for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet one, like a crum, fell from the table to a woman of Canaan; so, this one miracle Elisha wrought for Naaman, a Syrian; for God does good to all, and will have all men to be saved. Here is,

I. The great affliction Naaman was under, in the midst of all his honours, v. 1. He was a great man, in a great place; not only rich and raised, but particularly happy for two things, 1. That he had been very serviceable to his country, God made him so; by him the Lord had often given deliverance to Syria, success in their wars even with Israel. The preservation and prosperity even of those that do not know God and serve him, must be ascribed to him, for he is the Saviour of all men, but especially of them that believe. Let Israel know that when the Syrians prevailed, it was from the Lord. 2. That he was very acceptable to his prince, was his favourite, and prime-minister of state; so great was he, so high, so honourable, and a mighty man of valour; but he was a leper, was under that loathsome disease, which made him a burthen to himself. Note, (1.) No man's greatness, or honour, or interest, or valour, or victory, can set him out of the reach of the sorest calamities of human life; there is many a sickly crazy body under rich and gay clothing. (2.) Every man has some but or other in his character, something that blemishes and diminishes him, some alloy to his grandeur, some damp to his joy; he may be very happy, very good, yet, in something or other, not so good as he should be, nor so happy as he would be. Naaman was as great as the world could make him, and yet (as Bishop Hall expresses it) the basest slave in Syria would not change skins with him.

II. The notice that was given him of Elisha's power, by a little maid that waited on his lady, v. 2, 3. This maid was, by birth an Israelite, providentially carried captive into Syria, and there preferred into Naaman's family, where she publishes Elisha's fame, to the honour of Israel, and Israel's God. The unhappy dispersing of the people of God has sometimes proved the happy occasion of the diffusion of the knowledge of God, Acts 8. 4. This little maid, 1. As became a true-born Israelite, consulted the honour of her country; could give an account, though but a girl, of the famous prophet they had among them. Children should sometimes acquaint themselves with the wondrous works of God, that, wherever they go, they may have them to talk of. See Ps. 8. 2. 2. As became a good servant, she desired the health and welfare of her master, though she was a captive, a servant by force; much more should servants of choice seek their masters' good: the Jews in Babylon were to seek the peace of the land of their captivity, Jer. 29. 7. Elisha had not cleansed any lepers in Israel; (Luke 4. 27.) yet this little maid, from the other miracles he had wrought, infers that he could cure her master, and from his common beneficence infers that he would do it, though he was a Syrian. Servants may be blessings to the families where they are, by telling what they know of the glory of God, and the honour of his prophets.

III. The application which the king of Syria, hereupon, made to the king of Israel on Naaman's behalf. Naaman took notice of the intelligence, though given by a simple maid, and did not despise it for the sake of her meanness, when it tended to his bodily health; he did not say, "The girl talks like a fool; how can any prophet of Israel do that for me, which all the physicians of Syria have attempted in vain?" Though he neither loved nor honoured the Jewish nation, yet if one of that nation can but cure him of his leprosy, he will thankfully acknowledge the obligation. O that they who are spiritually diseased, would hearken thus readily to the tidings brought them of the great Physician!

See what Naaman did, upon this little hint. 1. He would not send for the prophet to come to him, but such honour would he pay to one that had so much of a divine power with him as to be able to cure diseases, that he would go to him himself, though he himself was sickly, unfit for society, the journey long, and the country an enemy's; princes, he thinks, must stoop to prophets, when they need them. 2. He would not go in disguise, though his errand proclaimed his loathsome disease, but went in state, and with a great retinue, to do the more honour to the prophet. 3. He would not go empty-handed, but took with him gold, silver, and raiment, to present to his physician; those that have wealth, and want health, show which they reckon the more valuable blessing; what will they not give for ease, and strength, and soundness of body? 4. He would not go without a letter to the king of Israel from the king his master, who did himself earnestly desire his recovery; he knows not where in Samaria to find this wonder-working prophet, but takes it for granted the king knows where to find him; and, to engage the prophet to do his utmost for Naaman, he will go to him, supported with the interest of two kings. If the king of Syria must entreat his help, he hopes the king of Israel, being his liege-lord, may command it: the gifts of the subject must all be (he thinks) for the service and honour of the prince, and therefore he desires the king that he would recover the leper, (v. 6.) taking it for granted that there was a greater intimacy between the king and the prophet than really there was.

IV. The alarm this gave to the king of Israel, v. 7. He apprehended there was in this letter, 1. A great affront upon God, and therefore he rent his clothes, according to the custom of the Jews, when they heard or read that which they thought blasphemous; and what less could it be, than to attribute to him a divine power? "Am I a God, to kill whom I will, and make alive whom I will?" No, I pretend not to such an authority;" Nebuchadnezzar did, as we find, Dan. 5. 19. "Am I a God, to kill with a word, and make alive with a word?" No, I pretend not to such a power;" thus this great man, this bad man, is made to own that he is but a man. Why did he not, with this consideration, correct himself for his idolatry, and reason thus? "Shall I worship those as gods, that can neither kill nor make alive; can do neither good nor evil?" 2. A bad design upon himself; he appeals to those about him for this, "See how he seeketh a quarrel against me; he requires me to recover the leper, and if I do not, though I cannot, he will make that a pretence to wage war with me;" which he suspects the rather, because Naaman was his general. Had he rightly understood the meaning of the letter, that when the king wrote to him to recover the leper, he meant, that he would take care he might be recovered, he had not been in this fright. Note, We often create a great deal of uneasiness to ourselves, by misinterpreting the words and actions of others that are well intended; it is charity to ourselves, to think no evil. If he had bethought himself of Elisha and his power, he would easily have understood the letter; and have known what he had to do, but he is put into this confusion, by making himself a stranger to the prophet; the captive maid had him more in her thoughts than the king had.

V. The proffer which Elisha made of his service; he was willing to do any thing to make his prince easy, though he was neglected, and his former good services forgotten, by him: hearing on what occasion the king had rent his clothes, he sent to him, to let him know that if his patient would come to him, he should not lose his labour; (v. 8.) he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel; (and it were sad with Israel if there were not); that there is a prophet in Israel, who can do that which the king of Israel dares not attempt, which the prophets of Syria cannot pretend to; it was not for his own honour, but for the honour of God, that he coveted to make them all know that there was a prophet in Israel, though obscure and overlooked.

9. So Naaman came with his horses and with his chariot, and stood at the door of the house of Elisha. 10. And Elisha sent a messenger unto him, saying, Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean. 11. But Naaman was wroth, and went away, and said, Behold, I thought, He will surely come out to me, and stand and call on the name of the LORD his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper. 12. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them, and be clean? So he turned, and went away in a rage. 13. And his servants came near, and spake unto him, and said, My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? how much rather then, when he saith to thee, Wash, and be clean? 14. Then went he down, and dipped himself seven times in Jordan, according to the saying of the man of God: and his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child, and he was clean.

We have here the cure of Naaman's leprosy.

I. The short and plain direction which the prophet gave him, with assurance of success. Naaman designed to do honour to Elisha, when he came in his chariot, and with all his retinue, to Elisha's door, v. 9. They that showed little respect to prophets at other times, when they needed them, were very complaisant to them; he attended at Elisha's door as a beggar for an alms. They that would be cleansed from their spiritual leprosy, must wait at Wisdom's gate, and watch at the posts of her doors. Naaman expected to have his compliment returned, but Elisha gave him his answer without any formality; he did not go to the door to him, lest he should seem too much pleased with the honour done him, but sent a messenger to him, saying, Go wash in Jordan seven times, and promising him that if he did so, his disease should be cured. The promise was express, Thou shalt be clean; the method prescribed was plain, Go wash in Jordan. This was not intended as any means of the cure; though cold bathing is recommended by many as a very wholesome thing, yet some think that in the case of a leprosy, it was rather hurtful; but it was intended as a sign of the cure, and a trial of his obedience: they that will be helped of God, must do as they are bidden. But why did Elisha send a messenger to him with these directions? 1. Because he was retired, at this time, for devotion, was intent upon his prayers for the cure, and would not be diverted; or, 2. Because he knew Naaman to be a proud man, and he would let him know, that before the great God, all men stand upon the same level.

II. Naaman's disgust at the method prescribed, because it was not what he expected. Two things disgusted him; 1. That Elisha, as he thought, put a slight upon his person, in sending him orders by a servant, and not coming to him himself, v. 11. Being big with the expectations of a cure, he had been fancying how this cure would be wrought, and the scheme he had laid, was this; "He will surely come out to me, that is the least he can do to me, a peer of Syria, to me that am come to him in all this state, to me that have so often been victorious over Israel; he will stand, and call on the name of his God, and name me in his prayer, and then he will wave his hand over the place, and so effect the cure;" and because the thing is not done just thus, he falls into a passion, forgetting, (1.) That he was a leper, and the law of Moses, which Elisha would religiously observe, shut those out from society; a leper, and therefore he ought not to insist upon the punctilios of honour. Note, Many have hearts unhumiliated under humbling providences; see Numb. 12. 14. (2.) That he was a petitioner, suing for a favour which he could not demand; and beggars must not be choosers, patients must not prescribe to their physician. See in Naaman the folly of pride; a cure will not content him, unless he be cured with ceremony, with a great deal of pomp and parade; he scorns to be healed, unless he be humoured. 2. That Elisha, as he thought, put a slight upon his country; he took it hard that he must be sent to wash in Jordan, a river of Israel, when he thought Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel. How magnificently does he speak of these two rivers that watered Damascus, which soon after fell into one called by geographers Chrysoroas—the golden stream. How scornfully does he speak of all the waters of Israel, though God had called the land of Israel the glory of all lands, and particularly for its brooks of water, Deut. 8. 7. So common is it for God and man to differ in their judgments. How slightly does he speak of the prophet's directions! May I not wash in them and be clean? He might wash in them, and be clean from dirt, but not wash in them, and be clean from leprosy. He was angry that the prophet bade him wash and be clean; he thought that the prophet must do all, and is not pleased that he is bidden to do any thing; or he thinks this too cheap, too plain, too common, a thing for so great a man to be cured by; or he did not believe it would at all affect the cure, or if it would, what medicinal virtue was there in Jordan more than in the rivers of Damascus? But he did not consider, (1.) That Jordan belonged to Israel's God, from whom he was to expect the cure, and not from the gods of Damascus; it watered the Lord's land, the holy land, and, in a miraculous cure, relation to God was much more considerable than the depth of the channel, or the beauty of the stream. (2.) That Jordan had more than once, before this, obeyed the commands of Omnipotence; it had, of old, yielded a passage to Israel, and, of late, to Elijah and Elisha, and therefore was fitter for such a purpose than those rivers which had only observed the common law of their creation, and had never been thus distinguished; but above all, Jordan was the river appointed, and if he expected a cure from the divine power, he ought to acquiesce in the divine will, without asking why or wherefore. Note, It is common for those that are wise in their own conceits, to look with contempt on the dictates and prescriptions of divine wisdom, and to prefer their own fancies before them; they that are for establishing their own righteousness, will not submit to the righteousness of God, Rom. 10. 3.

Naaman talked himself into such a heat, (as passionate men usually do,) that he turned away from the prophet's door in a rage, ready to swear he would never have any thing more to say to Elisha; and who then would be the loser? Note, They that observe lying vanities, forsake their own mercies, Jonah 2. 8. Proud men are the worst enemies to themselves, and forego their own redemption.

III. The modest advice which his servants gave him, to observe the prophet's prescriptions, with an implicit reproof of his resentments, v. 13. Though, at other times, they kept their distance, and now saw him in a passion, yet, knowing him to be a man that would hear reason, at any time, and from any body, (a good character of great men, and a very rare one,) they drew near, and made bold to argue the matter a little with him. They had conceived a great opinion of the prophet, (having, perhaps, heard more of him from the common people, whom they had conversed with, than Naaman had heard from the king and courtiers, whom he had conversed with,) and therefore begged of him to consider; If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, had ordered thee into a tedious course of physic, or to submit to some painful operation, blistering, or cupping, or salivating, wouldest thou not have done it? No doubt, thou wouldest. And wilt thou not submit to so easy a method as this, Wash, and be clean?

Observe, 1. His own servants gave him this reproof and counsel, which was no more disparagement to him, than that he had intelligence of one that could cure him, from his wife's maid, v. 2. Note, It is a great mercy to have those about us, that will be free with us, and faithfully tell us of our faults and follies, though they be our inferiors. Masters must be willing to hear reason from their servants, Job 31. 13, 14. As we should be deaf to the counsel of the ungodly, though given by the greatest and most venerable names, so we should have our ear open to good advice, though brought us by those who are much below us: no matter who speaks, if it be well said.

2. The reproof was very modest and respectful; they call him, Father; for servants must honour and obey their masters with a kind of filial affection. In giving reproof and counsel, we must make it appear that it comes from love and true honour, and that we intend, not reproach, but reformation.

3. It was very rational and considerate. If the rude and unthinking servants had stirred up their master's angry resentment, and offered to avenge his quarrel upon the prophet, who (he thought) affronted him, how mischievous had the consequences been! Fire from heaven, probably, upon them all! But they, to our great surprise, took the prophet's part. Elisha, though it is likely he perceived that what he had said, had put Naaman out of humour, did not care to pacify him: it was at his peril, if he persisted in his wrath: but his servants are made use of by Providence to reduce him to temper. They reason with him, (1.) From his earnest desire of a cure; Wouldest not thou do any thing? Note, When diseased sinners are come to this, that they are content to do any thing, to submit to any thing, to part with any thing, for a cure, then, and not till then, we begin to indulge some hopes of them. Then they will take Christ on his own terms, when they are made willing to have Christ upon any terms. (2.) From the easiness of the method prescribed; it is but, Wash, and be clean. It is but trying; the experiment is cheap and easy, it can do no hurt, but may do good. Note, The methods prescribed for the healing of the leprosy of sin, are so plain, that we are utterly inexcusable if we do not observe them. It is but, "Believe, and be saved," "Repent, and be pardoned," "Wash, and be clean."

IV. The cure effected, in the use of the means prescribed, v. 14. Naaman, upon second thoughts, yielded to make the experiment, yet, it should seem, with no great faith or resolution; for whereas the prophet bade him wash in Jordan seven times, he did but dip himself so many times, as lightly as he could. However, God is pleased so far to honour himself and his word, as to make that effectual. His flesh came again like the flesh of a child, to his great surprise and joy. This, men get by yielding to the will of God, by attending to his institutions. His being cleansed by washing, put an honour on the law for cleansing lepers: God will magnify his word above all his name.

15. And he returned to the man of God, he and all his company, and came and stood before him: and he said, Behold, now I know that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel: now therefore, I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant. 16. But he said, As the LORD liveth, before whom I stand, I will receive none. And he urged him to take it; but he refused. 17. And Naaman said, Shall there not then, I pray thee, be given to thy servant two mules' burden of earth? for thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt-offering nor sacrifice unto other gods, but unto the LORD. 18. In this thing the LORD pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the LORD pardon thy servant in this thing. 19. And he said unto him, Go in peace. So he departed from him a little way.

Of the ten lepers our Saviour cleansed, the only one that returned to give thanks, was a Samaritan, Luke 17. 16. This Syrian did so, who here bespeaks himself,

I. Convinced of the power of the God of Israel, not only that he is God, but that he is God alone, and that indeed that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel, v. 15. A noble confession, but such as bespeaks the misery of the Gentile world; for the nations that had many gods, really had no God, but were without God in the world. He had formerly thought the gods of Syria gods indeed, but now experience had rectified his mistake, and he knew Israel's God was God alone, the sovereign Lord of all. Had he seen other lepers cleansed, perhaps it had not convinced him, but the mercy of the cure affected him more than the miracle of it. Those are best able to speak of the power of divine grace, who have themselves experienced it.

II. Grateful to Elisha the prophet: "Therefore, for his sake, whose servant thou art, I have a present for thee, silver, and gold, and raiment, whatever thou wilt please to accept." He valued the cure, not by the easiness of it to the prophet, but the acceptableness of it to himself, and would gladly pay for it accordingly. But Elisha generously refused the fee, though urged to accept it; and, to prevent further importunity, backed his refusal with an oath, As the LORD liveth, I will receive none; (v. 16.) not because he did not need it, for he was poor enough, and knew what to do with it, and how to bestow it among the sons of the prophets; nor because he thought it unlawful, for he received presents from others; but he would not be beholden to this Syrian, nor should he say, I have made Elisha rich, Gen. 14. 23. It would be much for the honour of God, to show this new convert that the servants of the God of Israel were taught to look upon the wealth of this world with a holy contempt, which would confirm him in his belief, that there is no God but in Israel. See 1 Cor. 9. 18. 2. Cor. 11. 9.

III. Proselyted to the worship of the God of Israel. He will not only offer a sacrifice to the Lord, in thanks for his present cure, but he resolves he will never offer sacrifice to any other gods, v. 17. It was a happy cure of his leprosy, which cured him of his idolatry, a more dangerous disease. But here are two instances of his weakness and infirmity in his conversion.

I. In one instance, he over-did it, that he would not only worship the God of Israel, but he would have clods of earth out of the prophet's garden, or, at least, of the Prophet's ordering, to make an altar of, v. 17. He that a while ago had spoken very slightly of the waters of Israel, (v. 12.) now is in another extreme, and over-values the earth of Israel, supposing (since God appointed altars of earth, Exod. 20. 24.) an altar of that earth would be most acceptable to him; not considering that all the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Or perhaps the transport of his affection and veneration for the prophet, not only upon the account of his power, but of his virtue and generosity, made him, as we say, love the very ground he went upon, and desire to have some of it home with him. The modern compliment equivalent to this, would be, "Pray, sir, let me have your picture."

2. In another instance, he under-did it, that he reserved to himself a liberty to bow in the house of Rimmon, in complaisance to the king his master, and according to the duty of his place at court; (v. 18.) in this thing he must be excused. He owns he ought not to do it, but that he cannot otherwise keep his place; protests his bowing is not, nor ever shall be, as it had been, in honour to the idol, but only in honour to the king; and therefore he hopes God will forgive him. Perhaps, all things considered, this might admit of some apology, though it was not altogether justifiable. But as to us, I am sure, (1.) If, in covenanting with God, we make a reservation for any known sin, which we will continue to indulge ourselves in, that reservation is a defeasance of his covenant. We must cast away all our transgressions, and not except any house of Rimmon. (2.) Though we are encouraged to pray for the remission of the sins we have committed, yet if we ask for a dispensation to go on in any sin for the future, we mock God, and deceive ourselves. (3.) Those that know not how to quit a place at court, when they cannot keep it without sinning against God, and wronging their consciences, do not rightly value the divine favour. (4.) Those that truly hate evil, will make conscience of abstaining from all appearances of evil. Though Naaman's dissembling of his religion cannot be approved, yet because his promise to offer no sacrifice to any but the God of Israel only, was a great point gained with a Syrian, and because, by asking pardon in this matter, he showed such a degree of conviction and ingenuousness as gave hopes of improvement, the prophet took fair leave of him, and bid him Go in peace, v. 19. Young converts must be tenderly dealt with.

20. But Gehazi, the servant of Elisha the man of God, said, Behold, my master hath spared Naaman this Syrian, in not receiving at his hands that which he brought: but, as the LORD liveth, I will run after him, and take somewhat of him. 21. So Gehazi followed after Naaman. And when Naaman saw him running after him, he lighted down from the chariot to meet him, and said, Is all well? 22. And he said, All is well. My master hath sent me, saying, Behold, even now there be come to me from mount Ephraim two young men of the sons of the prophets: give them, I pray thee, a talent of silver, and two changes of garments. 23. And Naaman said, Be content, take two talents. And he urged him, and bound two talents of silver in two bags, with two changes of garments, and laid them upon two of his servants; and they bare them before him. 24. And when he came to the tower, he took them from their hand, and bestowed them in the house: and he let the men go, and they departed. 25. But he went in, and stood before his master. And Elisha said unto him, Whence comest thou, Gehazi? And he said, Thy servant went no whither. 26. And he said unto him, Went not mine heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee?

Is it a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and olive-yards, and vineyards, and sheep, and oxen, and men-servants, and maid-servants? 27. The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow.

Naaman, a Syrian, a courtier, a soldier, had many servants, and we read how wise and good they were, v. 13. Elisha, a holy prophet, a man of God, has but one servant, and he proves a base liar. They that heard of Elisha at a distance, honoured him, and got good by what they heard; but he that stood continually before him, to hear his wisdom, had no good impressions made upon him either by his doctrine or miracles. One would expect that Elisha's servant should be a saint, (even Ahab's servant, Obadiah, was,) but even Christ himself had a Judas among his followers. The means of grace cannot give grace. The best men, the best ministers, have often had those about them, that have been their grief and shame. The nearer the church, the further from God. Many come from the east and west to sit down with Abraham, when the children of the kingdom shall be cast out.

Here is,

1. Gehazi's sin. It was a complicated sin.

1. The love of money, that root of all evil, was at the bottom of it. His master condemned Naaman's treasures, but he coveted them, v. 20. His heart (says Bishop Hall) was packed up in Naaman's chests, and he must run after him to fetch it. Multitudes, by coveting worldly wealth, have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves with many sorrows.

2. He blamed his master for refusing Naaman's present, condemned him as foolish, in not taking gold when he might have it, envied and gruded at his kindness and generosity to this stranger, though it was for the good of his soul. In short, he thinks himself wiser than his master.

3. When Naaman, like a person of accomplished manners, alighted from his chariot to meet him, (v. 21.) he told him a deliberate lie, that his master sent him to him, and so he received that courtesy to himself, which Naaman intended to his master.

4. He abused his master, and basely misrepresented him to Naaman, as one that had soon repented of his generosity, that was fickle, and did not know his own mind, that would say and unsay, swear and unswear, that would not do an honourable thing, but he must presently undo it again. His story of the two sons of the prophets was as silly as it was false; if he would have begged a token for two young scholars, surely less than a talent of silver might serve them.

5. There was danger of his alienating Naaman from that holy religion which he had espoused, and lessening his good opinion of it. He would be ready to say, as Paul's enemies suggested concerning him, (2 Cor. 12. 16, 17.) that though Elisha himself did not burthen him, yet, being crafty, he caught him with guile, sending those that made a gain of him. We hope that he understood afterward that Elisha's hand was not in it, and that Gehazi was forced to restore what he had unjustly got, else it might have driven him to his idols again.

6. His seeking to conceal what he had unjustly got, added much to his sin. (1.) He hid it, as Achan did his gain, by sacrifice, in the tower, a secret place, a strong place, till he had an opportunity of laying it out, v. 24. Now he thought himself sure of it, and applauded his own management of a fraud, by which he had imposed, not only upon the prudence of Naaman, but upon Elisha's spirit of discerning, as Ananias and Sapphira upon the apostles. (2.) He denied it: he went in, and stood before his master, ready to receive his orders; none looked more observant of his master, though really none more injurious to him; he thought, as Ephraim, I am become rich, but they shall find no iniquity in me, Hos. 12. 8. His master asked him, where he had been. "No where, sir," (said he,) "out of the house." Note, One lie commonly begets another: the way of that sin is down-hill; therefore dare to be true.

II. The punishment of this sin. Elisha immediately called him to an account for it; and observe,
